And now that she sensed we could no longer understand her, she stopped speaking altogether and lay there motionless. When she caught sight of me she gave a sort of start like someone who is suddenly unable to breathe, but her desire to speak to me resulted only in unintelligible sounds. Then, overcome by sheer helplessness, she would let her head fall back, lie out flat on the bed, grave and stony-faced, her hands motionless on the sheet or engaged in some purely physical action like wiping her fingers on her handkerchief. She had no desire to think. This would be followed by a state of constant restlessness. She would incessantly want to get up. But we dissuaded her as far as we could, for fear she would realize how paralysed she was. One day when she had been left alone for a moment, I discovered her on her feet, in her night-dress, trying to open the window. In Balbec, once, when a widow who had flung herself into the sea had been rescued against her will, my grandmother had said to me (moved perhaps by one of those forebodings we sometimes sense in the otherwise highly obscure mystery of our organic life, where the future is none the less reflected, it seems) that she could think of nothing so cruel as to snatch a desperate woman from the death she had deliberately sought and to bring her back to a life of torture.

We were only just in time to grab hold of my grandmother; she put up an almost violent struggle against my mother, then, overpowered, forcibly made to sit in an armchair, she ceased to will, to regret, her face became impassive once more and she began meticulously to pick off the hairs left on her night-dress by the fur coat we had thrown over her shoulders.

The look in her eyes changed completely: often anxious, doleful, wild, it was no longer the look we knew, but the sullen expression of a drivelling old woman.

By repeatedly asking her whether she would like her to see to her hair, Françoise ended up by persuading herself that the request had come from my grandmother herself. She brought brushes, combs, eau de Cologne, a gown, and remarked: 'It can't do Madame Amédée any harm if I comb her hair. No one's too weak to have their hair combed.' Which meant, no one is ever too weak for someone else to be able, for that someone else's own comfort, to comb their hair. But when I came into the room, I saw in the cruel hands of Françoise, as delighted as if she were restoring my grandmother to health, beneath the grief-stricken strands of aged hair which lacked the strength to bear contact with a comb, a head which was incapable of maintaining the position demanded of it and was falling about in a constant whirl in which exhaustion alternated with pain. I could feel that Françoise was coming to the end of her task, and I dared not hasten it by saying: 'That's enough,' in case she disobeyed me. But I did rush forward when Françoise, who wanted my grandmother to see whether her hair had been done properly, was about to hand her, in callous innocence, a mirror. I was initially glad that I had managed to snatch it away from her in time, before my grandmother, whom we had carefully kept away from mirrors, caught even a stray glimpse of a reflection she would have been unable to recognize. But alas, when, a moment later, I bent to kiss the handsome forehead which had undergone such exhausting treatment, she looked up at me in astonishment, distrustful and deeply shocked: she had failed to recognize me.

In the opinion of our doctor, this was a symptom that the congestion of her brain was increasing. It must be relieved. Cottard was in two minds. Françoise hoped for a second that they were going to use 'clarified' cupping-glasses. She looked up the effects of this treatment in my dictionary but could find no reference to it. Had she said 'scarified' instead of 'clarified' she still would not have found any reference to this adjective, since she did not look it up under C any more than under S; in fact she said 'clarified' but wrote (and therefore assumed that the written form was) 'esclarified.' Cottard, to her disappointment, decided, without much hope, to use leeches. A few hours later, when I went into my grandmother's room, fastened to her neck, her temples, her ears, the tiny black reptiles were writhing in her blood-stained hair, Medusa-like. But in her pale face, now pacified and utterly motionless, I saw her beautiful eyes, wide open, luminous and calm as they once used to be (perhaps even more brimming with intelligence than they had been before her illness, since, being unable to speak and forbidden to move, it was to her eyes alone that she entrusted her thought, that thought which holds such immense sway inside us and offers us unexpected treasures, or which can seem reduced to nothing and then be reborn, as if by spontaneous generation, thanks to the removal of a few drops of blood), her eyes, soft and liquid as oil, in which the rekindled fire which was now burning lit up for the sick woman the recaptured universe. Her calm was no longer the wisdom of despair but of hope. She realized she was feeling better, was anxious to be prudent and not to move, did no more than to bestow a lovely smile on me so that I should know she was feeling better, and gently pressed my hand.

I knew the disgust my grandmother felt at the sight of certain creatures, not to mention being touched by them. I knew it was out of respect for the advantageous relief they would bring that she endured the leeches. And so it infuriated me to hear Françoise chuckling at her as to a child who has to be humoured, and repeating: 'Oh, look at the little beasties crawling all over Madame!' Furthermore, this was to treat our invalid with a lack of respect, as though she had in fact slipped into second childhood. But my grandmother, whose face now wore the calm forbearance of a stoic, did not even seem to hear.

Alas, no sooner had the leeches been removed than the congestion returned and grew steadily worse. At this critical stage of my grandmother's illness, it amazed me that Françoise was constantly going off somewhere. And why? She had ordered herself a mourning outfit and did not want to keep the dressmaker waiting. In most women's lives, everything, even the greatest sorrow, comes down to a question of 'I haven't got a thing to wear.'

A few days later, while I was asleep, my mother came to call me in the middle of the night. With the tender concern of the grief-stricken, evident even in extremity, for the petty comforts of others, she said:

'Forgive me for disturbing your sleep.

– I wasn't asleep,' I answered as I awoke.

I said this quite genuinely. The great modification brought about by awakening is not so much our entry into the clear life of consciousness as the loss of all memory of the slightly more subdued light in which our mind had been resting, as in the opaline depths of the sea. The half-veiled thoughts on which we were still drifting a moment ago involved us in quite enough motion for us to refer to them as wakefulness. But then our awakenings themselves involve an interruption of memory. A short time later we describe what preceded them as sleep because we no longer remember it. And when the bright star which, at the moment of waking, lights up behind the sleeper the whole expanse of his sleep, begins to shine, it creates the momentary illusion that he was not sleeping but awake; a shooting star in reality, which dispels along with its fading light both the illusory existence and the contours of the dream and merely enables the waking man to say: 'I've been asleep.'

In a voice so gentle that it seemed to be afraid of doing me harm, my mother asked whether it would tire me too much to get up, and, stroking my hands, she added:

'Poor boy, you have only your Papa and Mama to rely on now.'

We went into the bedroom. Bent in a semi-circle on the bed, a creature other than my grandmother, a sort of beast who had donned the same hair and nestled among the same bedclothes, lay panting, whimpering, making the blankets heave with its convulsions. The eyelids were closed, and it was because they did not shut properly rather than because they opened that they revealed a small corner of eyeball, misted, rheumy, reflecting dimness of organic vision and inner pain. All this agitation was not intended for our benefit; she neither saw nor knew us. But if it was only a beast that was stirring there, where was my grandmother? And yet the shape of her nose was still recognizable, bearing no relation now to the rest of her face, but with its beauty spot still there in one corner, and so was her hand as it pushed aside the bedclothes with a gesture which would have once meant that those bedclothes bothered her but now meant nothing.

Mama asked me to fetch a little water and vinegar to bathe my grandmother's forehead. It was the only thing that refreshed her, thought Mama, who could see that she was trying to push back her hair from her face. But I was being beckoned from the doorway. The news that my grandmother was close to death had spread through the house at once. One of those 'extra pairs of hands', employed at exceptional times to take the burden off the regular servants (which means that deathbeds start resembling parties), had just opened the door to the Duc de Guermantes, who was now waiting in the hall asking for me; I had no alternative.

'My dear sir, I have just heard your macabre news. As a mark of sympathy, I should like to shake your father by the hand.'

I replied that I was very sorry, but it was a difficult moment for him to be disturbed. M. de Guermantes was like a caller who turns up just as one is about to go off somewhere. But he was so conscious of the importance of the courtesy he was showing us that it blinded him to everything else, and he insisted on being shown into the drawing-room. As a rule, he tended to make a point of carrying out punctiliously the formalities with which he had decided to honour a person and took little heed of things like packed trunks or coffins standing in readiness.

'Have you sent for Dieulafoy? No? That was a serious oversight. Had you asked me, he would have come on my behalf. He never refuses me anything, although he has been known to refuse the Duchesse de Chartres. I clearly take precedence over a Princess of the Blood, it would seem. But we are all equals in the face of death,' he added, not to assure me that my grandmother was becoming his equal but possibly because he felt that a prolonged conversation about his power over Dieulafoy and his precedence over the Duchesse de Chartres would not be in very good taste. His advice did not in the least surprise me. I knew that among the Guermantes Dieulafoy's name was always referred to (only with slightly more respect) in exactly the same way as any other top-quality caterer or supplier. And the old Duchesse de Mortemart, a Guermantes by birth (I never could understand why a duchess is invariably referred to as 'The old duchess X' or, conversely, if the duchess is young, in delicate Watteau-like tones, as 'The little duchess Y'), could almost always be relied on, in serious cases, to give a wink of recommendation and come out with: 'Dieulafoy, Dieulafoy!' in the same way that for ices she would say 'Poiré Blanche' or for high-class confectionery 'Rebattet, Rebattet!' But what I did not know was that my father had in fact just sent for Dieulafoy.

At this juncture my mother, who was waiting impatiently for the arrival of oxygen cylinders which would help my grandmother to breathe more easily, came out herself into the hall, where she little expected to find M. de Guermantes. I would have done anything to make him disappear. But convinced that nothing was more important, could be more flattering to her or more indispensable to maintaining his reputation as a perfect gentleman, he seized me violently by the arm and, despite my repeated protestations of 'Sir, Sir, Sir' in the face of this near-assault, dragged me across to Mama with the words: 'Would you do me the great honour of presenting me to your lady mother?', his voice wavering slightly on the word 'mother'. And it was so obvious to him that the honour was hers that he could not hide a smile even while he was adopting a suitably serious expression. I had no alternative but to effect an introduction, which immediately set him hopping about in a series of low bows, ready to begin the whole ritual of salutation. He even seemed inclined to enter into conversation, but my mother, beside herself with grief, told me to come quickly and did not even reply to the remarks made by M. de Guermantes, who, expecting to be received as a visitor and finding himself left alone in the hall instead, would have departed had he not at that moment caught sight of Saint-Loup, who had arrived in Paris that morning and come rushing to see us when he heard the news. 'I say, what a pleasant surprise!' cried the Duc joyfully, grabbing his nephew by the sleeve and nearly tearing it off, heedless of the presence of my mother, who was again crossing through the hall. Saint-Loup was not altogether sorry, I think, despite his genuine sympathy, to avoid seeing me, given his attitude towards me. He was dragged off by his uncle, who had something important to say to him which he had been on the point of going to Doncières to impart, and was absolutely delighted to have saved himself the expense and trouble. 'Now if anyone had told me I had only to cross the courtyard to find you, I'd have thought they were taking me for a ride. As your friend M. Bloch would put it, it's a rather "droll" coincidence.' And as he disappeared with his arm round Robert's shoulder: 'All the same,' he went on, 'I've obviously touched the hangman's rope or whatever; I do have the devil's own luck.' It was not that the Duc de Guermantes was bad-mannered. Far from it. But he was one of those men who are incapable of putting themselves in the place of others, similar in this respect to undertakers and the majority of doctors, who, after composing their faces and saying 'This is a very painful time for you', perhaps even embracing you and recommending rest, then revert to treating a deathbed or a funeral just like some social gathering of a more or less restricted kind at which, with the joviality they have just momentarily repressed, they scan the room for someone they can talk to about their humdrum affairs or ask to introduce them to someone else or offer a lift home in their carriage. The Duc de Guermantes, while congratulating himself on the 'favourable wind' that had blown him to his nephew, was still so taken aback by the reception he had been given by my mother, quite understandable though it had been, that he later declared her to be as disagreeable as my father was civil, prone to 'blanks' during which she seemed not to hear a single word you said to her and, in his opinion, off colour and perhaps even not quite in her right mind. At the same time, from what I was told, he was willing to put it down partly to 'the circumstances' and to admit that my mother had been greatly 'affected' by the sad event. But his limbs were still twitching with a whole residue of gestures of greeting and backward bows he had been prevented from fully accomplishing, and he was so impervious to the real nature of my mother's grief that he asked me, the day before the funeral, if I was doing anything to take her mind off things.

A brother-in-law of my grandmother's, a monk whom I had never met, had telegraphed the head of his order in Austria and, having obtained special dispensation to come, arrived that day. Weighed down by grief, he sat by the bedside reading prayers and meditations yet never once shifting his penetrating gaze from the invalid. At one point when my grandmother had fallen unconscious, the sight of this priest's grief pained me, and my eyes came to rest on him. He seemed startled by my pity, and then an odd thing happened. He covered his face with his hands like a man absorbed in doleful meditation but, taking it for granted that I would look away, he had left a small gap between his fingers, and I noticed it. And just as I was looking away, I glimpsed his sharp eye, which had been taking advantage of his sheltering hands to observe whether my sympathy was sincere. He was lying there in wait like a priest in the shadow of a confession box. He saw that I had noticed and instantly shut tight the grill he had not quite closed. I met him again later, but never did we mention what had happened in that minute. It was tacitly agreed that I had not noticed him spying on me. Priests, like specialists in mental disorders, always have something of the examining magistrate about them. Besides, what friend is there, however dear, in whose past, as in ours, there has not been some similar incident we find it more convenient to believe he has forgotten?

The doctor gave a morphine injection and to make her breathing less painful ordered oxygen cylinders. My mother, the doctor, the nurse held these in their hands; as soon as one was empty they were handed another. I had left the room briefly. When I returned I found myself in the presence of something like a miracle. Accompanied by a subdued incessant murmur, my grandmother seemed to be singing us a long, happy song which filled the room, rapid and musical. I soon realized that it was scarcely less unconscious than, as purely mechanical as, the hoarse rattle I had heard earlier. Perhaps it faintly reflected some improvement induced by the morphine. It was mainly the result, since the air was not passing in quite the same way through the bronchial tubes, of a change of register in her breathing. Released by the twofold effect of oxygen and morphine, my grandmother's breath was no longer a laboured groan but, swift and light, it was gliding like a skater towards the delicious fluid. Perhaps the breath, imperceptibly, like the wind breathing into the stem of a reed, was mingled in this song with some of those more human sighs which, released at the approach of death, suggest impressions of pain or pleasure in those who can no longer feel and which came now to give a more melodious stress, but without changing its rhythm, to the long phrase which rose higher and higher, then descended, before issuing forth again from the lightened chest in its search for oxygen. And after reaching such a pitch, sustaining itself so vigorously, this song, mingled in its voluptuousness with a murmur of supplication, seemed at times to stop completely like a spring run dry.

When she experienced great grief, Françoise felt the need (so futile) to express it but lacked the art (so simple) to do so. Having made up her mind that my grandmother was doomed, what she was most anxious to impart to us was what she, Françoise, felt. And all she could do was to repeat: 'It's had a nasty effect on me,' in the same tone in which she would say, when she had had too much cabbage soup, 'There's something weighing on my stomach,' which, in both cases, was more natural than she seemed to think. However feebly expressed it was, her grief was none the less considerable and it was made even worse by the fact that her daughter was detained in Combray (which this young Parisienne now referred to as 'the back of beyond' where she felt herself becoming 'a country bumpkin') and unlikely to be able to return in time for the funeral ceremony, which, Françoise felt certain, would be a grand occasion. Knowing that we were not in the habit of showing our emotions, she had taken the precaution of summoning Jupien in advance to spend every evening that week in her company. She knew he would not be free at the time of the funeral. She wanted at least to have the opportunity to 'tell him all about it' when he got back.

For several nights now my father, my grandfather and one of our cousins had been keeping watch at the bedside and no longer left the house. Their continuous devotion eventually assumed a mask of indifference, and the interminable whiling away of time around this deathbed led them to indulge in the sort of small talk that inevitably accompanies prolonged confinement in a railway carriage. The cousin in question (a nephew of my great aunt) aroused in me a degree of antipathy equal to the esteem he deserved and generally enjoyed.

He was always somewhere in the background on important occasions and was so assiduous in his solicitude for the dying that the families concerned, on the pretext that he was delicate, despite his robust appearance, his bass voice and flourishing beard, invariably begged him, with customary evasiveness of expression, not to come to the cemetery. I knew already that Mama, thoughtful for others despite her immense grief, would soon be telling him in different terms what he was accustomed to hear said on all such occasions:

'Promise me you won't come "tomorrow". Do it for "her sake". If not, then there's no need for you to attend "the last part". It's what she would have wanted.'

It was no use; he was always the first to arrive 'at the house' and for this reason he had been given, in another circle and unbeknown to us, the nickname 'No flowers by request'. And before attending 'everything' he had always 'looked after everything', which earned him the reaction from people: 'We don't even have to thank you.'

'What was that?' asked my grandfather loudly. He had grown rather deaf and had not managed to catch something my cousin had just said to my father.

'Oh, nothing, answered the cousin. I was just saying that I'd had a letter from Combray this morning. They're having dreadful weather there, and here it's almost too hot.

– And yet the barometer is very low, said my father.

– Where did you say they're having bad weather? asked my grandfather.

– In Combray.

– Ah! I'm not surprised. Whenever the weather's bad here, it's fine in Combray and vice versa. Oh lord! talking of Combray, has anyone remembered to tell Legrandin?

– Yes, there's no need to worry, it's been done,' said my cousin, whose cheeks, bronzed by a heavy growth of beard, gave the merest hint of a satisfied smile at having thought of it.

At this point my father rushed from the room. My immediate reaction was that there had been a change for better or worse. In fact it was merely that Dr Dieulafoy had just arrived. My father went off to the adjoining drawing-room to receive him, the latest actor to step into the drama. He had been sent for not to tend the patient but to certify, almost like a lawyer. Dr Dieulafoy may indeed have been a great physician, a wonderful professor of medicine; to these roles, in which he excelled, he added another, in which he remained for forty years unchallenged, a role as original as that of the actor representing the voice of reason, scaramouche or the noble father, and which consisted in coming to certify that a patient was on the point of death, or dead. His very name hinted at the dignity with which he would fulfil his role, and when the maid announced: 'M. Dieulafoy', it was like something out of a play by Molière. The dignity of his bearing was bolstered, unobtrusively, by his lithe and attractive build. The over-handsome face was redeemed by a decorum appropriate to distressing circumstances. With unaffected gravity, the Professor would enter the room in his distinguished black frock-coat, utter not one word of condolence which could have been construed as insincere and do nothing that breached the rules of tact in the slightest way. At the foot of a deathbed it was he, not the Duc de Guermantes, who was the great nobleman. After examining my grandmother without fatiguing her and with more than enough restraint to show respect to the acting doctor, he murmured a few words to my father and bowed respectfully to my mother, to whom I felt it was all my father could do not to say: 'Professor Dieulafoy.' But already the Professor had turned away, not wishing to seem intrusive, and made a perfect exit, simply accepting the sealed envelope that was slipped into his hand. He did not seem to have seen it, and even we were left wondering for a moment whether we had really given it to him, so dextrously had he made it disappear, like a conjurer, yet without losing a single trace of the gravity – if anything, it was accentuated – of the eminent consultant in his long frock-coat with its silk lapels, his handsome face weighed down with the most dignified commiseration. Both his poise and his deftness indicated that, however many other calls he had to make, he had no wish to appear to be in a hurry. For he was the embodiment of tact, intelligence and kindness. This eminent man is no longer. Other doctors, other professors may have equalled or even surpassed him. But the 'function' in which his knowledge, his physical endowments and his excellent manners made him supreme no longer exists, for want of successors capable of performing it. Mama had not even noticed M. Dieulafoy: everything apart from my grandmother had ceased to exist. I remember (I am anticipating here) that at the cemetery, where we saw her, like a supernatural apparition, edge diffidently towards the grave, her eyes seemingly gazing after a being who had flown off and was already far away, my father said: 'Old Norpois came to the house, to the church and he's now here at the cemetery. He missed a very important meeting to get here. You ought to say a word to him, he'd be very touched,' and all that my mother could do, when the ambassador bowed to her, was gently to incline her face, on which there was no sign of tears. Two days earlier – to anticipate again before I return to the bedside of my dying grandmother – while we were watching over her dead body, Françoise, who half-believed in ghosts and was terrified by the least sound, had said: 'I think that's her.' But it was not fear, rather an infinite sweetness that these words aroused in my mother, who would have longed for the dead to return and to have her mother with her sometimes still.

To return to those hours of dying:

'You heard about the telegram her sisters sent? my grandfather asked my cousin.

– Yes, that Beethoven business. I was told about it. It ought to be framed. But I'm not surprised.

– And my poor wife was so fond of them, said my grandfather, wiping away a tear. We mustn't hold it against them though. They're stark raving mad, the pair of them. I've always said so. What's the matter? Aren't you continuing with the oxygen?'

My mother said:

'But won't Mama start having difficulty with her breathing again?'

The doctor reassured her:

'Don't worry. The effect of the oxygen will last a good while yet. We can go on with it again presently.'

It seemed to me that he would not have said this of a dying woman, that if the good effect was going to last it meant that it was possible to do something to keep her alive. The hiss of the oxygen stopped for a few minutes. But the happy lament of her breathing still issued from her, light, disquieted, incomplete, beginning over and over again. At times it seemed as if it was all over: her breath stopped, either because of one of those shifts of octave that occur in the respiration of a sleeper or because of some natural interruption, an effect of anaesthesia, developing asphyxia, a failure of the heart. The doctor took my grandmother's pulse once more, but already, as if a tributary had come to irrigate the dried-up river bed, a new tune had taken up the interrupted phrase. It took over in another key with the same inexhaustible impetus. Who knows whether, without my grandmother even being conscious of them, a host of happy and tender experiences constricted by suffering were not escaping from her now, like those lighter gases which have been kept under pressure for a long time? It was as if everything she had to tell us was pouring out, that it was us she was addressing with this prolixity, this eagerness, this effusion. At the foot of the bed, convulsed by every gasp of the dying woman, not weeping but at moments drowned in tears, my mother stood with the heedless desolation of leaves lashed by the rain and torn back by the wind. I was made to dry my eyes before I went to kiss my grandmother.

'But I thought she could no longer see, said my father.

– One can never tell,' replied the doctor.

When my lips touched her face, my grandmother's hands quivered and a long shudder ran through her whole body – possibly an automatic reflex, or perhaps it is that certain forms of affection are hypersensitive enough to recognize through the veil of unconsciousness what they scarcely need the senses to enable them to love. Suddenly my grandmother started up, made a violent effort, like someone struggling to hold on to her life. Françoise was unable to offer any resistance to the sight of this and burst out sobbing. Remembering what the doctor had said, I tried to make her leave the room. At that moment my grandmother opened her eyes. I hurriedly thrust myself in front of Françoise to hide her tears while my parents were speaking to the dying woman. The hissing drone of oxygen had stopped; the doctor moved away from the bedside. My grandmother was dead.

A few hours later, Françoise was able for the last time, and without causing pain, to comb that beautiful hair which was only slightly greying and had thus far seemed much younger than my grandmother herself. But this was now reversed: the hair was the only feature to set the crown of age on a face grown young again, free of the wrinkles, the shrinkage, the puffiness, the tensions, the sagging flesh which pain had brought to it for so long. As in the distant days when her parents had chosen a husband for her, her features were delicately traced by purity and submission, her cheeks glowed with a chaste expectation, a dream of happiness, an innocent gaiety even, which the years had gradually destroyed. As it ebbed from her, life had borne away its disillusions. A smile seemed to hover on my grandmother's lips. On that funeral couch, death, like a sculptor of the Middle Ages, had laid her to rest with the face of a young girl.

CHAPTER 2

A visit from Albertine – The prospect of a wealthy marriage for some of Saint-Loup's friends – Guermantes wit and the Princess of Parma – A curious visit to M. de Charlus – I fail increasingly to understand his character – The Duchesse's red shoes

Although it was simply a Sunday in autumn, I had just been reborn, life stretched out uninterruptedly before me, for that morning, after a series of mild days, there had been a chilly fog which had not cleared until around midday. And a change in the weather is enough to create the world and ourselves afresh. In the past, when the wind swept down my chimney, I would listen to the blows it struck on the flue-trap with as much emotion as if, like the famous motif on the strings which opens the Fifth Symphony,[3] they had been the irresistible calls of a mysterious destiny. Every change in the natural scene offers us a similar transformation by adapting our desires to harmonize with the fresh shape of things. The mist, from the moment I woke up, had turned me, not into the centrifugal being of fine days, but into a man of reclusion, hankering after the fireside corner and the shared bed, an Adam sensitive to cold in quest of a sedentary Eve, in this changed world.

Between the soft grey light of a morning landscape and the taste of a cup of chocolate I instated all that was distinctive about the physical, intellectual and moral life I had taken with me to Doncières about a year earlier and which, blazoned with the oblong shape of a bare hillside – always present even when it was invisible – represented a series of pleasures that were utterly distinct from any others, incommunicable to friends in the sense that the impressions, richly interwoven with one another, which orchestrated them were more typical of them for me, in an unconscious way, than any facts about them I could have related to others. From this point of view the new world into which I had been plunged by the morning mist was a world already known to me (which only made it more real) and forgotten for some time (which restored all its freshness). And I was able to study several of the pictures of misty landscapes acquired by my memory, notably a series of 'Mornings in Doncières', including my first morning in the barracks there and another in a nearby country house where I had gone with Saint-Loup to spend the night: from the windows of both, when I had drawn back the curtains at dawn before getting back into bed, in the first a cavalryman, in the second (at the narrow margin of a pond and a wood, all the rest of which was engulfed in the uniform and liquid softness of the mist) a coachman polishing a harness strap, had appeared like those rare figures, scarcely visible to the eye – forced to adapt itself to the mysterious blur of the half-light – which emerge from a worn fresco.

It was from my bed that I was now contemplating these memories, for I had returned to it to wait until evening when, taking advantage of the absence of my parents who had gone to Combray for a few days, I proposed to attend a little play which was being put on at Mme de Villeparisis's house. Had they returned, I should not have dared to do this; my mother, in the niceties of her respect for my grandmother's memory, wished any token of regret paid to it to be spontaneous and genuine; she would not have forbidden me to go but she would have disapproved. From Combray, on the contrary, had I consulted her about this, she would not have replied with a doleful: 'Do what you wish, you're old enough now to know your own mind,' but, reproaching herself for having left me alone in Paris and gauging my grief from her own, she would have wished it could have been distracted by pleasures she would not have allowed herself and which she convinced herself that my grandmother, in her overriding concern for my health and nervous stability, would have been the first to recommend.

That morning the newly installed heating boiler had been lit. The disagreeable noise it made – a sort of spasmodic hiccup – was in no way connected to my memories of Doncières, but its prolonged encounter with them inside me that afternoon was to force it into such an affinity with them that, after I thought I had more or less forgotten it, whenever I heard the central heating, it would bring them back to me.

I was alone in the house with Françoise. The grey daylight, falling like fine rain, wove an endless succession of transparent webs through which the Sunday strollers appeared in a silvery haze. I had cast the Figaro to the foot of the bed; I had been having it delivered punctiliously ever since I had sent in an article which had not yet appeared; despite the absence of sun, it was clear from the amount of daylight that we were still only half-way through the afternoon. The tulle window-curtains, misted and friable as they would not have been on a fine day, had that same mixture of softness and brittleness as a dragonfly's wing and Venetian glass. I was all the more downcast to be spending this Sunday alone because that morning I had sent a note to Mlle de Stermaria. Robert de Saint-Loup, whose mother had at last managed – after various painful and abortive attempts – to get him to leave his mistress, and who had straightway been sent to Morocco to forget the woman he had in fact ceased to love for some time, had sent me a line, which I had received the day before, announcing his imminent arrival in France for a short spell of leave. Since he would only be passing through Paris (where his family were doubtless afraid of him taking up again with Rachel), to show that he had been thinking of me, his letter informed me that in Tangiers he had met Mlle or rather Mme de Stermaria, given that she had divorced her husband after three months of marriage. Remembering what I had said to him in Balbec, Robert had asked for an assignation with the young woman on my behalf. She would be delighted to dine with me, she had told him, on one of the days she was spending in Paris before returning to Brittany. He told me to lose no time writing to Mme de Stermaria, since she had almost certainly arrived. Saint-Loup's letter had come as no surprise, even though I had had no news from him since his letter accusing me of perfidy and treachery, written at the time of my grandmother's illness. I had immediately grasped what must have happened. Rachel, who liked to provoke his jealousy – she also had other causes for resentment against me – had persuaded her lover that I had made sly attempts to have relations with her in his absence. It was likely that he still believed this to be true, but he had ceased to be smitten with her, which meant that, true or not, it had become a matter of utter indifference to him, and our friendship alone was what continued to be important. On one occasion when I saw him afterwards, I tried to broach the question of his accusations, and he merely smiled with benign affection in what seemed to be an apology, then changed the subject. None of this means that, a little later, he did not sometimes see Rachel when he was in Paris. The creatures who have played an important part in one's life rarely drop out of it for good, just like that. They come back into it from time to time (so much so that people start believing in the renewal of former love) before leaving it for ever. Saint-Loup's break-up with Rachel had very soon become less painful to him, thanks to the soothing pleasure her constant demands for money provided. Jealousy, which protracts the experience of love, is not capable of containing many more elements than any other form of imagination. If, at the start of a journey, we go off with three or four images, which in any case will be lost on the way (the lilies and anemones on the Ponte Vecchio, the Persian church seen through the mist and so forth), our trunk is already pretty full. When we leave our mistress, we would prefer her, until we have begun to forget, not to become the property of the three or four potential lovers we picture keeping her, in other words, of whom we are jealous: all those we do not picture count for nothing. Now frequent demands for money from a former mistress give no more idea of her life in its entirety than high figures on a temperature chart would give of her illness. But the latter would at least indicate that she was ill and the former create the presumption, a vague enough one it is true, that the woman in question – forsaken or forsaker – cannot have found much in the way of a rich protector. And so each demand is greeted with the joy that arises from a lull in the jealous man's torment and is met with an immediate dispatch of money, for we would not like to think of her being in want of anything, except lovers (one of the three we picture), until such time as we have been able to regain some composure and to discover our successor's name without flinching. Sometimes Rachel got back so late that it was possible for her to ask her former lover's permission to sleep beside him until morning. This was a great solace to Robert, for a simple fact like her not in the least disturbing his sleep when he himself occupied the greater part of the bed would make him realize just how intimately they had lived together. He could see that she was more comfortable close to his body than she would have been elsewhere, that, lying there beside him, she felt, even in a hotel, as if she were in a bedroom known from way back, a familiar setting in which one sleeps more soundly. He felt that his shoulders, his legs, his whole body, even when insomnia or preoccupation with work made him inordinately restless, were for her so entirely usual that they could not disturb her and that her awareness of them added still further to her own sense of repose.

To go back a little. I had been all the more aroused by Saint-Loup's letter from Morocco in that I could read between the lines the things he had not dared to write more explicitly. 'You need have no qualms about asking her to dine in private,' he wrote. 'She is a charming young woman with a delightful nature. You will get on splendidly with her, and I feel sure you will spend an enjoyable evening in her company.' Since my parents were coming back at the end of the week, on Saturday or Sunday, and I should be obliged after that to dine at home every evening, I had written at once to Mme de Stermaria to propose any evening that would suit her up to Friday. A message was brought back to say that I should get a written reply from her at about eight o'clock that very evening. The time would have passed quickly enough had it been made easier by a visit from someone else during the course of the intervening afternoon. When the hours are enveloped in conversation we become oblivious to the clock, do not even notice the time, and it slips away until suddenly, way beyond the point at which it escaped our attention, the nimble runaway reappears. But if we are alone, the thing on which our mind is set, by placing before us its still distant and ever awaited occurrence with tick-tock regularity, divides, or rather multiplies the hours by all the minutes we would have left uncounted in the company of friends. And pointed as it was, by the never-ending return of my desire, towards the throbbing pleasure I would enjoy (not for some days though, alas!) in Mme de Stermaria's company, this afternoon, which I was going to have to spend alone, seemed to me very empty and very melancholy.

Every now and then I heard the sound of the lift coming up, but it was followed by another sound, not the one I was hoping for (its stopping on our floor) but a quite different one which it made in its journey up to the floors above and which, because it invariably meant the desertion of my landing when I was expecting a visit, stayed with me subsequently, even at a time when I no longer wanted any visitors, as a sound that was in itself painful, resounding with something like a sentence to solitary confinement. Weary, resigned, with several hours still of its immemorial task to do, the grey day stitched away at its pearly braidwork, and I was filled with the gloomy thought that I was to remain alone in close contact with it, and with no more degree of acquaintance between us than I would have had with a seamstress sitting by the window to work in a better light, and taking absolutely no notice of the person there with her in the room. Suddenly, without my having heard the bell, Françoise opened the door to show Albertine into the room; she came in smiling, silent, plump, containing in the plenitude of her body, in readiness for me to continue living them, come to find out where I was, the days spent in that Balbec to which I had never since returned. No doubt, whenever we re-encounter someone with whom our relations – however trivial they may be – have now changed, it is like two distinct periods in time coming together. It does not take the visit of a former mistress who is now a friend to effect this, but simply the arrival in Paris of someone we have known on a daily basis in a certain kind of life and the fact that this life had now ceased, if only a week ago. On each of Albertine's smiling, questioning, hesitant features I could spell out the questions: 'And what about Mme de Villeparisis? And the dancing-master? And the confectioner?' When she sat down, her back seemed to be saying: 'There are no cliffs here, I know, but you don't mind if I sit beside you, as I used to in Balbec, do you?' She was like an enchantress representing a mirror of time. In this, she was like all the people we now only rarely see but with whom we once lived on more intimate terms. Yet with Albertine, there was something more. True, even in our daily encounters in Balbec, I was always surprised when I caught sight of her; she changed so much from day to day. But now she was hardly recognizable. No longer bathed in a pink haze, her features now stood out like those of a statue. She had another face, or rather she had a real face at last; her body had developed. There was almost nothing left of the sheath in which she had been enclosed and which, in Balbec, had almost completely masked her future figure.

This year, Albertine was back in Paris earlier than usual. Normally she did not arrive until spring, so that, already disturbed for some weeks by the storms that were crushing the first flowers, I could not distinguish, in my pleasure, between Albertine's return and that of the fine weather. It was enough to hear that she was in Paris and that she had called on me, for me to see her again like a rose by the sea. I am not quite sure whether it was the desire for Balbec or for her that took hold of me then; perhaps my desire for her was itself a lazy, cowardly, incomplete way of possessing Balbec, as if to possess a thing materially, to take up residence in a town, were equivalent to possessing it spiritually. And even materially, when she was not being swayed in my imagination before a horizon of sea but sitting there motionless beside me, she seemed to me often to be a very poor sort of rose, and I would have preferred to shut my eyes to avoid seeing the various blemishes on its petals and to imagine instead that I was breathing sea air.

I can say all this here, although I was not aware at the time of what was to happen later. Certainly, it is more reasonable to devote one's life to women than to postage stamps, old snuff-boxes, or even to paintings and statues. Yet these examples of collectors' pieces should alert us to variety, to having not a single woman but many. The charming associations between a young girl and the sea-shore or the braided hair of a church statue, an old print or anything that makes one love her, become rather unstable the moment she steps into the room like a delightful picture. Establish your life with this woman and you will cease to see anything of what made you love her; yet it is true that the two dissociated elements can be reunited by jealousy. If, after a long period of living together, I was to end up seeing Albertine as no more than an ordinary woman, an intrigue between her and someone she had loved in Balbec would possibly have been enough to reincorporate within her the amalgamation of sea-shore and breaking waves. But such secondary associations no longer captivate the eye; it is to the heart that they speak in their deadly way. It is not possible, in so dangerous a guise, to regard the renewal of the miracle as a thing to be desired. But I am anticipating the course of events. And here I need only voice my regret that I did not have the sense simply to keep my collection of women as someone might keep a collection of antique opera-glasses, never so complete, behind the glass of their cabinet, that there is not always room for another pair, rarer still.

Breaking with the normal pattern of her holiday arrangements, this year she had come straight from Balbec and had not stayed on there nearly so long as usual. I had not seen her for a long time. And since I did not know, even by name, the people she mixed with in Paris, I knew nothing of her life during the periods when she did not come to see me. They were often quite long. Then, one fine day, in would burst Albertine, a pink apparition on one of those silent visits who gave me little or no idea of what she had been doing in the interval, which remained plunged in the darkness of a life my eyes felt little interest in penetrating.

On this visit, however, certain signs seemed to indicate that some new experience must have taken place in that life. But perhaps the only thing one was entitled to conclude from them was that girls of Albertine's age change very quickly. For instance, her intelligence was more noticeable, and when I reminded her of the day she had insisted so heatedly that her idea of making Sophocles write 'My dear Racine' was best, she was the first to laugh quite genuinely. 'Andrée got it right. I was the stupid one,' she admitted, 'Sophocles ought to have written: "Sir." ' I replied that Andrée's 'Sir' and 'Dear Sir' were no less comic than her own 'My dear Racine' or Gisèle's 'My dear friend', but that in the end the really stupid people were the teachers who set letters from Sophocles to Racine. Here, Albertine lost track. She was unable to see what was stupid about it; her intelligence was opening up but not fully developed. There were other, more attractive new changes in her; I sensed, in this same pretty girl who had just sat down by my bed, something that was different and, in the lines which, in the gaze and the facial features, express someone's familiar purposes, a change of approach, a partial conversion, as if there had been something to break down those resistances I had met with in Balbec one now distant evening when we had formed a couple symmetrical with but the converse of the one we now formed this afternoon, for then it had been she who was lying down and I by her bedside. Wanting and not daring to find out whether she would now let herself be kissed, each time she rose to leave I asked her to stay a little longer. This was rather difficult, for although she had nothing to do (if she had, she would have rushed off to do it), she was set in her ways and in fact not very obliging towards me, as if she no longer took much pleasure in my company. Yet each time, after consulting her watch, she sat down again at my request, so that in the end she had spent several hours with me without my having demanded anything of her; the things I said to her were related to those I had said during the preceding hours, were totally unconnected with what I was thinking about, what I desired, and remained doggedly parallel to all this. There is nothing like desire for obstructing any resemblance between what one says and what one has on one's mind. Time presses, and yet it seems as though we were trying to gain time by speaking about things that are utterly alien to the one thing that preoccupies us. We chatter away, whereas the words we should like to utter would have by now been accompanied by a gesture, if indeed we have not – to give ourselves the pleasure of immediate action and to slake the curiosity we feel about the ensuing reactions to it – without a word, without so much as a by-your-leave, already made this gesture. It is true that I was not in the least in love with Albertine: born from the mist outside, she could do no more than satisfy the fanciful desire awakened in me by the change in the weather, poised midway between the desires that are satisfied by culinary arts and by monumental sculpture respectively, because it made me dream both of mingling my flesh with a substance that was different and warm, and of attaching to some point of my recumbent body a divergent body, as Eve's body is barely attached by the feet to the side of Adam, to whose body hers is almost perpendicular in the Romanesque bas-reliefs in the Balbec cathedral, representing in so noble and so placid a fashion, still almost like a classical frieze, the creation of woman; in them God is followed everywhere, as by two ministers, by two little angels recalling – like the winged, swirling creatures of the summer that winter has caught by surprise and spared – cupids from Herculaneum still surviving well into the thirteenth century, flagging now in their last flight, weary, but never relinquishing the grace we might expect of them, over the whole front of the porch.

In regard to the pleasure which would have released me from fantasies like these by fulfilling my desire and which I would have sought quite as readily from any other pretty woman, had I been asked upon what – in the course of this endless chatter I used to hide from Albertine the one thing that was on my mind – my optimistic assumption about the likelihood of her obliging me was based, I should probably have replied that this assumption was provoked (as the forgotten elements of Albertine's voice retraced for me the contour of her personality) by the emergence of certain words which had not previously formed part of her vocabulary, at least not in the sense she now gave them. When, for instance, she said that Elstir was stupid and I protested:

'You don't understand, she answered with a smile, I mean that he was stupid in this one case, but I'm perfectly well aware that he is a very distinguished man in reality.'

Likewise, to indicate how smart the Fontainebleau golf club was, she declared:

'It's quite a selection, in fact.'

In relation to a duel I had fought, she said of my seconds: 'What choice seconds,' and looking at my face confessed that she would like to see me 'sport a moustache'. She even went so far – and here my chances seemed to me to be considerable – as to use an expression that I would have sworn was unknown to her the year before and to say that a certain 'lapse of time' had gone by since she last saw Gisèle. This was not to say that Albertine had not possessed, when I was in Balbec, a fairly respectable batch of those expressions which immediately reveal a well-to-do family background and which, from year to year, a mother passes on to her daughter just as she makes her a present on important occasions, as the girl grows up, of her own jewellery. It was apparent that Albertine had ceased to be a little girl when one day, to express her thanks for a present given her by a lady she did not know, she had said: 'I really don't know how to thank you.' Mme Bontemps had been unable to stop herself exchanging glances with her husband, whose response had been:

'My word, and she's only about to turn fourteen.'

Her more pronounced nubility came to the fore when Albertine, speaking of another girl who had no idea how to behave, remarked: 'You can't even tell whether she's pretty, she cakes her face in so much make-up.' Finally, though still only a girl, she already adopted the manner of a grown woman of her background and class when she responded to someone who was pulling faces with the words: 'I can't bear to look at him, because it makes me want to do the same thing,' or, to someone who was doing funny imitations: 'What really amuses me is that when you imitate her, you start to look exactly like her.' All this is drawn from the social treasury. But what struck me was that Albertine's background was not likely to have provided her with the word 'distinguished' in the sense that my father used it of the odd colleague he had not yet met but whose great intelligence he had heard praised, to say: 'He's said to be a very distinguished person.' 'Selection' too, even when used of a golf club, seemed as out of place in the Simonet family as it would be preceded by the adjective 'natural' in a text published centuries before Darwin's researches. 'Lapse of time' seemed more promising still. Finally came evidence of upheavals whose nature was unknown to me but sufficient to justify all my hopes, as Albertine said, with the confidence of a person whose opinion is not to be disregarded:

'To my mind, it is the best thing that could possibly happen… I see it as the best way out, the stylish solution.'

This was so novel, so clearly an alluvial deposit hinting at such capricious explorations on territory hitherto unknown to her, that no sooner were the words 'to my mind' out of her mouth than I drew Albertine towards me, and at 'I see it as' sat her down on my bed. It is no doubt the case that women with a smattering of culture, marrying a well-read man, receive such expressions as part of their dowry. And shortly after the metamorphosis which follows the wedding night, when they start paying calls and becoming distant with their old friends, they have only to emphasize the two *l*s in the word when they denote someone as 'intelligent' to impress upon their astonished audience that they have become married women; but this is precisely the sign of a changed state, and it seemed to me that just such a thing had happened with Albertine's vocabulary, a vocabulary in which the most daring expressions I had previously heard were to say of any rather odd person: 'He's a bit of a character,' or, if you suggested a game of cards: 'I don't have money to throw away,' or else, if any of her friends reproached her with something she felt to be unjustified: 'That's a fine thing for you to say!', expressions dictated in such cases by a middle-class tradition almost as old as the Magnificat itself, which a girl who is slightly miffed and sure she is in the right uses 'quite naturally', as they say, in other words because she has learned them from her mother, just as she has learned to say her prayers or how to greet people politely. All these expressions she had learned from Mme Bontemps along with a hatred of Jews and a respect for the colour black because it is always suitable and never out of place, without any formal instruction on Mme Bontemps's part but in the way that baby goldfinches model their twitter on that of their parents and so turn into true goldfinches themselves. Despite all this, 'selection' struck me as foreign and 'I see it as' seemed inviting. Albertine was no longer the same and perhaps might not act, or react, in the same way.

Not only did I no longer feel any love for her but I no longer ran the risk, as I might have done in Balbec, of wrecking her affection for me, since it no longer existed. There could be no doubt that she had long become quite indifferent to me. I realized that for her I was no longer in any way a member of the 'little gang' into which I had once been so keen to seek admission and then so happy to have done so. And since she had not even retained the openness and good-nature she had shown in Balbec, I felt no major scruples; but I think it was one last philological discovery that settled matters. As I continued to add further links to the chain of irrelevant remarks beneath which I hid my inner desire, with Albertine now secure on the corner of my bed, I talked about one of the girls from the little gang who was less prominent than the others but whom I none the less thought quite pretty: 'Yes,' said Albertine, 'she's like a little mousmé.'[4] Obviously, when I first knew Albertine, the word mousmé was unknown to her. It was likely that in the normal course of events she would never have learned it, and as far as I was concerned that would have been fine, for there is no word that rankles more. The very sound of it sets your teeth on edge like too large a piece of ice in the mouth. But coming from Albertine, pretty as she was, not even mousmé could displease me. On the contrary, it seemed like a revelation, if not of an external initiation, then of some internal development. Unfortunately it was now time to say good-bye to her if I wanted her to get home in time for dinner and myself to be up in time for mine. Françoise was preparing it; she did not like it to be delayed and must have already been thinking that one of the articles of her code had been contravened in that Albertine, in the absence of my parents, should be paying me so long a visit, and one that was going to make everything late. But in the face of mousmé all these arguments fell away and I hastened to say:

'You know, I'm not in the least ticklish. You could tickle me for a whole hour and I wouldn't feel a thing.

– Is that so?

– I promise you.'

She no doubt understood that this was the clumsy expression of a desire, for, like someone who offers to give you an introduction you have not dared to solicit but to whom your words have indicated that it could be useful to you, she said with womanly meekness:

'Would you like me to try?

– If you'd like to, but it would be easier if you lay down properly on the bed.

– Like this?

– No, further in.

– Are you sure I'm not too heavy?'

As she said this, the door opened and Françoise walked in carrying a lamp. Albertine just had time to regain her chair. Perhaps Françoise had chosen this moment to startle us, after listening at the door or even peeping through the keyhole. But I had no need to suppose anything of the sort, she might well have disdained the use of her eyes to ascertain what her instinct must have adequately enough detected, for, throughout her service with me and my parents, fear, prudence, alertness and cunning had finally taught her that instinctive and almost divinatory knowledge of us that the sailor has of the sea, the quarry of the hunter, and if not the doctor then often the patient of the disease. All the knowledge she was in the habit of acquiring would have astounded anyone for as good a reason as the advanced state of certain areas of knowledge among the ancients, given the almost negligible means of information at their disposal (hers were no less so: a handful of chance remarks forming barely a twentieth part of our conversation at dinner, gleaned in passing by the butler and inaccurately transmitted to the staff quarters). Even her mistakes resulted, like theirs, like the fables in which Plato believed, from a false conception of the world and from preconceived ideas rather than from an inadequacy of material resources. Similarly, even today, the most important discoveries about insect behaviour have been made by a scientist with no laboratory, no apparatus at his disposal. But if the drawbacks of her position as a servant had not prevented her from acquiring the learning indispensable to the art which was its ultimate goal – the art of confounding us by communicating the results of her discoveries – the constraints on her time had been even more effective; here hindrance had not merely been content not to paralyse her enthusiasm, it had powerfully fired it. And of course Françoise neglected no auxiliary stimulant, like diction and attitude for instance. While she never believed anything we said to her when we wanted her to believe it, and since she accepted beyond a shadow of doubt the absurdest things anyone of her own status told her which might at the same time offend our views, in the same way that her manner of listening to our assertions pointed to her incredulity, so the tone she used to report (indirection enabling her to fling the most offensive insults at us with impunity) a cook's account of threatening her employers and forcing any number of concessions out of them by treating them like dirt in public, indicated that she treated the story as gospel truth. Françoise even went so far as to add: 'If I'd been the mistress, I'd have been very put out, I can tell you.' However much, despite our initial dislike of the lady on the fourth floor, we might shrug our shoulders at this unedifying tale as if it were an unlikely fable, its teller knew just how to invest her tone with all the trenchant punch of the most unshakeable and infuriating confidence in what she was saying.

But above all, just as writers, when their hands are tied by the tyranny of a monarch or of poetic convention, by the strict rules of prosody or state religion, often achieve a power of concentration they would not have done under a system of political freedom or literary anarchy, so Françoise, by not being free to respond to us in an explicit manner, spoke like Tiresias and would have written like Tacitus.[5] She knew how to contain everything she could not express directly in a sentence we could not denounce without casting aspersions on ourselves, in less than a sentence in fact, in a silence, in the way she placed an object.

For instance, whenever I inadvertently left on my table, among other letters, one which should have been kept from her eyes, because, say, it spoke about her in a malevolent way which suggested that the malevolence was shared by the recipient as well as the writer, the same evening, if I returned home with a feeling of uneasiness and went straight to my room, there on top of my letters, arranged in the right order in a neat pile, the compromising document would be the first thing to catch my eye as it could not have failed to catch the eye of Françoise, placed by her right on the top, almost separately, with a obviousness that was a form of speech with an eloquence all of its own which, as soon as I came into the room, startled me like a sudden shout. She excelled in setting up these stage effects, intended to provide the spectator, in her absence, with sufficient information to realize that she knew everything by the time she made her entry. Her art of making inanimate objects speak in this way had all the inspired diligence of Irving and Frédérick Lemaître.[6] In the present instance, holding over Albertine and myself the lighted lamp which missed none of the still visible dents in the quilt left by the girl's body, Françoise looked like Justice Shedding Light on Crime.[7] Albertine's face lost nothing in the lamp-light. It revealed on her cheeks the same sun-glazed surface I had found so attractive in Balbec. In the light of the lamp, this face of hers, which sometimes, out of doors, looked pallid and wan, now showed surfaces so glowingly and evenly coloured, so firm and so smooth, that they might have been compared to the sustained flesh tints of certain flowers. But Françoise's unexpected entry had startled me, and I cried out:

'What, the lamp already? Goodness, it's very bright!'

My intention might well have been in the second of these remarks to cover my confusion, and in the first to excuse the fact that I was late. Françoise replied with barbed ambiguity:

'Am I to snuff it "orf" then, sir?

– ' "Orf?" "Off" surely? She's the one who's "off" if you ask me…' Albertine whispered in my ear, leaving me charmed by the familiar quickness of mind with which, taking me at once for master and accomplice, she insinuated this psychological affirmation in the interrogative mood of a grammatical question.[8]

When Françoise had left the room and Albertine was seated once again on my bed, I said to her:

'What really worries me is that if we go on like this I may have to kiss you.

– What a lucky misfortune that would be.'

I did not respond at once to this invitation. Another person might even have found it superfluous, for Albertine's way of pronouncing her words was so carnal and so soft that her speech alone was like a kiss. A word from her lips was a favour, and her conversation smothered you in kisses. And yet her invitation was very gratifying. It would have been so, coming from any pretty girl of the same age; but that Albertine should now be so easily accessible to me gave me more than pleasure, it presented me with a series of images instilled with beauty. I remembered Albertine first of all against the sea-shore, almost painted upon a background of sea, no more real for me than those theatrical tableaux where it is not clear whether one is looking at the actress billed to appear, at an understudy who is standing in for her, or simply at a projection. Then the real woman had detached herself from the beam of light, come towards me, but only for me to perceive that in the real world she had none of the amorous accessibility she had seemed to possess in the magic tableau. I had learned that it was not possible to touch her, to kiss her, that all one could do was to talk to her, that for me she was no more a woman than a cluster of jade grapes, that inedible table decoration so fashionable at one time, are really grapes at all. And now she was appearing to me on a third level, real as in my second experience of her, but available as she had been in the first; available in a way that was all the more delicious for having imagined for so long that she was not. My surplus of knowledge about life (life less uniform, less simple than I had first imagined) inclined me provisionally towards agnosticism. What can one claim with any certainty, when the thing one thought probable at first has then turned out to be false and, in a third instance, to be true? (And alas, I was far from finished with my discoveries about Albertine.) In any case, even if there had not been the romantic attraction of this discovery of a greater wealth of planes revealed one after another by life (an attraction the opposite of the one experienced by Saint-Loup during the dinners in Rivebelle when he recognized, beneath the masks which life had superimposed on a calm face, features to which his lips had once been pressed), the knowledge that to kiss Albertine's cheeks was something possible gave me perhaps greater pleasure than the fact of kissing them. What a difference there is between possessing a woman with one's body alone, because she is no more than a piece of flesh, and possessing the girl one used to see on the beach with her friends on certain days, without even knowing why it was on those days and not on others, so that one trembled to think one might not see her again. Life had been so kind as to reveal the whole extent of this young girl's life, had lent first one optical instrument, then another, to see her with and then added to carnal desire the accompaniment, multiplying and diversifying it, of other desires, more spiritual and less easily satisfied, which lie inert and unaffected when it is merely a question of the conquest of a piece of flesh, but which, when they want to gain possession of a whole field of memories from which they have felt nostalgically exiled, surge up wildly around carnal desire, extend it, are unable to follow it to the fulfilment, the assimilation, impossible in the form in which it is sought, of an immaterial reality, but wait for this desire half-way and, the moment the memory of it returns, are there to escort it once more; to kiss, not the cheeks of the first woman who comes along – anonymous, devoid of mystery and glamour, however cool and fresh those cheeks may be – but those of which I had so long been dreaming, would be to know the taste, the savour, of a colour I had so often contemplated. One sees a woman, a mere image in life's scene, like Albertine silhouetted against the sea, and then it becomes possible to detach that image, bring it close, and gradually to observe its volume, its colours, as though it had been placed behind the lenses of a stereoscope. For this reason, women who tend to be resistant and cannot be possessed at once, of whom indeed it is not immediately clear that they can ever be possessed at all, are the only interesting ones. For to know them, to approach them, to conquer them, is to make the human image vary in shape, in size, in relief, a lesson in relativity in the appreciation of a woman's body, a joy to see anew when it has regained its slender outline against the back-drop of reality. Women who are first encountered in a brothel are of no interest because they remain static.

There was also the fact that Albertine held in an unbroken ring around her all the impressions of a series of sea-scapes that were particularly dear to me. I felt that kissing this girl's cheeks I should be kissing the whole Balbec sea-shore.

'If you're really going to let me kiss you, I'd rather reserve it for the right moment. Only you mustn't forget that you've said I may. I want a voucher: "Valid for one kiss."

– Do I have to sign it?

– But if I took it now, should I have another one for later?

– You do make me laugh with your vouchers. I shall issue a new one every now and then.

– One more thing. You know, in Balbec, before I got to know you, you used to have a hard, canny look. You couldn't tell me what you were thinking about when you looked like that?

– No, I don't remember at all.

– Well, this may remind you. One day your friend Gisèle jumped with her feet together over the chair an old gentleman was sitting in. Can you remember what was in your mind at that moment?

– Gisèle was the one we saw least of. She was part of the gang in a way, but not really. I was probably thinking how common and bad-mannered she was.

– Oh, is that all?'

I should really have liked, before kissing her, to have been able to re-create in her the mystery she had held for me on the beach before I knew her, to discover in her the place where she had lived before that; in default of such mystery, I could at least insinuate all the memories of the time we had spent in Balbec, the sound of the waves breaking beneath my window, the shouts of the children. But as I let my gaze wander over the lovely pink globe of her cheeks, whose gently curving surfaces merged into the first low folds of her beautiful black hair which ran in animated ridges, rose into steep foothills and moulded the hollows and slopes of its valleys, I could not help saying to myself: 'Now at last, after failing in Balbec, I am going to discover the taste of the unknown rose in Albertine's cheeks. And since the circles through which we are able to make things and people pass in the course of our existence are not that numerous, perhaps I shall be able to consider my own in some sense fulfilled when I have taken the blossoming face to which I had given pride of place out of its distant setting, brought it on to this new plane and at last have knowledge of it through the lips.' I told myself this because I believed there was such a thing as knowledge through the lips; I told myself that I was going to know the taste of this bodily rose, because it had not occurred to me that man, a creature clearly less rudimentary than the sea-urchin or even the whale, nevertheless lacks a certain number of essential organs, and notably possesses none that will serve for kissing. For this absent organ he substitutes his lips, and thus perhaps manages to achieve a more satisfactory result than if he were reduced to caressing the beloved with a horny tusk. But the lips, designed to bring to the palate the taste that lures them, have to be content, without understanding their mistake or admitting their disappointment, with drifting over the surface and coming up against the barrier of the cheek's desirable impenetrability. And at the moment of actual contact with the flesh, the lips, even supposing they might become more expert and talented, would doubtless be unable to enjoy any more fully the flavour which nature prevents them grasping spontaneously, for in the desolate zone in which they are unable to find their rightful nourishment they are alone, long since abandoned by the eyes and then the nose in turn. For a start, as my mouth began to move towards the cheeks my eyes had led it to want to kiss, my eyes changed position and saw different cheeks; the neck, observed at closer range and as if through a magnifying glass, became coarse-grained and showed a sturdiness which altered the character of the face.

Apart from the latest developments in photography – which lay down at the foot of a cathedral all the houses that so often, from close to, seemed to us to be as high as towers, which deploy like a regiment, in file, in organized dispersion, in serried masses, the same monuments, bring together the two columns on the Piazzetta that were so far apart a while back, distance the nearby Salute and, on a pale and lifeless background, manage to contain an immense horizon beneath the arch of a bridge, in a single window-frame, between the leaves of a tree in the foreground that is more vigorous in tone, frame a single church successively in the arcades of all the others – I know of nothing that is able, to the same degree as a kiss, to conjure up from what we believed to be something with one definite aspect, the hundred other things it may equally well be, since each is related to a no less valid perspective. In short, just as in Balbec Albertine had often seemed different to me, now, as if, by magically accelerating the speed of the changes of perspective and colouring a person offers us in the course of our various encounters, I had tried to contain them all within the space of a few seconds in order to re-create experimentally the phenomenon which diversifies a person's individuality and to draw out separately, as from a slip-case, all the possibilities it contains – now what I saw, in the brief trajectory of my lips towards her cheek, was ten Albertines; because this one girl was like a many-headed goddess, the head I had seen last, when I tried to draw near, gave way to another. As long as I had not touched it, I could at least see this head, and a faint perfume came to me from it. But alas – for when we kiss our nostrils and eyes are as ill-placed as our lips are ill-made – suddenly, my eyes ceased to see, and my nose in turn, crushed against her cheek, no longer smelled anything, so, without my efforts bringing me any clearer notion of the taste of the rose I desired, I discovered, from these abominable signs, that I was finally in the process of kissing Albertine's cheek.

Was it because we were playing out a reversal of our scene together in Balbec (figured by the rotation of a solid body), because I was the one lying in bed and she the one who was not, in a good position to evade a rough pass and to control how far things went, that she now allowed me to take so easily what she had formerly refused with such a stern look? (Doubtless from that earlier look the voluptuous expression her face assumed now as my lips approached it differed only by an infinitesimal deviation of its lines, but one which can accommodate all the difference there is between putting an end to a wounded man's life or nursing his wounds, between a sublime portrait and a grotesque one.) Not knowing whether I had to give credit and owed gratitude for this change of attitude to some benefactor who, in these last months, in Paris or in Balbec, had been unwittingly working on my behalf, I mainly attributed it to the present positioning of our bodies. But Albertine provided me with another explanation; precisely this: 'Oh, well, when we were in Balbec, I didn't really know you. For all I could tell, you might have had wicked designs on me.' This explanation left me perplexed. No doubt Albertine was being sincere. It is by no means easy for a woman to recognize in the movements of her limbs, in the sensations experienced by her body, during a close conversation with a male friend, the unknown sin she trembled to think a stranger might be planning for her downfall!

At all events, whatever changes might have occurred recently in Albertine's life (and might possibly have explained why she should have so easily granted to my momentary and purely physical desire what she had refused with horror to my love when we were in Balbec), an even more startling one became apparent that very evening, as soon as her caresses had satisfied me in a way she could not have failed to notice and which I had even feared might provoke her to the slight gesture of revulsion and offended modesty Gilberte had made in similar circumstances behind the laurel bushes in the Champs-Élysées.

The exact opposite happened. Already, when I had made her lie on my bed and begun to fondle her, Albertine had adopted an expression, unfamiliar to me on her part, of docile compliance, of almost childish simplicity. By effacing all her customary preoccupations and pretensions, the moment preceding sexual pleasure, similar in this respect to the moment that follows death, had restored her rejuvenated features to something like the innocence of earliest childhood. And perhaps everyone whose particular talent is brought into play becomes modest, intent and charming; especially if such talent gives us great pleasure, makes the giver happy and anxious that we should enjoy it to the full. But this new expression on Albertine's face contained more than disinterestedness, professional diligence and generosity, there was a kind of onrush of anticipated involvement; and she had gone back further than to her own childhood; she had returned to the early days of her race. Whereas I had looked for nothing more than physical relief, and finally secured it, Albertine seemed to feel that it would be somehow coarse of her to think that this physical pleasure could be devoid of moral sense or conclusive in itself. And when I reminded her of her dinner, she, who had been in so great a hurry earlier on, now, doubtless because she felt that kissing implied love and that love was the most important commitment there is, remarked:

'Oh, it really doesn't matter. I've got plenty of time.'

She seemed embarrassed by the idea of getting up and going after what had just happened, embarrassed out of a sense of acceptable behaviour, just as Françoise, without feeling thirsty, had felt bound to accept with polite cheerfulness the glass of wine that Jupien offered her and would never have dared just to drink up and go, however urgent the call of duty. Albertine – and this was perhaps, with another which will be clear in due course, one of the reasons which had made me unconsciously desire her – was one of the incarnations of the charming little French country-girl typified in stone in Saint-André-des-Champs. I recognized in her, as I did in Françoise, who was soon none the less to become her deadly enemy, a courtesy towards host and stranger, a sense of propriety, a respectful bedside manner.

In the months preceding her daughter's marriage, Françoise, who after the death of my aunt felt obliged to speak only in tones of lamentation, would have felt shocked if the young woman had not taken her fiancé's arm when the two of them walked out together. Albertine, lying motionless beside me, said:

'What nice hair you have, what nice eyes. You're sweet.'

I pointed out to her that it was getting late, and when I added: 'You don't believe me?', she replied, in words that were perhaps true, but only since a couple of minutes ago and for the next few hours:

'I always believe you.'

She spoke about myself, my family, my social background. 'Oh, I know your parents know some very nice people,' she said. 'You're a friend of Robert Forestier and Suzanne Delage.' For a minute these names meant absolutely nothing to me. Then suddenly I remembered that I did once use to play with Robert Forestier in the Champs-Élysées and had never seen him since. As for Suzanne Delage, she was the great-niece of Mme Blandais, and I had once been meant to go to a dancing-lesson, and even to play a small part in theatricals at her parents' house. But the fear of having a giggling bout or a nose-bleed had prevented me, so that in fact I had never set eyes on her. At the very most I had some notion that I had once heard that the Swanns' feather-hatted governess had been with the Delages at one time, but perhaps it was her sister or some friend. I protested to Albertine that Robert Forestier and Suzanne Delage occupied a very small place in my life. 'That may well be, but your mothers are close friends and that helps to place you. I often run into Suzanne Delage in the avenue de Messine. She has a lot of style.' Our mothers were acquainted only in the imagination of Mme Bontemps, who had learned that I had once been a playmate of Robert Forestier, to whom, it appeared, I used to recite poetry, and had concluded from this that we were bound by family ties. I have been told that the mere mention of my mother's name was enough for her to come out with: 'Oh yes, she moves with people like the Delages, the Forestiers… ', awarding my parents high marks they had done nothing to deserve.

Quite apart from all this, Albertine entertained some extremely silly social notions. She classed the Simonnets with a double n as inferior not only to those with a single n but to everyone else in the world. That someone else should be called by the same name as yourself and not belong to your family, is ample reason for despising him. Of course there are exceptions. It may happen that two Simonnets (introduced to each other on the sort of social occasion when people experience the urge to talk, about no matter what, and feel particularly well-disposed towards each other, for instance in a funeral procession on its way to the cemetery), finding they have the same name, will seek, with mutual good-will and to no effect, to discover some evidence of kinship. But that is only an exception. There are plenty of dishonourable men in the world, but we neither know nor care. Yet if a similarity of names causes letters addressed to them to be dropped through our letter-box, or vice versa, we start to feel mistrust, often justified, as to their moral worth. We are afraid of being confused with them and forestall possible confusion with a scowl of disgust when anyone mentions them to us. When we read our own name, as borne by them, in the newspaper, they seem to have usurped it. The misdemeanours of other members of the social body are a matter of indifference to us. It is our namesakes we make to bear the brunt for them. The hatred we channel towards the other Simonnets is all the more intense for not being personal but hereditarily transmitted. Two generations pass and we remember only the scowl of disgust our grandparents kept for the other Simonnets; we know nothing of the reason behind it; it would come as no surprise to learn that the whole thing had begun with a murder. Until the day comes – and it is by no means unheard of – when a male Simonnet and a female Simonnet who are in no way related bring matters to a close by getting married.

Not only did Albertine speak to me about Robert Forestier and Suzanne Delage, but quite spontaneously, with the urge to confide induced by the proximity of two bodies, initially at least, during a first phase before it has engendered a special duplicity and secrecy in one party towards the other, she told me a story about her family and one of Andrée's uncles, which in Balbec she had refused to divulge at all; but now she felt she ought not to appear to have any secrets from me. At present, had her dearest friend said anything against me, she would have felt duty-bound to repeat it to me. I insisted she go home, and she eventually did so, but she was so discomfited on my account by my lack of courtesy that she laughed almost as though she were apologizing for me, like a hostess who has admitted an improperly dressed guest but has her qualms about it.

'Why are you laughing? I asked.

– I'm not laughing, I'm smiling at you, she replied affectionately. When shall I see you again?' she added in a way that suggested she did not regard what we had just done (generally the crowning moment) as even the prelude to a great affection, a pre-existent affection we owed it to ourselves to discover, to confess, and which alone could account for what we had just indulged in.

'Since you give your permission, I'll send word for you to come when I can.'

I dared not let her know that I was putting the chance of seeing Mme de Stermaria before everything else.

'It will have to be on the spur of the moment, I'm afraid. I never know beforehand. Would it be possible to send round for you on the evenings I'm free?

– It will be quite possible shortly, because I shall have my own entrance at my aunt's. But for the moment it's not. Anyway, I'll just come round on the off-chance tomorrow or the day after in the afternoon. You needn't see me if you're busy.'

When she got to the door, surprised that I had not gone to open it for her, she offered me her cheek, now that she felt there was no need for any gross physical desire to make us kiss. Since our brief pass a while back was the sort of thing that is sometimes induced by deep intimacy and heartfelt choice, Albertine had felt it her duty to improvise and add temporarily to the kisses we had exchanged on my bed the emotion which such kisses would symbolize for a knight and his lady in the songs of a Gothic jongleur.

After the departure of this young Picarde, who might have been a figurine carved on the porch of Saint-André-des-Champs by its sculptor, Françoise came and handed me a letter which filled me with joy, for it was from Mme de Stermaria, accepting to dine with me on Wednesday. From Mme de Stermaria, that is, for me, not so much from the real Mme de Stermaria as from the one who had been on my mind all day before Albertine's arrival. It is the wicked deception of love that it begins by making us dwell not upon a woman in the outside world but upon a doll inside our head, the only woman who is always available in fact, the only one we shall ever possess, whom the arbitrary nature of memory, almost as absolute as that of the imagination, may have made as different from the real woman as the real Balbec had been from the Balbec I imagined; a dummy creation which little by little, to our own detriment, we shall force the real woman to resemble.

Albertine had made me so late that the play had just finished when I arrived at Mme de Villeparisis's; and since I had little desire to get caught up in the stream of guests who were pouring out of the room discussing what was on everyone's mind – the separation, said to be already effected, between the Duc de Guermantes and the Duchesse – I had occupied a vacant wing chair in the outer room to wait for an opportunity of greeting my hostess, when from the main salon, where she had doubtless been sitting in the front row, I saw emerging, majestic, fully swathed and drawn to her full height in a long gown of yellow satin with huge black poppies stitched on to it in relief, no less a person than the Duchesse herself. To catch sight of her no longer disturbed me in the least. There had been a day when, placing her hands on my forehead (as she did when she was afraid of hurting my feelings) and saying: 'These outings you make in the hope of meeting Mme de Guermantes have to stop. You're getting quite a reputation for yourself. Besides, you can see how ill your grandmother is. You have more serious things to think about than to hang round after a woman who couldn't care less about you anyway,' instantaneously, like a hypnotist returning you from the distant country you thought you were in and opening your eyes, or like a doctor recalling you to a sense of duty and reality and curing you of the imaginary disease in which you had been wallowing, my mother had woken me up from a dream that had gone on for too long. The rest of the day had been devoted to a final farewell to this disease I was renouncing; I had sung the words of Schubert's 'Lebewohl' for hours on end and with tears in my eyes:

'Farewell, strange voices call thee,
Sweet sister of the angels, far from me.'

And then it was over. I had given up my morning walks, and with so little effort that my prognosis, which we shall see was to turn out to be false, led me to believe that it would be easy for me, in the course of my life, to give up seeing a woman. And then, after Françoise had told me that Jupien, who was eager to find larger premises, was looking out for a shop in the neighbourhood, anxious to try and find one for him (and quite happy too – while ambling along the street I had already heard from my bed in luminous clamour like a beach – to see behind the raised iron shutters of their shops the young dairy-women in their white sleeves), I had reason to start taking these morning walks again. And quite uninhibitedly this time; for I was aware that I was no longer going out to catch a glimpse of Mme de Guermantes; I was rather like a woman who takes infinite precautions as long as she has a lover and, from the day she breaks with him, leaves his letters lying about the place, at the risk of disclosing to her husband a guilty secret which ceased to alarm her the minute she ceased to harbour it.

What it hurt me to see was that there were unhappy people in almost every house I passed. In one the wife was always in tears because her husband was unfaithful. In the next it was the reverse. In another a hardworking mother, beaten up by her drunkard son, tried to conceal her misery from the eyes of the neighbours. Half of humanity spent its life in tears. And when I was better acquainted with it, so exasperating did I find it that I wondered whether the people in the right might not be the adulterous husband and wife, who were unfaithful only because their rightful happiness had been denied them and who behaved in a charming and loyal way to everyone but their own partner. After a while I no longer even had the excuse of helping Jupien to take me on my morning peregrinations. For news circulated that the cabinet-maker in our courtyard, whose workrooms were separated from Jupien's shop only by the thinnest of partitions, was about to be given notice by the agent because his hammering made too much noise. Jupien could have hoped for nothing better; the workrooms had a basement for storing timber, which adjoined our cellars. He would keep his coal there and knock down the partition to make one big shop. One further related detail: since Jupien, who found that M. de Guermantes was asking an exorbitant rent and let people be shown over the premises in the hope that the Duc, discouraged by his failure to find a tenant, would come round to reducing the rental for him, Françoise, after noticing that the concierge left the door of the shop with the 'To Let' sign on the latch well past the usual hours for showing people around, scented a trap laid by him to lure the fiancée of the Guermantes footman (the couple would find a lovers' hideaway there) and to catch the pair out.

However that might be, and although I no longer had any need to search for premises for Jupien, I continued to go out for walks before lunch. In the course of them, I would often encounter M. de Norpois. And he was often quite capable, as he conversed with a colleague, of inspecting me from top to toe and then looking back towards his interlocutor without so much as a smile in my direction or any more sign of acknowledgement than if he had never set eyes on me before. For as far as these important diplomats are concerned, to look at you in a certain way is intended to convey to you not that they have seen you but that they have not, and that they have some serious matter to discuss with their colleague. A tall woman I often ran into near the house was less discreet. For although I did not know her, she would turn round after me, linger – to no avail – in shop windows, smile as though she were going to kiss me, make suggestive gestures of availability. All this turned to ice the moment she encountered anyone she knew. For a long time now on these morning errands, depending on what I had to do, even if it was merely buying a newspaper, I had taken the most direct route, with no regret if it lay outside the usual ambit of the Duchesse's walks, and if on the contrary our paths coincided, I felt no sense of misgiving or dissimulation, because this no longer seemed to me to be the forbidden path on which I wrenched from an unwelcoming woman the favour of setting eyes on her against her will. But it had never entered my mind that my recovery, by restoring me to a normal attitude towards Mme de Guermantes, would effect a similar change in her and open up the possibility of a friendliness, even a friendship, which I no longer cared about. Up to this point, the joint efforts of the whole world to bring me into contact with her would have come to nothing in the face of the evil fate projected by unrequited love. Fairies more powerful than humans have decreed that in such cases there is nothing to be done until the day our hearts sincerely utter the magic words: 'I am no longer in love.' I had resented the fact that Saint-Loup had not taken me to see his aunt. But he was no more capable than anyone else of breaking a spell. So long as I was in love with Mme de Guermantes, I was pained by the marks of affection, the compliments I received from others, not just because they did not come from her but because they never reached her ears. And had she known of them, it would not have made an ounce of difference. Yet if attachment is involved, even the slightest details, an absence, declining a dinner invitation, an unintentional, unconscious stiffening of behaviour make more difference than all the cosmetics and fine clothes in the world. More people would climb the social ladder if these things were taught as part of the art of social success.

As she crossed the room in which I was sitting, her mind intent on memories of friends I did not know and whom she would perhaps be seeing again in a while at another party, Mme de Guermantes caught sight of me in my wing chair, truly indifferent and seeking only to be polite, whereas before, while I was in love, I had tried so hard, and without success, to appear indifferent; she left the stream of guests, came over to address me, with the same smile she had worn that evening at the Opéra, which the painful feeling of being the object of a love she did not return was no longer there to efface:

'No, don't move. You don't mind if I sit down with you for a moment?' she said as she gracefully gathered up the folds of her immense skirt which would otherwise have occupied the whole chair.

She was taller than I and made even bigger by the bulk of her dress, and I found myself almost touching her lovely bare arm, on which an almost invisible ubiquitous down seemed to create a perpetual golden rising haze, and the blond coils of her hair as I caught their scent. With scarcely any room to sit down, she could not easily turn to face me and, obliged to look straight in front of her rather than at me, she assumed the dreamy, soft expression you see in portraits.

'Have you any news of Robert?' she asked.

At that moment Mme de Villeparisis passed by us.

'Well, what a fine time to arrive when for once we do see you here!'

And noticing that I was in conversation with her niece, and imagining perhaps that we were more intimate than she had realized:

‘But don’t let me interrupt your conversation with Oriane, she added (for the good offices of a procuress are among the duties of a hostess). You wouldn’t care to dine with her here on Wednesday?’

This was the day on which I was to dine with Mme de Stermaria, and I declined.

‘Saturday then?’

Since my mother was returning on Saturday or Sunday, it would have been rather tactless not to stay at home and dine with her in the evening. So I declined again.

‘Ah, you’re not an easy person to invite.’

‘Why do you never come and see me?’ said Mme de Guermantes when Mme de Villeparisis had moved off to congratulate the performers and present the leading lady with a bouquet of roses whose value lay entirely in the hand that offered it, given that it had cost only twenty francs. (This, by the way, was as high as she was prepared to go when an artist had performed only once. Those who gave their services at all her afternoon and evening receptions received roses painted by the Marquise.) ‘It’s so tedious never to meet except in other people’s houses. Since you won’t dine with me at my aunt’s, why don’t you come and dine with me at home?’

Various people who had lingered on to the last possible moment on some pretext or other but were now on their way out, seeing that the Duchesse had sat down to talk to a young man on a seat so narrow that there was only room for two people, thought they had been misinformed, and that it was not the Duchesse but the Duc who was seeking a separation, on my account, at which point they lost no time in making the fact known. I was in a better position than anyone to know how false it was. But it none the less surprised me that in one of those awkward periods when a separation is in process but not yet finalized, the Duchesse, instead of withdrawing from social life, should actually choose to invite someone who was a comparative stranger. It crossed my mind that it was the Duc alone who had resisted her having me in the house and that, now he was leaving her, she saw no further reason why she should not surround herself with the people she liked.

Two minutes earlier I should had been dumbfounded had anyone told me that Mme de Guermantes was going to invite me to visit her, let alone dine with her. It was one thing to realize that the Guermantes salon was incapable of providing the special qualities I had extracted from the name, but the fact that I had been forbidden entry, by obliging me to see it as we see the salons described in a novel or pictured in a dream, made me imagine it, even when I felt sure it was just like any other, as something quite different; between myself and it stood the dividing-line at which reality ends. To dine with the Guermantes was to undertake a journey long hoped for, to make a desire pass from my head and appear before my eyes, and to become acquainted with a dream. It might well have occurred to me to think that the dinner in question was one of those dinners to which the hosts invite someone with the words: ‘Do come. There’ll be absolutely no one but ourselves, I promise you,’ thus deceitfully attributing to the pariah their own fear of his mixing with their friends and even seeking to transform into an enviable privilege, exclusively reserved for their closest friends, the quarantine they have imposed on the ostracized man, who becomes both unfit for society and favoured without any choice in the matter. I felt on the contrary that Mme de Guermantes was anxious for me to sample the choicest she had to offer when she went on to ask me, presenting me with something like the prospect of the purplish delight of a visit to Fabrice’s aunt and the miracle of an introduction to Count Mosca:[9]

‘Do you happen to be free on Friday, for a small dinner-party? It would be so nice. There’ll be the Princess of Parma, such a charming person. Not that I’d invite you to meet people who were anything other than agreeable.’

Cast off by the intermediate social world in its perpetual rise to betterment, the family still plays an important part in more static milieux like the lower middle classes or the princely aristocracy, incapable of rising higher because above it, from its own special point of view, there is nothing more. The friendship shown me by her ‘aunt Villeparisis’ and by Robert had perhaps made me, for Mme de Guermantes and her friends, who fed on their own company and frequented the same little circle, an object of their curious scrutiny, quite unbeknown to myself.

Her relations with these two relatives had a homely familiarity about them, daily and down-to-earth, very different from the sort of thing we imagine, relations in which, if we happen to be included, our actions, far from being ejected from the picture like a speck of dust from the eye or a drop of water from the windpipe, may remain engraved, and will still be recounted and commented upon years after we ourselves have forgotten them, in the palace in which we are amazed to find them preserved like a letter in our own hand among a priceless collection of autographs.

Merely fashionable people may have to defend their doors from excessive invasion. But the Guermantes door had no need of that. Hardly ever did an outsider have occasion to present himself at it. On the rare occasions the Duchesse had one pointed out to her she would never have dreamed of bothering about the social credit he might bring, since this was something she conferred and could not receive. She thought only of his real qualities. Mme de Villeparisis and Saint-Loup had assured her of mine. And no doubt she would not have believed them had she not also observed that they could never manage to secure my presence when they wanted it, that I therefore attached no importance to society, which seemed to the Duchesse a sign that an outsider was to be ranked with people she thought of as ‘agreeable’.

It was quite a picture, in the course of conversation about women for whom she did not care, to see the way her face changed at the mention, in connection with one of these, of, say, her sister-in-law. ‘Oh, she’s charming,’ she would say with discriminating assurance. The only reason she advanced for this statement was that the lady in question had refused to be introduced to the Marquise de Chaussegros and the Princesse de Silistrie. What she did not add was that the lady had refused to be introduced to herself, the Duchesse de Guermantes. This was nevertheless what had happened, and ever since the Duchesse’s mind had been busy trying to fathom the motives of this lady who was so choosy about her acquaintances. She was dying to be invited to her house. Society people are so used to being sought after that anyone who shuns them becomes a rare bird and monopolizes their attention.

Was Mme de Guermantes’s true motive for inviting me (now that I was no longer in love with her) that I did not seek out the society of her relatives, however much they sought after my own? I have no idea. At all events, once she had decided to invite me, she was anxious to do me the full honours of her establishment and to keep away any of her friends whose company might have discouraged me from further visits, the friends she knew to be boring. I had been at a loss to account for the Duchesse’s change of direction, when I had seen her deviate from her path among the stars, come to sit down beside me and invite me to dinner; it was swayed by causes unknown to me. For want of any special sense of guidance in these matters, we imagine that the people we know only slightly – as I knew the Duchesse – think of us only on the rare occasions they see us. Yet this mental oblivion in which we deem ourselves to be held is purely arbitrary. So much so in fact, that, while we inhabit the silence of solitude, which is like the silence of a clear night sky, imagining the various queens of society pursuing their course in the heavens at an infinite distance from us, we are unable to resist a sudden start of alarm or delight if there falls upon us from on high, like an aerolith engraved with our name, which we thought was unknown on Venus or Cassiopeia, an invitation to dinner or a snippet of wicked gossip.

Perhaps there had been times when, following the example of the Persian princes who, according to the Book of Esther, had the books of records read out to them in which were inscribed the names of certain subjects who had shown zeal in their service, Mme de Guermantes had consulted her list of worthy people and stopped at my name with the words: ‘He’s someone we ought to ask to dine with us at some point.’ But other thoughts had distracted her until the moment she had caught sight of me sitting there alone like Mordecai at the palace gate; and once the sight of me had refreshed her memory, she wished, like Ahasuerus, to lavish her gifts upon me.[10]

(De soins tumultueux un prince environné Vers de nouveaux objets est sans cesse entraîné.)

But I have to say that an utterly different sort of surprise was in store for me after the one I had experienced when Mme de Guermantes issued her invitation. Since I had felt it would be more modest of me, and more grateful also, not to conceal this initial surprise but rather to exaggerate the joy it gave me, Mme de Guermantes, who was getting ready to move on to her last party of the evening, had said to me, almost as a justification and for fear that I might not be altogether certain who she was, given my apparent astonishment at her invitation: 'You know I'm the aunt of Robert de Saint-Loup who is so fond of you, and we've already met each other here, of course.' Replying to this in the affirmative, I added that I also knew M. de Charlus, 'who had been very kind to me in Balbec and in Paris'. Mme de Guermantes reacted with great surprise and her eyes seemed to revert, for verification of my words, to some much earlier page of her internal register. 'I see, so you know Palamède, do you?' This name sounded very sweet coming from the lips of Mme de Guermantes, because of the instinctive simplicity with which she spoke of a man who was so brilliant a figure in the eyes of the world, but for her was no more than her brother-in-law and the cousin with whom she had grown up. Into the indistinct greyness which the life of the Duchesse de Guermantes represented for me, the name Palamède introduced something like the brightness of the long summer days she had spent playing with him as a girl in the garden at Guermantes. Moreover, in this long-distant period of their lives, Oriane de Guermantes and her cousin Palamède had been very different from what they had since become; particularly M. de Charlus, who had indulged to the full in the artistic tastes he had so carefully curbed in later life that I was amazed to learn that it was he who had painted the huge fan decorated with black and yellow irises the Duchesse was now unfolding. She could also have shown me a little sonatina he had once composed for her. I was completely unaware of all these talents, which the Baron never mentioned. Let it be said in passing that M. de Charlus did not at all relish being called Palamède by his family. One could certainly understand why its short form 'Mémé' might displease him. Such silly abbreviations are a sign of the aristocracy's inability to appreciate its own poetry (and the same thing is true of Jewry: Lady Rufus Israels's nephew Moses was commonly referred to as 'Momo') as well as its concern not be seen attaching importance to anything aristocratic. Now in this matter of poetry M. de Charlus had more imagination and a more blatant sense of pride. But this was not the reason he so disliked 'Mémé', since he also disliked the handsome name Palamède. The truth was that, considering himself, knowing himself, to be from a princely family, he would have liked his brother and sister-in-law to address him as 'Charlus', just as Queen Marie-Amélie or the Duc d'Orléans might speak of their sons and grandsons, nephews and brothers as 'Joinville, Nemours, Chartres, Paris'.

'What a dark horse that Mémé is!' she exclaimed. 'We spent hours talking to him about you, and he told us that he would be delighted to make your acquaintance, as if he'd never met you in his life. You must admit he's odd, and – though it's not very nice of me to say such a thing about a brother-in-law I'm very fond of and admire immensely – a little bit mad at times.'

I was particularly struck with the word 'mad' used of M. de Charlus and it occurred to me that this semi-madness might perhaps account for certain things, like his apparent delight at the idea of asking Bloch to beat his own mother. I came to the conclusion, not only from the things he said but from the way he said them, that M. de Charlus must be a trifle mad. The first experience of hearing a barrister or an actor speaking is striking because the tone is so different from conversation. But because everyone else seems to find this quite natural, you say nothing about it, to them or to yourself, and concentrate instead on the degree of skill involved. The very most one might think, of an actor at the Théâtre-Français, is: 'Why, instead of letting his raised arm fall naturally, did he take ten minutes to bring it down in a staccato movement broken by pauses?' or of a Labori:[11] 'Why, the minute he opened his mouth, did he use those tragic, unexpected sounds to say the simplest things?' But since everyone takes these things for granted, they come as no shock. In the same way, on reflection, M. de Charlus spoke of himself very grandiloquently, in a tone which had nothing to do with ordinary speech. It felt as if he constantly needed to be told: 'But why are you shouting so loud? Why are you so brazen about yourself?' Yet everyone seemed to be in tacit agreement that things were perfectly all right as they were. So you got caught up in a circle of people who danced to the tune of his inflated manner of speaking. But certainly there were moments when a stranger might have thought he was listening to a raving lunatic. 'But,' the Duchesse continued with the hint of effrontery that stemmed from her characteristic directness, 'are you absolutely sure you're not thinking of someone else? Can you really be talking about my brother-in-law Palamède? I know he loves mystery, but this seems to be taking things a bit far, I must say!…'

I replied that I was absolutely sure and that M. de Charlus must have misheard my name.

'Oh well, I must be leaving you, said Mme de Guermantes with what sounded like regret. I have to look in on the Princesse de Ligne for a moment. You're not going on there? No? You don't care for society? You're quite right, it's too tedious for words. Would that I didn't have to go! But she's my cousin, it would be rude. I'm sorry for my own sake, quite selfishly, because I could have taken you and even brought you back afterwards. Well, good-bye then. I can't tell you how much I'm looking forward to Friday.'

That M. de Charlus should have blushed to be seen in my company by M. d'Argencourt was one thing. But that to his own sister-in-law, and a woman who had such a high opinion of him, he should deny all acquaintance with me, acquaintance that would have been quite natural since I knew both his aunt and his nephew, was beyond my comprehension.

I shall close this episode by remarking that from one point of view there was something of true grandeur about Mme de Guermantes in that she had the capacity to efface utterly from her memory the things that other people would have only partially forgotten. Even if she had never experienced me pestering her, following her, tracking her down on her morning walks, if she had never had to acknowledge my daily greeting with riled impatience, or to send Saint-Loup packing when he begged her to invite me, she could not have behaved towards me with more gracious and natural charm. Not only did she waste no time on post-mortems, hints, meaningful smiles and innuendoes, not only did her present affability, by not dwelling on the past or showing the least reticence, have something as proudly upright about it as her own majestic stature, but the grudges she might have borne anyone in the past were so completely reduced to ashes, and the ashes were themselves cast so far from her memory or at least from her behaviour, that to look at her face, whenever she needed to treat with the most admirable simplicity what for so many people would have been a pretext for rekindling smouldering resentments and recriminations, was to experience something like a process of purification.

But if I was surprised by the change which had occurred in her attitude towards me, how much more did it surprise me to discover the even greater change in my feeling towards her! Had there not been a time when I could remuster life and strength only if, in my endless invention of new strategies, I could find someone to secure me an invitation from her and, after this initial boon, to procure many others for my increasingly demanding emotions? It was the impossibility of any advance in this direction that had made me leave for Doncières to visit Saint-Loup. And now, strangely enough, it was through the effects of a letter from him that I was agitated, but this time on account not of Mme de Guermantes, but of Mme de Stermaria.

Let me add, as a final word in my account of this evening, that something happened in the course of it, which was denied a few days later but which really startled me at the time, caused a short rift between myself and Bloch, and which in itself constitutes one of those curious anomalies which will be explained at the end of this volume (Sodome I).[12] At this evening party at Mme de Villeparisis's, Bloch kept on boasting to me about the friendly manner shown him by M. de Charlus, the which Charlus, when he passed him in the street, looked him straight in the face as though he recognized him, was anxious to make his acquaintance, knew very well who he was. This made me smile at first, because Bloch had expressed himself so vehemently in Balbec on the subject of the very same M. de Charlus. And I merely concluded that Bloch, like his father in regard to Bergotte, knew the Baron 'without actually knowing him'. What he had taken for a friendly glance was in fact an absent-minded one. But in the end Bloch gave so many precise details and seemed so sure that on two or three occasions M. de Charlus had wished to address him that, remembering I had spoken about my friend to the Baron, who had asked me various questions about him as we were walking away together from Mme de Villeparisis's in fact, I assumed that Bloch was not lying, that M. de Charlus had heard his name, realized that he was my friend, and so on. And so, some time later, at the theatre, I asked M. de Charlus if I might introduce Bloch to him, and when he assented, I went off in search of my friend. But the minute M. de Charlus set eyes on him, a look of astonishment appeared on his face, where it was instantly repressed to become one of blazing fury. Not only did he not offer Bloch his hand, but whenever Bloch addressed him he replied in the most insolent manner, in a peevish and hurtful tone of voice. So that Bloch, to whom, from what he had said, the Baron had been all smiles until then, was under the impression that I had spoken ill of him rather than recommended him during the brief conversation which, knowing M. de Charlus's liking for etiquette, I had had with him about my friend before I introduced the two of them. Bloch left us, worn down by his efforts, like someone who has been trying to mount a horse which is constantly on the point of taking the bit between its teeth, or to swim against waves that continually fling him back on the shingle, and did not speak to me again for six months.

There was nothing delightful about the days preceding my dinner engagement with Mme de Stermaria; I found them unbearable. For, as a general rule, the shorter the time that separates us from the project we have in mind the longer it seems, because we measure it on a more reduced scale or simply because of the fact that we even bother to measure it. The papacy, we are told, measures time by the century and may in fact not think to measure it at all, since its goal is eternity. My own being no more than three days in front of me, I counted the seconds, I indulged in the fantasies that are the mere beginnings of caresses, caresses filled with the frustration of not being able to have the woman herself there to respond (precisely those caresses, and no others). And in the end, if it is true that in general the difficulty of attaining the object of desire increases that desire (the difficulty, not the impossibility, for that suppresses it entirely), then with a desire that is purely physical, the certainty that it will be realized at a definite point on the horizon is hardly less of a stimulant than uncertainty; almost as much as the anxiety of doubt, the absence of doubt makes waiting for inevitable pleasure intolerable, because it turns the period of waiting into an endless series of imagined fulfilments and, by the frequency of our anticipated representations of them, divides time into as many tiny sections as any that could be devised by the anguish of doubt itself.

What I needed was to possess Mme de Stermaria: for several days now my desires had been unflaggingly active rehearsing this pleasure in my imagination, to the exclusion of any other; any other sort of gratification (pleasure with another woman) would not have been sufficiently prepared for, since pleasure is merely the realization of a prior urge which is not always the same and changes in accordance with the multiple variations of one's fantasies, the random functions of memory, one's sexual needs at the time, the particular desires available, since the most recently fulfilled of them lie dormant until the disappointment they brought has been more or less forgotten; I had already left the high road of general desires and turned off along the path of a more specific one; had I wanted to change my mind in favour of another assignation, I should have had to retrace my steps too far to get back to the high road and take another path. To possess Mme de Stermaria on the island in the Bois de Boulogne where I had asked her to dine with me, this was the pleasure that constantly occupied my imagination. It would have been destroyed, of course, if I had dined there without her; but perhaps equally diminished had I dined, even with her, somewhere else. And indeed, the attitudes involved in our way of envisaging any sexual pleasure come before the woman herself, the type of woman who is suitable for the purpose. They dictate the pleasure, and the setting too; and for this reason they give alternate prominence in our capricious minds to this or that woman, this or that place, this or that bedroom, which in other weeks we should have spurned with disdain. Born from our attitude at the time, certain women are incomplete without the double bed in which we find appeasement at their side, while others, to be caressed with a more secret intention, need leaves blown by the wind, the sound of water in the dark, things as light and evasive as they are.

There had been a time, long before I received Saint-Loup's letter and before any Mme de Stermaria had appeared in my life, when the island in the Bois had seemed to be the perfect setting for pleasure, probably because I found myself going there to bewail the fact that I had no pleasure to conceal in its shelter. The edges of the lake from which you get to the island and along which, in the last weeks of summer, Parisian ladies who have not yet left the city go to stroll, are where you wander about, not knowing how to find her or whether indeed she has not already left Paris, in the hope of seeing the girl you fell in love with at the last ball of the season and will not have the opportunity of seeing again at any evening party before next spring. Sensing it to be the day before, if not the day after, the beloved's departure, you follow the beautiful paths beside the shimmering water and see a first red leaf already blooming like a last rose; you scan that horizon where, through some artifice the opposite of that used in the panoramas beneath whose rotundas wax figures in the foreground create on the painted canvas behind the illusory impression of depth and volume, your eyes travel uninterruptedly from the cultivated park to the natural heights of Meudon and the Mont Valérien without knowing where to draw the boundary, and make the real countryside intrude upon the creation of the gardener, whose artificial charm they project well beyond its own limits; like those rare birds reared to roam free in a botanical garden and which, every day, wherever they happen to alight on their winged journeys, lend an exotic note to the surroundings, even as far as the outlying woods. Between the last of the summer parties and winter exile, you roam anxiously through this romantic domain of chance encounters and lovers' melancholy, and it would come as no surprise to discover that it was situated outside charted territory, any more than if, looking down from the terrace at Versailles, an observatory around which the clouds gather against the blue sky as they do in a Van der Meulen painting,[13] after leaving nature behind by standing up there above it, you were to be told that at the point where the natural scene begins again at the end of the great canal, the villages hidden in the distance, on a horizon as dazzling as the sea, are called Fleurus and Nijmegen.

Then, once the last carriage has gone by and you have the painful feeling that she will not come now, you go to dine on the island; above the quivering poplars, reminding you endlessly of the mysteries of evening rather than responding to them, a pink cloud adds a last patch of living colour to the now tranquil sky. A few drops of rain fall noiselessly on the ancient water which, in its divine infancy, still changes constantly with the conditions of the moment and continually forgets the reflections of clouds and flowers. And after the geraniums, by intensifying their brilliant colour, have put up a vain struggle against the gathering twilight, a mist comes to envelop the island as it falls into slumber; you walk in the moist darkness along the water's edge, where the only thing likely to startle you is the silent passage of a swan, like the briefly wide-open eyes and smile of a child in bed at night whom you thought was asleep. And because you feel alone and the world can seem far away, you long all the more to have a lover walking beside you.

But to this island, where even in summer there was often a mist, how much happier I would have been to bring Mme de Stermaria now that the cold season, the end of autumn had come! If the weather since Sunday had not in itself made the places in which my imagination was living greyish and maritime – as other seasons made them balmy, luminous, Italian – the hope of possessing Mme de Stermaria in a few days' time would have been enough to raise, twenty times an hour, the curtain of mist in my monotonously pining imagination. In any case the fog, which had extended even to Paris since the previous day, not only made me think incessantly about the native province of the young woman I had invited, but since it was likely that it would invade the Bois by evening, especially the edges of the lake, far more thickly than the centre of the city, I felt that it would turn the Ile des Cygnes into something of the Breton island whose marine and misty atmosphere had always clung like a garment to the pale silhouette of Mme de Stermaria in the mental picture I had of her. Of course when we are young, at the age I was at the time of my walks along the Méséglise way, our desires and convictions confer on a woman's clothing a unique character, an irreducible essence. We chase after the reality of a thing. But by the very fact of constantly letting it elude us we end up noticing that, after all the vain attempts which have led to nothing, there is something solid there after all, which is what we have been pursuing. We begin to distinguish, to identify what it is we love, we try to procure it for ourselves, if only by artificial means. Then, in the absence of any convincing reality, costume comes to replace that reality by creating a deliberate illusion. I was perfectly aware that within half an hour's distance from home I should not be in Brittany. But by walking arm in arm with Mme de Stermaria in the dusk of the island, by the water's edge, I should be behaving in the same way as other men who, unable to actually penetrate a convent, do at least, before possessing a woman, dress her up as a nun.

I was even able to entertain the hope of listening to something like the lapping of the waves with the young woman, for, the day before our dinner engagement, the weather turned stormy. I was starting to shave before going to the island to reserve a private dining-room (although at this time of year the island was empty and the restaurant deserted) and fix on the menu for our dinner next day when Françoise announced the arrival of Albertine. I had her shown in at once, unconcerned that she would see the unsightly dark stubble on my chin, whereas in Balbec I had never felt smart enough for her and there she had cost me as much agitation and worry as Mme de Stermaria did now. I was anxious that the latter should retain the best possible impression from the evening we were to spend together. And so I asked Albertine to come with me to the island straight away to help me select the menu. The woman to whom one devotes oneself entirely is so rapidly replaced by another that it comes as a surprise to discover one is devoting oneself all over again, all the time, without any hope it will come to anything. In response to my proposal, Albertine's smiling pink face beneath the flat toque she was wearing and which came down very low above her eyes, seemed to hesitate. She must have had other plans in mind; but if so, she found no difficulty in abandoning them for me, to my great satisfaction, for I attached a great deal of importance to the presence of a young housewife who would be able to order dinner far better than I could.

It is certain that she had represented something quite different for me in Balbec. But even when we consider it insufficient at the time, our intimacy with the woman we love creates between her and us, despite its painful shortcomings, social ties which outlast our love and even the memory of that love. Then, in the woman who is now no more to us than a means, a path towards others, we are just as astonished and amused to discover in our memory the original special appeal of her name for the other being we once were, as if, after giving a cabman an address on the boulevard des Capucines or in the rue du Bac, thinking only of the person we are going to see there, we were to remind ourselves that these names were once those of the Capuchin nuns whose convent stood there and of the ferry across the Seine.

All the same, my Balbec desires had brought Albertine's body to such a degree of maturity, accumulated such fresh sweet savours in it that, during our excursion to the Bois, while the wind like a careful gardener shook the trees, brought down the fruit, swept up the dead leaves, I told myself that had there been any risk of Saint-Loup's being mistaken or of my having misunderstood his letter, so that my dinner with Mme de Stermaria might lead to nothing, I should have made an assignation for very late the same evening with Albertine, in order to forget during an hour of purely sensual indulgence, by holding in my arms a body whose now abundant charms my curiosity had once calculated and weighed up in detail, the emotions and possible disappointments of this incipient love for Mme de Stermaria. And of course, had I imagined that Mme de Stermaria would grant me none of her favours at this first meeting, my picture of an evening spent in her company would have been a rather disappointing one. I knew only too well from experience how strangely the two successive stages of our incipient love for a woman we have desired without knowing her, loving her for the particular world she inhabits rather than for her still unfamiliar self – how strangely these two stages are reflected in the domain of reality, that is to say no longer in ourselves but in our meetings with her. Without ever having spoken with her, we have hesitated, tempted as we were by the poetic fantasy she represented for us. Shall it be this woman or some other? And at once our dreams focus upon her, become an integral part of her. The first meeting with her, shortly to follow, ought to reflect this onset of love. Far from it. As if material reality also needed its first stage, loving her already, we talk to her in the most inconsequential fashion: 'I invited you to dine on this island because I thought you would like the setting. It's not because there's anything particular I want to say to you. But I'm afraid it's rather damp, and you may be rather cold. – But not at all. – You're saying that out of politeness. Rather than annoying you by dwelling on the subject, I shall allow you, Madame, to carry on braving the cold for another quarter of an hour, but then I shall oblige you to leave with me. I don't want to be responsible for your catching a chill.' And without really having talked to her at all, we take her home, remembering nothing of her except perhaps a certain look in her eyes, but thinking only of seeing her again. Then at the second meeting (when even that look in her eyes, our sole memory of her, has vanished, but, for all that, we are still thinking only thinking about seeing her again) the first stage is left behind. Nothing has happened in the interval. And yet, instead of talking about the suitability of the surroundings, we say, without causing surprise to the new person, whom we find unattractive but to whom we should like to have our name mentioned at every moment of the day: 'It's going to be hard for us to deal with all the obstacles that stand in the way of our feelings. Do you think we shall be able to do that? Shall we be able to show our friends they were wrong and live happily together in the future?' But these contrasting conversations, the first inconsequential, the second alluding to love, would not take place; Saint-Loup's letter was sufficient assurance of that. Mme de Stermaria would give herself on the very first evening, so I should have no need to summon Albertine to the house as a last resort at the end of the evening. It would be unnecessary; Robert never exaggerated, and his letter was clear!

Albertine spoke very little, sensing that I had things on my mind. We went a little way on foot into the greenish, almost submarine grotto of a cluster of tall trees on the dome of which we heard the wind lashing and the rain splashing. I trod down dead leaves, which sank into the soil like sea-shells, and poked with my stick at chestnuts, prickly as sea-urchins.

The remaining leaves on the trees, convulsed in the wind, followed it only as far as their stems would permit, but sometimes these broke and the leaves fell to the ground, where they then rushed to catch up with the wind again. I had the joyous thought that, if this weather lasted, the island would feel that much more remote the following day and in any case completely deserted. We returned to our carriage, and since the gusting wind had died down, Albertine asked me to go on as far as Saint-Cloud. Like the dead leaves on the ground, the clouds in the sky were following the wind. And a flock of migrant evenings, their various layers – pink, blue, green – made visible by a sort of conic section cut into the sky, were stationed there in readiness for departure to warmer climes. To get a closer view of a marble goddess in the posture of springing from her pedestal and, alone in a great wood that seemed to be consecrated to her, filling it with the mythological terror, half animal, half sacred, of her frenzied leaps, Albertine climbed up on to a mound while I waited for her on the road. Seen from below in this way, she herself, no longer coarse and fleshy as she had been a few days earlier on my bed when the texture of her neck was seen close to under the magnifying glass of my eyes, but finely chiselled, seemed like a small statue on which the happy days in Balbec had left their patina. When I found myself alone again at home, reminding myself that I had spent the afternoon on an excursion with Albertine, that I was dining in two days' time with Mme de Guermantes, and that I needed to answer a letter from Gilberte, three woman I had loved, it occurred to me that our social life, like an artist's studio, is filled with abandoned sketches depicting our momentary attempts to capture our need for a great love, but what did not occur to me was that sometimes, if the sketch is not too old, we may return to it and transform it into a completely different work, possibly more important than the one we had originally planned.

The next day the weather was cold and fine: winter was in the air (and in fact autumn was so far advanced that it was a miracle we had been able to find a few domes of green gold in the already ravaged Bois). As I awoke I saw, as I had from the window of the Doncières barracks, a carpet of dull white mist hanging gaily in the sunlight, thick and soft as spun sugar. Then the sun disappeared and the mist became denser in the afternoon. Darkness fell early, and I dressed for the evening, but it was still too soon to leave the house; I decided to send a carriage for Mme de Stermaria. I was reluctant to accompany the carriage myself, not wishing to force my company upon her during the journey, but I sent a note with the driver to ask her whether I might come and collect her. In the meantime I lay down on my bed, closed my eyes for a second, then opened them again. Above the curtains there was now only a thin strip of daylight growing steadily dimmer. This idle time of the day was familiar, the long hallway to pleasure whose dark, delicious emptiness I had become acquainted with in Balbec when, alone in my room as I was now, while everyone else was at dinner, I felt no sadness as I saw the daylight fade above the curtains, knowing that in a while, after a night of polar brevity, it would be resuscitated in the more dazzling brightness of the blazing lights at Rivebelle. I sprang from my bed, put on my black tie, gave my hair a brush, the final gestures of last-minute presentability, performed in Balbec not for myself but for the women I should see in Rivebelle, as I smiled at them in anticipation in the corner mirror of my room, and for this reason gestures which had remained in my mind as signs of a forthcoming entertainment involving lights and music. They conjured it up like magic signs, even brought it into being already, and thanks to them I had as clear an idea of its reality, as complete an enjoyment of its heady, frivolous charm, as I used to have in July at Combray when I heard the packer's hammer-blows and enjoyed the warmth and sunlight in the cool darkness of my room.

And so it was no longer just Mme de Stermaria I should have wished to see. Forced now to spend my evening with her, I should have preferred, since this was my last evening before my parents returned, to have it free and to be able to seek out some of the women I had seen in Rivebelle. I washed my hands one last time and, moving round the apartment propelled by my sense of pleasure, I went to dry them in the dim light of the dining-room. I thought it was open on to the lighted hall, but what I had taken to be the bright space of the doorway (the door was in fact closed) turned out to be the reflection of my white towel in a mirror placed against the wall waiting to be put up before Mama's return. I thought back to all the other illusions such as this which I had discovered in the apartment, not exclusively optical ones, for when we first arrived I thought that our neighbour had a dog on account of the prolonged, almost human yapping which came from a kitchen pipe whenever the tap was turned on. And the door to the landing never closed by itself, very slowly, against the draughts on the staircase without giving a performance of the voluptuous, doleful broken phrases played above the Pilgrims' Chorus towards the end of the overture to Tannhäuser. As it happened, just after I had put my towel back in its place, I had the opportunity of hearing a fresh performance of this dazzling piece of symphonic composition, for the bell rang and I rushed to open the entrance door to the driver who was bringing me the answer to my note. I expected the message to be: 'The lady is downstairs', or 'The lady is awaiting you'. Instead he had a letter in his hand. I wavered for a moment before reading to see what Mme de Stermaria had written, which as long as she held the pen in her hand might have been different, but was now, once she had sent it off, a force of destiny pursuing its course alone, and which she could do nothing further to change. I asked the driver to wait downstairs for a moment, despite the fact that he grumbled about the fog. As soon as he was gone I opened the envelope. The printed card inside read Vicomtesse Alix de Stermaria, and on it my guest had written: 'My deepest apologies. Something has come up which means I am unable to dine with you this evening on the Ile du Bois. I was so looking forward to it. I will write to you properly from Stermaria. I'm so very sorry. Kindest regards.' I stood there motionless, stunned by the shock. At my feet lay the card and envelope, discarded like the wad in a firearm after the shot has been fired. I picked them up and scrutinized her message. 'She says she is unable to dine with me on the Ile du Bois. Perhaps that means she might be able to dine with me somewhere else. It would be too indiscreet of me to go and collect her, but at least that is one possible interpretation of her message.' And the Ile du Bois, where my thoughts had been installed in advance with Mme de Stermaria for the last four days, was where they obstinately remained. My desire automatically returned to the path it had been bent on following for so many hours now, and in spite of this message, which was too recent to override the force of desire, I went on instinctively preparing to leave the house, like a student who tries to answer just one question more even after the examiners have failed him. I eventually decided to tell Françoise to go down and pay the driver. I went down the passage, and failing to find her, passed through the dining-room; suddenly my footsteps ceased to resound on the wooden floor as they had been doing up to this point and were muffled in a silence which, even before I had realized its cause, made me feel stifled and confined. It was the carpets which, in preparation for my parents' return, were in the process of being relaid, carpets which look so good on bright mornings when the sun awaits you amid their disorder like a friend come to take you out to lunch in the country and shines down on them in a forest light, but which now on the contrary represented the first stage of preparation for the prison of winter which, as one who was shortly to be obliged to take his meals at home, I should no longer be free to leave when I chose.

'Take care you don't trip over, Monsieur. They're not tacked down properly yet, Françoise called out. I ought to have lit the rooms. It's the end of "September" already. The fine days are over.'

Winter on its way; at the corner of the window, as in a piece of Gallé glass, an encrusted vein of snow; and even in the Champs-Élysées, instead of the girls one expects to find there, nothing but solitary sparrows.

What added to my despair at not seeing Mme de Stermaria was that her answer led me to believe that while I, hour after hour since Sunday, had been living for this dinner alone, she had probably never given it a second thought. I learned later on that she had married, an absurd love match with a young man she must have already been seeing at this time and who had probably made her forget my invitation. For had she remembered it she would presumably not have waited for the carriage, which I had not sent through any previous arrangement, before sending me word that she was otherwise engaged. My fantasies of a young feudal maiden on a misty island had paved the way to a love that did not yet exist. Now my disappointment, my anger, my desperate desire to recapture the woman who had just refused me, enabled me, by bringing my sensibility into the picture, actually to focus upon the possible love which up to this point my imagination alone had conjured up, though rather more lamely.

How many of them there are in our memories, how many more have we forgotten – those faces of girls and young women, all of them different, which we have endowed with charm and the frenzied desire to see them again, simply because they eluded us at the last minute! In the case of Mme de Stermaria much more was involved, and all I needed now, in order to love her, was to see her again and renew those impressions, so vivid but far too short-lived, which my memory would otherwise be powerless to sustain in her absence. Circumstances were not in my favour; I did not see her again. It was not she that I loved, but it could well have been. And possibly one of the most painful things about the great love affair I was shortly to have was remembering the present evening and telling myself that, had circumstances been very slightly different, my love might have directed itself elsewhere, to Mme de Stermaria in fact; and that, directed to the woman who was to inspire it so soon afterwards, it was therefore not – as I was so anxious, so needed to believe – absolutely inevitable and predestined.

Françoise had left me on my own in the dining-room, after telling me how unwise of me it was to stay there before she had lit the fire. She was on her way to prepare something for dinner, for from this very evening, even before my parents returned, my seclusion was beginning. My attention turned to a huge bundle of carpets, still rolled up, propped against a corner of the sideboard, and, burying my head in it, swallowing the dust together with my own tears, as the Jews once covered their heads with ashes in times of mourning, I started to sob. I was shivering, not only because the room was cold, but because a clear drop in temperature (against the danger of being discovered and, it has to be said, the even slightly agreeable feeling we make no attempt to resist) is brought about by certain kinds of tears that fall from our eyes, drop by drop, like a fine, penetrating, icy rain, and seem as if they will never cease. Suddenly I heard a voice:

'May I come in? Françoise told me you were likely to be in the dining-room. I came by to see whether you would like to come and have dinner somewhere, if you're up to it. There's a fog outside you could cut with a knife.'

It was Robert de Saint-Loup, who had arrived in town that morning, when I thought he was in Morocco or on his way back by sea.

I have already said (and it was precisely Robert de Saint-Loup who had, quite unbeknown to himself, helped me to clarify my thoughts on the matter) what I think about friendship: namely that it adds up to so little that I find it hard to understand how men with some claim to genius, like Nietzsche for instance, can have been naïve enough to credit it with a certain intellectual value and as a result to deny themselves friendships in which no intellectual esteem was involved. Yes, it has never failed to surprise me that a man whose degree of self-honesty even led him to cut himself off from Wagner's music out of scruples of conscience could have imagined that truth can be attained by the mode of expression, intrinsically vague and inadequate, represented by actions in general and friendships in particular, or that there can be any sort of sense in an act like putting one's work aside to go and see a friend in order to share one's grief at the false report that the Louvre has gone up in flames. I had reached the point, in Balbec, of thinking that the pleasure of playing with a group of girls has a less pernicious effect on the life of the mind, to which at least it remains foreign, than friendship, which is totally bent on making us sacrifice the only part of ourselves that is real and incommunicable (except through art) to a superficial self which, unlike the other, finds no joy on its own; what it finds instead is a vague, sentimental satisfaction at being cherished by external support, hospitalized in the individuality of another person where, in gratitude for the protection afforded by this, it radiates approval of its well-being and marvels at qualities it would castigate as failings and seek to correct in itself. Moreover, the denigrators of friendship can, without any illusions and with some remorse, be the finest friends in the world, in the same way as an artist who is nurturing a masterpiece and feels it his duty to devote his life to his work, can nevertheless, in order not to appear or to run the risk of being selfish, give his life over to a futile cause and give it all the more courageously in that the reasons for which he would have preferred to do the opposite were disinterested ones. But whatever my view of friendship, to mention only the pleasure it procured me, so mediocre in quality that it seemed to fall half-way between fatigue and boredom, there is no potion so deadly that it cannot in certain circumstances become precious and restorative by providing us with just the boost we needed and the warmth we are unable to muster of our own accord.

The desire to ask Saint-Loup to take me to see some of the Rivebelle women, as I had wanted to do an hour ago, was of course far from my mind; the aftermath of my disappointment about Mme de Stermaria was there to stay, but Saint-Loup's presence, at a moment when any reason for happiness had left my heart, was like the arrival of kindness, gaiety, life, external to me no doubt, but offered to me, asking only to be made mine. He did not himself grasp the significance of my cry of gratitude and my tears of affection. And what can be more paradoxically affectionate than one of those friends – a diplomat, an explorer, an airman, or a soldier like Saint-Loup – who, obliged to leave again next day for the country and from there for God knows where, seem to derive from a single evening in our company, and to our great surprise, given the rare and fleeting nature of such evenings, an impression of such enjoyment and yet (also to our surprise, since they have enjoyed themselves so much) do not seek to prolong the experience or to repeat it more often? Something as ordinary as a meal with us provides these travellers with the same exotic and exquisite pleasure as our boulevards provide for someone from Asia. We left together to go and dine, and as I went downstairs I thought back to Doncières, where every evening I used to join Robert at a restaurant, and the little dining-rooms there I had forgotten. I remembered one I had utterly forgotten, not in the hotel where Saint-Loup dined but in a more modest one, half inn half boarding-house, where the landlady and one of her servants waited at table. The snow had forced me to stop there. Robert was not dining at the hotel that evening in any case and I had not wanted to walk on any further. My meal was served in a little panelled room upstairs. The lamp went out during dinner and the serving-maid lit two candles. Pretending that I could not see very well as I held out my plate while she helped me to potatoes, I took her bare forearm in my hand as if I were guiding it. Seeing that she made no attempt to withdraw it, I began to fondle it, then, without a word, I drew her whole body close, blew out the candles and told her to grope about me for some money. For the next few days, the adequate enjoyment of physical pleasure seemed to me to require not only this serving-maid but the panelled dining-room and its conducive seclusion. Yet out of habit and from friendship and until I left Doncières, I went back every evening to the other restaurant where Saint-Loup and his friends dined. But even this hotel where he boarded with his friends had been absent from my thoughts for a long time. We put our experience to very little use and fail to make the most of those hours on long summer evenings or unseasonal wintry nights when it nevertheless seemed to us that they might contain some grain of peace or pleasure. But such time is not entirely wasted. When new moments of pleasure announce themselves in their turn, ones which could pass by in the same way, similarly tenuous and linear, former moments return and bring with them the well-grounded basis for rich orchestration. They develop in this way into one of those typical instances of happiness which we recapture only occasionally but which continue to exist; in the present instance it was the abandonment of everything else to go and dine in comfortable surroundings, whose physical reality memory helps to endow with the enticements of travel, in the company of a friend who is going to rouse up our dormant life with all his energy, all his affection, to communicate to us a glow of pleasure, quite different from anything we might owe to our own efforts or to social distractions; we are going to devote ourselves entirely to him, to make professions of friendship which, born within the confines of the hour and remaining enclosed within it, will perhaps be forgotten the following day; but these were professions I could make without misgivings to Saint-Loup since, with a courage that embodied a great deal of wise experience and the hunch that friendship cannot be probed in detail, the following day he would be gone.

If as I came downstairs I relived those evenings in Doncières, suddenly, when we reached the street, the almost total darkness, in which the fog seemed to have extinguished the street-lamps (they were visible, and even then very faintly, only from close to), took me back to some dim memory of arrival in Combray by night, when the town was lit only at distant intervals and you groped your way through a humid, warm, holy crib-like darkness in which the lamps flickered here and there with no more light than from a candle. Between that year (whichever year it was) and the evenings in Rivebelle, reflected a while back above the curtains in my bedroom, what a world of difference! As I took note of this I felt a sense of inspired exhilaration, which might have resulted in something had I remained alone and so avoided the detour of the many futile years I was yet to spend before discovering the invisible vocation which is the subject of this book. Had this discovery been made that evening, the carriage I found myself in would have deserved to rank as more memorable than Dr Percepied's, in which I had composed the little descriptive piece about the Martinville steeples, recently unearthed, as it happened, and which I had reworked and offered without success to the Figaro. Is it because we relive past years not in their continuous sequence, day by day, but by fixing our memory on the coolness or sunshine of one particular morning or evening spent in the shade of some isolated setting, enclosed, static, arrested, lost, remote from everything else, and because the changes gradually effected not only in the world outside but in our dreams and in our developing personality, changes which have carried us along through life from one phase to a wholly different one without our noticing, are therefore nullified, that, if we relive another memory taken from a different year, the gaps, the immense stretches of oblivion between the two, make us feel something like a huge gulf of difference in altitude or the incompatibility of two utterly dissimilar qualities of breathed atmosphere and surrounding coloration? But between the successive memories of Combray, Doncières and Rivebelle which had recently occurred, I now felt that, much more than a distance in time, there was the sort of distance there would be between different universes whose substance was not the same. Had I wanted to reproduce in writing the material in which my slightest memories of Rivebelle were carved, I should have had to take the substance which had up until now resembled the sombre, rugged sandstone of Combray, vein it in pink, and suddenly transform it into something translucent, dense, cool and resonant. But Robert had finished giving his instructions to the driver and now joined me in the carriage. The ideas that had been passing through my mind were dispelled. They are goddesses who sometimes deign to make themselves visible to a solitary mortal, at a cross-roads or even in his bedroom while he sleeps, and they stand in the doorway to bring him their annunciation. But as soon as he is no longer alone, they vanish in a refusal to appear to more than one person at a time. So instead I found myself thrown back on friendship.

Robert had warned me when he arrived that it was very foggy outside, but as we were talking the fog had grown steadily thicker. It was now no longer merely the light mist which I had been hoping to see rise from the island and envelop Mme de Stermaria and myself. Once you moved a foot or two away from them, the street-lamps were invisible and it became as dark as night in an open field, in a forest, or preferably on the mellow Breton island where I should have liked to be; I was as lost as if I were on the coast of some northern sea, risking my life a score of times before reaching the safety of the solitary inn; no longer a mirage that is sought after, the fog was becoming one of those dangers to be fought off, so that finding our way safely to our destination meant that we experienced the difficulties, the anxiety and finally the delight which the sense of safety – so much taken for granted by those who are not threatened by the loss if it – confers upon the perplexed and disoriented traveller. Only one thing threatened to mar my pleasure during our adventurous carriage journey, by throwing me into a momentary spell of angry amazement. 'You know, said Saint-Loup, I told Bloch you weren't that keen on him, that you found him rather vulgar. You know me, I like things to be clear-cut,' he concluded smugly in a tone of voice that brooked no argument. I was dumbfounded. Not only did I have the most absolute confidence in Saint-Loup, in the loyalty of his friendship, and he had betrayed it by what he had said to Bloch, but it also seemed to me that he ought to have been held back from doing this by his defects as much as by his good qualities, by that extraordinary fund of good breeding which could carry politeness to the point of unwarranted reticence. Was the triumphant manner he adopted the sort of manner we assume to conceal a sense of embarrassment when we have admitted something we know we ought not to have done? Was it simply heedlessness? Or stupidity, making a virtue out of a defect of his of which I was unaware? Or a passing bout of ill-humour towards me, prompting him to try and end our friendship? Or else a passing bout of ill-humour directed at Bloch, to whom he had wanted to say something hurtful even if it meant compromising me? At all events, his face was marred, while he uttered these vulgar words, by a horribly twisted expression, which I encountered only once or twice in all the time I knew him and which began by running more or less down the middle of his face before it reached his lips and contorted them into a hideous low smirk, almost bestial for a second, and no doubt inherited. Such moments, which probably occurred only once or twice a year, must have represented a partial eclipse of his true self, due to the passage across it of the personality of some ancestor reflecting itself upon him. Like the smug expression on Robert's face, the words 'I like things to be clear-cut' fed equally into my misgivings and should have incurred a similar condemnation. I felt like telling him that a liking for clear-cut situations ought to entail restricting outbursts of plain speaking to one's own affairs and not making a cheap virtue out of them at the expense of other people's feelings. But the carriage had already drawn up outside the huge, brightly lit glass front of the restaurant, the sole point of light in the murky darkness. The fog itself, in the brightness cast by the comfortably lit interior, seemed to be standing there on the pavement to usher you in like footmen whose faces reflect the joyful hospitality of their master; it was shot through with the most delicate glints of light and pointed the way in like the pillar of fire that guided the Hebrews.[14] As a matter of fact, there were many of these among the evening's diners. For this was the restaurant to which Bloch and his friends had been coming for a long time to meet up in the evening, intoxicated by their fast of coffee and political curiosity, more famished than they are after their ritual fast, which occurs only once a year. Because all mental excitement creates some dominant cause of attachment, something superior to the habits involved in it, there is no taste at all enthusiastically pursued that does not gather around it thus a group of people which it unites and in which the general esteem is what each member devotes most of his life to seeking. In one place, be it only some little provincial town, you will find a group of enthused music-lovers; the greater part of their time and money is spent on chamber-music sessions, on meetings devoted to musical discussion, in cafés where they find themselves surrounded by music-lovers and rub shoulders with musicians. Another group, keen on flying, devote their attentions to being well in with the old waiter in the glass bar perched above the aerodrome; sheltered from the wind in this glass lighthouse cage, they can follow, in the company of an airman who is not flying that day, the moves of a pilot looping the loop, or another, who was invisible a moment ago, suddenly coming in to land and hitting the runway with the great roaring wings of the Roc.[15] The little group which met to try to perpetuate and delve into the swift turn of emotions involved in the Zola trial attached a similar importance to the café we were in. But they were not well received by the young aristocrats who composed the other half of the clientele and had taken to frequenting a second room in the café, separated from the other by a narrow parapet supporting a row of plants. They viewed Dreyfus and his supporters as traitors, although twenty-five years later, when people's ideas had had time to sort themselves out and Dreyfusism to acquire a certain glamour in the light of history, the Bolshevistic and dance-obsessed sons of these same young aristocrats would declare to the 'intellectuals' who questioned them that, had they had been alive at the time, they would have undoubtedly been pro-Dreyfus, despite the fact that they had no more clue about the significance of the affair than Comtesse Edmond de Pourtalès or the Marquise de Galliffet,[16] further shining examples of glamour already extinct by the time these noble sons were born. For on the night of the fog, the aristocrats of the café, who were later to become the fathers of these retrospectively Dreyfusard young intellectuals, were still bachelors. Clearly a rich marriage was envisaged for them by all their families, but none of them had so far achieved it. Still only a virtual reality, this rich marriage, which was a common goal several of them shared (there were indeed several 'suitable matches' in view, but when it came down to it the number of big dowries available was considerably lower than the number of aspirants involved), merely served to create a certain amount of rivalry between these young men.

Since Saint-Loup stayed outside for a few minutes to give the driver instructions to collect us after dinner, it was my misfortune to have to enter the place on my own. And, to begin with, once I had engaged with the unfamiliar workings of the turning door, I became alarmed that I should never get out of it. (Let me add, for the lovers of precise vocabulary, that the drum-shaped entrance in question, despite its harmless appearance, is known as a 'revolver', from the English term 'revolving door'.) That evening the proprietor, unwilling either to brave the damp fog outside or to abandon his customers, nevertheless remained posted by the entrance so that he could enjoy the joyful grievances of new arrivals, their faces positively glowing with the satisfaction of people who had had difficulty getting there and been afraid of getting lost. But the smiling cordiality of his welcome vanished at the sight of a stranger trying to disengage himself from the revolving glass panels of the door. This flagrant sign of ignorance made him frown like an examiner who is totally disinclined to utter the words: Dignus est intrare.[17] To cap it all, I went and sat down in the room reserved for the young aristocrats, from which he made no bones about coming to oust me, pointing me, with a rudeness from which all the other waiters immediately took their cue, to a place in the other room. This was all the less to my liking because I found myself sitting on an already crowded wall seat staring straight at the door reserved for the Hebrews, which did not revolve, but opened and closed continuously, exposing me to a horrible draught. But the proprietor refused my request for another seat with the words: 'Monsieur, I really can't disturb other people just on your account.' Yet he soon forgot me, his late and troublesome client, in his fascination with the arrival of each new-comer who, before ordering his beer, his cold chicken-wing or his hot toddy (it was long past the hour for dining), was first obliged, as in old tales, to pay his dues by recounting his adventure as soon as he entered this sanctuary of warmth and safety, where the contrast with perils just escaped created the mood of gaiety and comradeship you find in cheerful partnership around a camp fire.

One of the arrivals reported that his carriage, thinking it had reached the Pont de la Concorde, had managed to circle the Invalides three times, another that his, as it tried to make its way down the avenue des Champs-Élysées, had driven into a clump of trees at the Rond-Point and taken three-quarters of an hour to find its way back to the road. There then followed various lamentations about the fog, the cold, the deathly silence of the streets, all delivered and received with the same unexpected joviality that was connected with the pleasant atmosphere of the room, which, except for where I was sitting, was warm, the bright lights which dazzled people's eyes to life again after their experience of foggy blindness, and the buzz of talk which brought back sound to muffled ears.

New arrivals were hard put to it to keep silent. Their unusual adventures, which each of them thought unique, set their tongues on fire, and their eyes scoured the place in search of someone to engage in conversation. The proprietor himself lost all sense of social distinctions: 'Monsieur le Prince de Foix got lost three times on his way from the Porte Saint-Martin,' he said, laughing unabashedly and actually pointing out the famous aristocrat, as if he were about to effect an introduction, to a Jewish barrister who on any other evening would have been separated from him by a barrier far harder to surmount than the parapet and its row of plants. 'Three times! Well I never!' said the barrister touching his hat. These words of friendly interest were not something the Prince appreciated. He belonged to an aristocratic group which seemed to be solely preoccupied with the over-stepping of social boundaries, even in regard to nobles who were not of the very highest rank. Not to respond to a greeting; if the polite person in question repeated the offence, to snigger contemptuously or fling back one's head in fury; to affect not to know an elderly man who had done them a favour in the past; to reserve their hand-shakes and greetings for dukes and the really intimate friends to whom these dukes introduced them: such was the attitude of these young men, and more particularly of the Prince de Foix. This attitude was fostered by the muddled conduct of early manhood (a stage of life, even for the middle class, when someone's behaviour can come across as ungrateful and loutish because he has long put off writing to a benefactor who had just lost his wife and, to simplify matters, decides to ignore him when they meet), but what really lay behind it was an acute caste snobbery. It is true that, like the manifestations of certain nervous disorders which become less pronounced in later life, this snobbery would usually lose some of its offensive manner in these men who had been so intolerable when they were young. Once he has outgrown his youth, a man will rarely remain a prisoner to his insolence. He had thought it was the only way to behave; then he suddenly discovers that, even for a prince, there are such things as music, literature, not to speak of standing for the post of deputy. And so his scale of human values changes and he starts talking to people who were once the target of his dismissive gaze. And good luck to such spurned people if they have had the patience to wait until their forties and are mature enough – if 'mature' is the word – to enjoy the civility and polite acknowledgement so cuttingly refused them when they were twenty!

And since we are on the subject of the Prince de Foix, it is worth mentioning that he belonged to a set of a dozen or fifteen young men and to a more intimate group of four. The dozen or fifteen shared the characteristic, from which the Prince was, I think, exempt, that each of them presented a dual aspect to the world. Riddled with debt, they were regarded as complete nobodies by their tradesmen, despite the pleasure these took in addressing them as 'Monsieur le comte', 'Monsieur le marquis', 'Monsieur le duc' and so forth. They hoped to solve their problems by means of the famous 'rich marriage' ('a fat windfall', as the expression still was) and, since only four or five of the large dowries they coveted existed, several of them were secretly setting their sights on the same marriage partner. The secret was so well kept that when one of them arrived at the café and announced: 'My dear chaps, I'm too fond of you all to hold back the news of my engagement to Mlle d'Ambresac,' there would be an outburst of exclamation, several of the group being under the impression that their chances of marriage to Mlle d'Ambresac were as good as settled and therefore lacking the necessary composure to stifle at source their cries of rage and stupefaction: 'So it's marriage you're after, is it, Bibi?' the Prince de Châtellerault could not help exploding, dropping his fork in surprise and despair, for he had been fully expecting the engagement of this same Mme d'Ambresac to be made public, but with himself, Châtellerault, named as the future husband. And yet God only knows all that his father had been slyly implying to the Ambresacs about Bibi's mother. He could not help himself repeating the same sort of remark again: 'So you think it will be fun to get married, do you?', but Bibi, better prepared now that he had had plenty of time to adopt an appropriate attitude since the semi-official stage of the engagement, replied with a smile: 'I'm pleased, not to be getting married, which I didn't particularly want to do, but to be marrying Daisy d'Ambresac, who is utterly delightful.' It took no more time than the duration of this sentence for M. de Châtellerault to regain his composure, but he was already thinking that he must immediately change his tactics and set his sights on Mlle de la Canourgue or Miss Foster, numbers two and three on the dowry list, pacify the creditors who were setting store by the Ambresac marriage, and, finally, explain to the people to whom he had sung Mlle d'Ambresac's praises that this marriage was all very well for Bibi, but that if he himself had married her, he would have had all his family set at odds with him. Mme Soléon, he would claim, had in fact gone so far as to say that she would close her doors to the couple.

But if in the eyes of tradesmen, restaurant proprietors and so forth they seemed of little account, by contrast, as men of dual personality, as soon as they appeared in society they were no longer judged by the dilapidated state of their fortunes and the pathetic way they worked to repair them. They were once more M. le Prince X, M. le Duc de Y, and were esteemed only by their quarterings. They would take precedence over a nobleman who was almost a multi-millionaire and seemingly a man who lacked nothing because, as heads of their house, they were by descent sovereign princes of small territories where they were entitled to do things like minting money and so forth. Often, in the café, one of them would lower his eyes when another came in order to avoid exchanging the usual statutory greetings. This was because his imaginative pursuit of riches had involved inviting a banker to dine with him. Every time a society gentleman gets involved with a banker in such circumstances, it leaves him poorer by a hundred thousand francs, which does nothing to stop him repeating the process with another. Nothing stops us continuing to light candles in church or to consult doctors.

But the Prince de Foix, himself a rich man, belonged not only to this fashionable set of fifteen or so young men but to a more exclusive and closely-knit group of four, which included Saint-Loup. Known as the four gigolos, they were never invited to anything separately, were always to be seen riding together at the country houses where their hostesses provided them with adjoining bedrooms; as a result, especially since the four of them were extremely good-looking, rumours circulated about the nature of their intimacy. So far as Saint-Loup was concerned, I was in a position to denounce such rumours categorically. But the curious thing is that if it eventually came to light that the rumours were true of all four of them, then each one had been utterly unaware of the facts in relation to the other three. Yet each had done his utmost to inform himself about the others, either to gratify a desire or, more likely, a grudge, to prevent a marriage, or to have the upper hand over the friend whose secret he had uncovered. A fifth member (for in groups of four there are always more than four) had joined this platonic quartet, a man far more suspect than the others. But religious scruple had held him back until long after the group had broken up and he himself was a married man, the father of a family, one minute rushing off to Lourdes to pray that the next baby might be a boy or a girl, and the next flinging himself at soldiers.

Despite the Prince's character, the fact that the barrister had made his remark without really addressing him directly made him less angry than he would have been otherwise. There was also the fact that this evening was a rather exceptional one. And indeed the barrister was no more likely to become acquainted with the Prince de Foix than the driver who had taken his lordship to the café. And so the Prince felt that he might even permit himself to reply – contemptuously of course, and as if to no one in particular – to this man who had addressed him and who, thanks to the fog, was rather like a fellow traveller encountered on some beach at the ends of the earth, a place battered by wind or shrouded in mist: 'Losing one's way is nothing: the problem is finding it again.' These words of wisdom impressed the proprietor, for he had heard them several times already that evening.

In fact he had the constant habit of comparing what he had heard or read with things that were already familiar to him, and if he could detect no difference between the two, he felt a stir of admiration. This sort of mental response is not to be ignored, for, applied to political conversation, to the reading of newspapers, it shapes public opinion and thus contributes to the greatest events in the world. Many German café-owners, simply through being impressed by a customer or a newspaper informing them that France, England and Russia were 'on the warpath' against Germany, made war possible, at the time of Agadir, even if no war actually happened.[18] If historians have not been wrong to renounce their method of approaching the actions of nations as determined by the will of kings, they ought to substitute for the latter the psychology of the individual and the humblest individual at that.

In the matter of politics, the proprietor of the café into which I had just walked had for some time been applying his learning-by-rote mentality exclusively to a number of set-pieces on the Dreyfus case. If the terms he had committed to memory did not figure in the remarks of a customer or the columns of a newspaper, then he would declare that the article bored him to tears or that the customer was not giving a true picture. But the Prince de Foix's words aroused such admiration in him that he barely gave the Prince time to finish his sentence. 'Well said, Prince, well said,' (which effectively meant 'faultlessly recited') 'how true, how very true,' he exclaimed, 'swelling into ecstasies of satisfaction', as the Arabian Nights puts it. But the Prince had already departed into the smaller room. And, since life returns to normal even after the most singular events, those who had emerged from the sea of fog began to order their drinks or their food; among them were a party of young men from the Jockey Club who, in view of the exceptional circumstances, made no bones about installing themselves at a couple of tables in the larger room and were therefore quite close to me. Thus the cataclysm had established, even between the smaller room and the larger one, among all these people stimulated by the comfort of the restaurant after their long wanderings through the ocean of fog, a familiarity from which I alone was excluded and which must have been something like the spirit that prevailed in Noah's ark. I suddenly caught sight of the proprietor bowing and scraping, and the full complement of waiters rushed forward to do likewise, with the eyes of the whole restaurant turned upon this scene. 'Quick, send Cyprien to me, a table for M. le Marquis de Saint-Loup,' cried the proprietor, for whom Robert was not only a great nobleman, highly esteemed even by the Prince de Foix, but a customer of wildly lavish tastes who spent a good deal of money in this restaurant. Those dining in the big room looked on with curiosity, while those in the smaller one all tried to be the first to hail their friend as he finished wiping his shoes. But just as he was about to enter the smaller room he caught sight of me in the big one. 'Good God! he exclaimed, what are you doing in there in front of a wide-open door?' As he said this he cast a furious glance at the proprietor, who ran to shut the door, deflecting the blame on to his waiters: 'I'm always telling them to keep it closed.'

In order to join Saint-Loup I had had to disturb the people sitting at the same table and those sitting at the tables in front of mine. 'Why did you move? Would you prefer to dine here rather than in the small room? You'll be freezing, you poor fellow. You'll be good enough to keep that door permanently out of use, he said to the proprietor. – I'll see to it at once, Monsieur le Marquis. Any new customers will simply have to pass through the smaller room.' And to emphasize his eagerness to dance attendance, he commandeered the services of a head waiter and several others for the purpose, issuing vociferous threats about the consequences of neglecting his orders. To make me forget that marks of respect towards me had not been forthcoming until Saint-Loup's arrival on the scene, he became excessively attentive, and, just in case I should think that this was prompted by the fact that his rich and noble client was clearly my friend, he smuggled in a series of private little smiles in an attempt to convey a truly personal liking for me.

A remark made by one of the diners behind me made me turn my head for a second. Instead of the words: 'Yes, I'll have the chicken-wing and a little champagne too, but not too dry,' I thought I had heard: 'I should prefer glycerine. Yes, hot, that's right.' I was anxious to take a look at the ascetic who was inflicting such a diet upon himself, but I quickly turned back to Saint-Loup to avoid being recognized by the man with the strange appetite. It was simply a doctor I knew whose advice was being asked by another customer, who had taken advantage of the fog to pin him down in this café. Like stockbrokers, doctors use the first person singular.

Meanwhile I looked at Robert and various thoughts passed through my mind. There were in this café, and I had come across them elsewhere, a large number of foreigners, intellectuals, would-be artists, who were resigned to the laughter aroused by their pretentious capes, their 1830s neckties and even more by their clumsy way of carrying themselves, and often deliberately provoked that laughter in order to show that it meant nothing to them; yet they were men of real intellectual and moral worth, profoundly conscious of the world. To people who could not endure any oddity or eccentricity of appearance they were unacceptable (as Bloch was to Albertine), the Jews among them in particular, the unassimilated ones of course – the others are not relevant here. With hindsight, it was generally realized that, even if their hair was too long, their noses and eyes too big, their gestures theatrical and jerky, and that this did nothing to endear them to people, it was infantile to judge them on this account, that they were highly intelligent and good-hearted men who, in the long run, could become profoundly endearing. Among the Jews especially there were few whose parents had not a kindness of heart, a broadmindedness, an honesty, in comparison with which Saint-Loup's mother and the Duc de Guermantes came across as the sorriest of moral figures in their desiccated emotions, the surface religiosity they cultivated only to condemn scandal, and their clannish apology for a Christianity which never failed to lead (through the unexpected channels of the intellect at the expense of all else) to colossally wealthy marriages. But for all this, Saint-Loup, in whatever way the faults of his parents had combined to create a new set of qualities, was governed by a delightful openness of mind and heart. And whenever – to the undying glory of France, let it be said – such qualities are found in a pure-blooded Frenchman, whether he belongs to the aristocracy or to the people, they flower – flourish would be too strong a word for something so persistently controlled and contained – with a grace which even the most admired foreigner cannot offer to us. Of course others have their intellectual and moral qualities too, and if to appreciate them we have first to put behind us what we see as unacceptable, shocking and risible, they remain no less precious. But it is none the less a pleasant thing, and perhaps something exclusively French, that what is spontaneously judged to be fine, what carries conviction to the mind and the heart, should be first of all pleasing to the eye, delicately coloured, perfectly chiselled, and should embody its inner perfection in substance and shape. I looked at Saint-Loup and thought what a pleasant thing it is when there is no physical impediment to hinder a person's inner grace, and when the curves of the nostrils are as delicate and as perfectly formed as the wings of the tiny butterflies that settle on flowers in the fields around Combray; I thought too that the true opus francigenum,[19] the secret of which was not lost in the thirteenth century and would not perish along with our churches, is not to be found so much in the stone angels of Saint-André-des-Champs as in those young Frenchmen, nobles, bourgeois or peasants, whose faces are sculpted with the same delicacy and boldness as those on the famous porch, traditional and still alive.

After leaving us for a moment to bestow his personal supervision upon the closing of the door and our orders for dinner (he laid great stress on our choosing 'butcher's meat', which presumably meant that the poultry was rather indifferent), the proprietor came back to inform us that the Prince de Foix would be honoured to be allowed to dine at a table next to M. le Marquis. 'But they are all taken, said Robert, as he inspected the tables that were blocking the way to mine. – There is really no problem, the proprietor announced. If M. le Marquis is agreeable, I can easily ask these people to move. It is always such an honour to oblige Monsieur le Marquis! – You're the one who has to decide, said Saint-Loup to me. Foix is a good chap. I don't know whether he'd bore you, but he's less of a fool than most of them.' I told Robert that of course I should be happy with such company but that now that I was having the rare pleasure of dining with him at all, I should be just as pleased to dine with him on my own. 'That's a very fine cloak the Prince has,' the proprietor interjected as the two of us deliberated. 'Yes, I know,' said Saint-Loup. I wanted to tell Robert that M. de Charlus had concealed from his sister-in-law that he knew me and to ask him what the reason might be, but the arrival of M. de Foix put paid to this. He had come over to see whether his request had been welcomed, and we saw him standing a few feet away. Robert introduced us, but made it quite clear that the two of us had things to talk about and would prefer to be left alone. As the Prince moved away he added to the farewell bow he made me a smile in Saint-Loup's direction, which seemed to express regret that my friend had wished to curtail a meeting which the Prince himself would have liked to see prolonged. But at this point Robert suddenly seemed gripped by some idea he had, moved off with his friend, left me with the words: 'Do sit down and start your dinner, I'll be back in a moment,' and disappeared into the smaller room. I, meanwhile, as a stranger, endured the painful experience of hearing the smart young men around me telling the most improbable and nasty stories about the adoptive Grand Duke of Luxembourg (the former Comte de Nassau), whom I had met in Balbec and who had expressed such delicate proofs of sympathy during my grandmother's illness. One of these young men was claiming that the Grand Duke had said to the Duchesse de Guermantes: 'I expect everyone to rise to their feet when my wife arrives,' and that she had returned the remark: 'So we are to stand for your wife, are we? Rather different from her grandmother, I must say – men were expected to lie down for her,' a remark that, had it been made at all, would have been lacking not only in wit but in truth, since the grandmother of the young princess had always been a paragon of propriety. Then someone told a story about the Grand Duke once going to Balbec to visit his aunt, the Princess of Luxembourg, putting up at the Grand Hotel and complaining to the manager (my friend) that the Luxembourg standard was not being flown on the front; and because this standard was less familiar and less in use than the British or Italian flag, it had taken several days to find one, much to the Grand Duke's annoyance. I did not believe a word of this, but I was determined, once I went to Balbec, to ask the manager and to satisfy myself that it was pure invention.

While I was waiting for Saint-Loup, I asked the restaurant proprietor to bring me some bread. 'But of course, M. le Baron, at once, came the obsequious reply. – I'm not M. le Baron, I returned with mock regret. – I do beg your pardon, M. le Comte!' I had no time to launch a second protest, which would almost certainly have promoted me to the rank of Marquis: Saint-Loup, as he had promised, had returned promptly and appeared in the doorway holding the big vicuna cloak belonging to the Prince de Foix, from whom he had clearly borrowed it to keep me warm. He signalled to me not to move and started to come towards me; but either my table would have to be moved again or I would need to change my seat if he was going to sit down. No sooner had he entered the big room than he sprang lightly on to one of the red plush benches running round its walls and on which, apart from myself, three or four young Jockey Club members were sitting, friends of his, who had not been able to find places in the smaller room. Between the tables there were electric wires, placed fairly high; Saint-Loup jumped nimbly and safely over them like a steeplechaser clearing a fence; embarrassed though I was that it was being done wholly for my benefit and to save me from a trifling inconvenience, the sure-footedness of my friend's acrobatic feat none the less amazed me; and I was not alone in this; for although they would probably have been only mildly appreciative of a similar feat on the part of a less distinguished and less generous client, the proprietor and his staff stood by in fascination, like racing enthusiasts at the enclosure; one of the assistant waiters stood rooted to the spot, holding a dish that was awaited at a table nearby; and when Saint-Loup, who needed to pass behind his friends, climbed on to the back of their bench and moved along it in a balancing act, muffled applause broke out from the body of the room. When he reached my seat he brought himself to a halt with the precision of a chieftain paying tribute before the throne of a sovereign and, stooping down, he courteously and submissively handed me the vicuna cloak, which, a moment later, when he had sat down beside me, he arranged around my shoulders as a light, warm shawl, without my having to lift a finger.

'Oh yes, while I think of it, said Robert, my uncle Charlus has something to say to you. I promised I'd get you to go and see him tomorrow evening.

– Funny, I was just going to mention him to you. But tomorrow evening I'm dining with your aunt Guermantes.

– Ah yes, there's a whopping great blowout at Oriane's tomorrow. I'm not invited. But my Uncle Palamède doesn't want you to go. Can't you get out of it? Anyway, go and see my uncle afterwards. He seems anxious to see you. You could get there by eleven, don't you think? Eleven o'clock, don't forget. I'll tell him that. He's very touchy about these things. If you don't turn up he'll be really put out. Oriane's does never finish very late. Actually I need to go and see Oriane about getting a transfer from Morocco. She's so good about that sort of thing, and she can twist Général de Saint-Joseph round her little finger. He's the man in charge of these things. But don't say anything about it to her. I've mentioned it to the Princess of Parma and there should be no problem. Interesting place, Morocco. I could tell you a lot about it. Some very decent chaps out there. Mental equals and all that.

– You don't think the Germans are going to go to war over it?

– No, not really. They're annoyed with us, and they've every right to be. But the Kaiser wants a state of peace. They're always making us think they want war, to force us to give in. It's like a game of poker. The Prince of Monaco, one of Wilhelm II's agents, comes and tells us in confidence that Germany will attack if we don't give in. So we give in. But even if we were to refuse, there would be no war of any description. You need only to think what a cosmic thing a war would be today. It would be more catastrophic than the Flood and the Götterdämmerung[20] put together. Only it wouldn't last so long.'

He talked to me about friendship, special affinities with people, about missing them (even though, like all travellers of his kind, he was going off again the next day to spend some months in the country and returning to Paris for only a couple of days on his way back to Morocco, or elsewhere); but the words he let fall that evening kindled a pleasant glow of thoughts in the warmth of my heart. Our rare conversations alone together, and this one in particular, have assumed, in retrospect, the status of important turning-points. For him, as for me, this was the evening of friendship. And yet the friendship I felt for him at this moment was scarcely, I feared (with some remorse), what he would have liked to inspire. Still in the throes of the pleasure it had given me to see him come cantering towards me and gracefully reaching his goal, I felt that this pleasure arose from the fact that each of his movements as he had moved along the wall-bench possibly derived its meaning from, was motivated by, something very personal to Saint-Loup himself, but that what really lay behind it was something he had inherited, by birth and upbringing, from his race.

Certainty of taste (with regard not to aesthetics but to personal behaviour) in a man of refinement, allowing him, when faced with a novel set of circumstances, to adopt instinctively – like a musician who is asked to perform a piece he has never seen – the appropriate attitude and action and to apply the right mechanism and technique, then enabling him to exercise his taste without the inhibitions that would have paralysed so many young middle-class men with the fear both of making themselves ridiculous in the eyes of strangers through their unconventional behaviour and of appearing too ready to show off in the eyes of their friends, a fear which, in Robert's case, was replaced by a disdain he had certainly never felt in his heart but had received by inheritance in his body (it had moulded the attitudes of his ancestors into a familiarity which, as they saw it, could only flatter and enchant those to whom it was addressed); along with this went a noble liberality which, instead of flaunting his considerable material advantages (lavish expenditure in this restaurant had succeeded in making him, here as elsewhere, its most fashionable and favoured customer, as was made quite evident by the deference shown him not only by the waiters but by all its most distinguished young patrons), led him in fact to trample them underfoot, just as he had trampled, physically and symbolically, upon those plush benches, which seemed to this friend of mine to represent some sumptuous processional path, important to him only because it enabled him join me with more grace and speed; these then were the inherently aristocratic qualities that shone through his body – not opaque and dim as mine would have been, but meaningful and limpid – as the industrious energy and power that created it shines through a work of art, and translated the movements of the light-footed acrobatics Robert had conducted along the wall into movements as intelligible and charming as those of horsemen on a marble frieze. Robert's response to this might have been: 'Was it really worth it to have grown up despising birth, honouring only justice and intellect, choosing companions, outside the friends imposed upon me, who were awkward and ill-dressed but eloquent, only to discover that I come across solely, and am fondly remembered, not as the person the worthy efforts of my will have modelled to my likeness, but as a person not of my making, not even myself, the one I've always despised and striven to overcome? Was it worth while to love my best friend as I have done, only to find that his greatest pleasure when he is with me is to discover something far more general than myself, a pleasure which has nothing to do with friendship (as he says himself, but cannot seriously believe it) but something intellectual and detached, a kind of artistic appreciation?' This is what I now fear Saint-Loup may have thought at times. In which case, he was mistaken. If he had not (although he in fact had) loved something more exalted than the innate suppleness of his body, if he had not been detached for so long from aristocratic arrogance, then there would have been something more self-conscious, more heavy-handed about his very agility, and a vulgar self-advertisement in his behaviour. In the same way that Mme de Villeparisis, on an intellectual level, had needed a great deal of serious thought in order to convey a sense of the frivolous in her conversation and in her Memoirs, so, in order for Saint-Loup's body to carry so much nobility, all ideas of nobility had first to leave his mind, which was intent on higher things, before returning to his body to re-establish themselves there as noble attributes of an utterly unstudied kind. In this way his distinction of mind went largely hand in hand with a physical distinction which would have not been complete without it. An artist has no need to express his thought directly in a work for the work to reflect its quality; it has even been said the highest praise of God is to be found in the denial of him by the atheist, who considers creation to be perfect enough to dispense with a creator. And I was more than aware, too, that it was not merely a work of art I was admiring in this young horseman unfolding along the wall the frieze of his cantering path; the young prince (a descendant of Catherine de Foix, Queen of Navarre and granddaughter of Charles VII) he had just left to be alone with me, the privileges of birth and fortune he was putting second to me, the proud and nimble ancestry which lay behind the assurance, agility and courtesy with which he had wrapped the warm vicuna cloak around my shivering body – were not all these things like friends of longer standing in his life, on account of whom I might have expected that we should be always kept apart, but whom he was none the less sacrificing to me out of choice, the sort of choice that can be made only by a lofty mind, with that supreme liberty reflected in Robert's impulses and in which perfect friendship thrives?

The crass arrogance that was to be detected behind the familiarity of the Guermantes manner – in contrast to the distinction it assumed in Robert's code of conduct, in which hereditary disdain was merely the outward manifestation, transformed in his case into an unconscious grace, of a genuine moral humility – had been impressed upon me, not by M. de Charlus, in whom certain defects of character which I still found rather impenetrable were superimposed on his aristocratic habits, but by the Duc de Guermantes. Yet he too, despite the overall impression of vulgarity my grandmother had found so distasteful when she had encountered him years earlier at Mme de Villeparisis's, showed traces of ancient grandeur, as I was to discover when I went to dine at his house the day after my evening with Saint-Loup.

These were not the traces I had noticed, either in himself or the Duchesse, when I first met them at their aunt's, any more than I had noticed the differences that set La Berma apart from her colleagues when I saw her for the first time, although in her case any distinctive qualities were infinitely more striking than those of society people, since the more focused they are, the more evident such qualities become, the more accessible to the mind. And yet, however subtle shades of social distinction may be (subtle enough for an acute observer like Sainte-Beuve, in his attempt to portray the shades of difference between the salons of Mme Geoffrin, Mme Récamier and Mme de Boigne, to make them appear so alike that the essential point to emerge from his inquiry, unintentionally, is that salon life is vacuous),[21] for the same reason as with La Berma, by the time the glamour of the Guermantes had worn off for me and my imagination no longer busied itself distilling the droplet of whatever originality they had, I was able to ponder that droplet in all its incomprehensible mystery.

Since the Duchesse had made no mention of her husband at her aunt's evening party, I wondered whether, given the flurry of rumours about divorce, he would be present at the dinner. But I did not have to wait long to find out, for through the bevy of footmen who were standing about in the hall and who (since they must until then have regarded me much in the same way as they did the children of the cabinet-maker, that is in a kindlier light than their master, but as someone he could not possibly receive in his house) must have been asking themselves what had brought about this revolutionary change in the order of things, I saw M. de Guermantes threading his way towards me; he had been watching out for my arrival so that he could greet me on his own threshold and take my coat himself.

'Mme de Guermantes will be overjoyed, he said to me in an artfully persuasive tone. Please let me help you off with your clobber. (He felt it both chummy and comic to use popular expressions.) My wife was just a wee bit afraid you might opt out, even though you had fixed a date. We've been saying to each other all day: "You'll see, he won't come." I have to say that Mme de Guermantes had more faith in you than I did. You're not an easy person to pin down, and I was sure you were going to do a bunk on us.'

And the Duc was such a bad husband, even a brutal one according to some, that you felt grateful to him, as you do towards nasty people for any sign of kindness they show, for referring to her as 'Mme de Guermantes', words which seemed to spread a protective wing over the Duchesse and to create the impression that they were inseparable. Meanwhile, taking me familiarly by the hand, he made it his duty to guide me around the reception rooms. A common expression from the lips of a peasant may seem attractive to us if it points to the survival of some local custom or bears the trace of some historic event, unknown perhaps to the speaker; likewise, the politeness shown me by M. de Guermantes – and it was to be sustained throughout the evening – charmed me as a survival of habits that were many centuries old, seventeenth-century habits in particular. People of past centuries seem infinitely remote from us. We cannot venture to assign to them any underlying motives beyond the ones they formally express; it amazes us to discover some sentiment that is roughly akin to our own feelings in a Homeric hero, or some skilful tactical feint by Hannibal during the battle of Cannae, where he let his flank retreat in order to encircle his enemy by surprise; it is as if we imagined these two figures, the epic poet and the general, to be as remote as animals at the zoo. Even with some of the courtiers of Louis XIV, when we find signs of courtesy in letters written by them to some man of inferior rank who could be of no service to them at all, their letters leave us astonished because they come as a sudden revelation that these great noblemen believed in a whole host of things they never express directly but which govern their conduct, in particular the belief that they are honour bound to feign certain sentiments and to fulfil with the utmost punctiliousness certain codes of polite behaviour.

This imagined remoteness of the past perhaps partially explains how even great writers have prized the works of mediocre mystifiers like Ossian as examples of inspired beauty.[22] We are so astonished that bards from the distant past should have modern ideas that if, in what we assume to be an old Gaelic poem, we come across an idea we should have thought of as highly ingenious in a contemporary, we fall back in amazement. A gifted translator has only to introduce into an ancient text he is reconstructing more or less faithfully, a few passages which, signed with a contemporary name and published separately, would seem no more than agreeable, and the immediate effect is to assign a moving grandeur to his poet, who is thus made to perform on the keyboards of several centuries at once. The translator himself could have written only a mediocre book, had that book been published as his original work. Offered as a translation, it seems a masterpiece. Not only is the past not so elusive, it actually stays put. It is not only months after the outbreak of a war that laws passed without haste can effectively influence its course, it is not only fifteen years after an unexplained crime that a magistrate can still find the evidence that will throw light on it; after hundreds and hundreds of years, the scholarly study of the place-names and customs of some remote region can still unearth from them some legend that long pre-dates Christianity, already unintelligible, perhaps even forgotten at the time of Herodotus, which in the name given to a rock, in a religious ritual, still lives on in the present, like an emanation now charged with even greater meaning, stretching far far back into the past, unflinching. There was an emanation too, far less ancient, of court life, if not in the manners of M. de Guermantes (they were often vulgar), then in the mind that controlled them. I was to experience it again, like a scent of the past, when I rejoined him a little later in the drawing-room. For I did not go there at once.

As we were leaving the hall, I had mentioned to M. de Guermantes that I was very keen to see his Elstirs. 'Then I shall be pleased to show you them. Is M. Elstir one of your friends, then? How untoward of me not to have known. I do have some slight acquaintance with him. He's an amiable man, what our fathers used to call a "gentleman". I could even have asked him to honour us with his presence at dinner tonight. He would have been most flattered to spend an evening in your company, I'm sure.' When the Duc tried to force the manner of the Ancien Régime in this way he was unconvincing; but the next minute he had slipped back into it persuasively without conscious effort. After asking whether I should like him to show me the pictures, he conducted me to them, graciously standing aside at each door, full of apologies when he was obliged to precede me in order to show me the way, a little scene which, since the occasion described by Saint-Simon on which an ancestor of the Guermantes did him the honours of his house with the same punctilious performance of a gentleman's frivolous duties, and before it filtered through to the present day, must have been enacted by many another Guermantes for many another visitor. And as I had told the Duc that I would very much like to be left alone for a while with the pictures, he discreetly withdrew, telling me that I should find him in the drawing-room when I was ready.

But the moment I was left alone with the Elstirs, I completely forgot about time and dinner; once again, as in Balbec, I had before me fragments of that world of strange new colours, the projection of the great painter's particular vision, which his speech in no way conveyed. The parts of the walls that were covered by his paintings, each of them part of a homogeneous whole, were like the luminous images of a magic lantern which, in this instance, was the mind of the artist, the strangeness of which one would never have suspected from simply knowing the man, in other words so long as one had seen only the lantern shielding the lamp before any coloured slide had been inserted. Among these pictures, several of the ones that society people found most absurd interested me more than the rest because they re-created the optical illusions which make it clear that we should never be able to identify objects if we did not have recourse to some process of reasoning. On just how many occasions, as we are moving along in a carriage, have we not seen a bright street opening up a few metres away, when what our eyes are really confronting is merely a patch of wall in the full glare of sunlight creating the mirage of depth. Bearing this in mind, it surely makes sense – not from any artifice of symbolism but from a sincere desire to return to the root of our impression – to represent one thing by the other for which, in an initial flash of illusion, we mistook it. Surfaces and volumes are in reality independent of the names which our memory imposes on things once we have recognized them. Elstir was trying to wrench the immediacy of his impression away from what he already knew; he had often struggled to undo the various mental assumptions we impose upon the visual process.

The people who detested these 'horrors' were startled to discover that Elstir admired Chardin, Perronneau,[23] and many other painters whom they themselves, with their feet firmly on the ground, liked. They had no conception of the fact that Elstir's effort to reproduce reality (along with his own distinctive taste for certain experiments) was the same as the effort made by Chardin and Perronneau and that consequently, when he was not absorbed in his own work, he admired theirs as an attempt similar to his own, as something like a collection of fragments anticipating his own achievement. But it did not occur to society people to bring to Elstir's work the temporal perspective which enabled them to like, or at least to look painlessly at, the paintings of Chardin. And yet the older ones among them might have reminded themselves that in the course of their lives they had gradually seen, as the years distanced them from it, the unbridgeable gap between what they regarded as a masterpiece by Ingres and something they supposed must for ever remain a horror (Manet's Olympia, for example) diminish to the point where the two canvases seemed like twins.[24] But in our inability to move back from the particular to the general we never learn, and are always imagining ourselves to be faced with some experience that has no precedents in the past.

In two of the pictures (more realist in manner and from an earlier period) I was touched to discover the same person, portrayed in one of them in evening dress in his drawing-room, and in the other wearing a coat and top hat at a working-class festivity by the riverside where he was clearly out of place, which proved that for Elstir he was not only a regular sitter but a friend, even a patron, whom he liked to introduce into his paintings, as Carpaccio once introduced – with the most perfect likeness – Venetian noblemen into his, or as Beethoven liked to inscribe at the head of a favourite work the beloved name of the Archduke Rudolph. There was something magical about this waterside carnival. The river, the women's dresses, the sails of the boats, the numerous reflections between the various elements in the painting all fitted together on the square of canvas Elstir had cut out of a wonderful afternoon. The marvellous shimmer on the dress of a woman who had stopped dancing for a moment because she was hot and out of breath was reflected too, in the same way, in the cloth of a motionless sail, in the water of the little port, in the wooden landing-stage, in the leaves on trees and in the sky. In one of the pictures I had seen in Balbec, the hospital, as beautiful beneath its lapis lazuli sky as the cathedral itself, with a daring that surpassed Elstir the theorist, Elstir the man of taste, the lover of medieval culture, seemed to be singing out: 'There is no such thing as Gothic, as a masterpiece; a humdrum hospital is every bit as good as an illustrious porch'; what I now heard was: 'The slightly vulgar lady whom the man with an eye for women wouldn't bother to look at as he passed by and would exclude from the poetic scene nature presents to his eyes, is beautiful too; the light on her dress is the same light that falls on the sail of that boat, everything is equally precious, the tawdry dress and the sail that is beautiful in itself are both mirrors of the same light. All the worth they have is conferred upon them by the painter's eye.' And this eye had been able to arrest the passage of the hours for all time in this luminous moment when the lady had felt hot and stopped dancing, when the tree was encircled by a ring of shade, when the sails seemed to be gliding over a glaze of gold. But precisely because that moment had such a forceful impact, the fixity of the canvas conveyed the impression of something highly elusive: you felt that the lady would soon return home, the boats vanish from the scene, the shadow shift, night begin to fall; that pleasure fades away, that life passes, and that the instant, illuminated by multiple and simultaneous plays of light, cannot be recaptured. I recognized yet another, admittedly different, aspect of the Instant, in a collection of water-colours on mythological themes, early works of Elstir, which also hung on the walls of this room. Society people with 'advanced' views went 'as far as' these early works, but no further. They were certainly not his finest achievement, but already the honesty with which the subject matter had been thought out took away its chill. So the Muses, for example, were depicted as though they were creatures belonging to a now fossilized species but as figures who could easily have been encountered, in mythological times, in groups of two or three, along some mountain path in the evening. In some of the pictures a poet, depicted as the sort of specimen who would have also been of particular interest to a zoologist (on account of a rather sexless appearance), strolled with a Muse, like those creatures of different but kindred species in the natural world that move about together. In one of these water-colours, a poet, exhausted by a long journey in the mountains, has encountered a Centaur, who, pitying his exhaustion, is carrying him home on his back. In others, the vast landscape (in which the mythical scene, the legendary heroes occupy a tiny place and seem almost lost) is rendered, from the mountain-tops to the sea, with an exactitude which conveys the time of day not to the hour but to the very minute, by depicting the precise angle of the setting sun and the fleeting fidelity of the shadows. And by making the symbolic world of legend instantaneous in this way, the artist gives it a sort of lived historical reality, painting and relating it as a vivid instance of the past.

While I was examining Elstir's paintings, the arrival of the other guests had been signalled by repeated rings at the door-bell, which had lulled me into a sweet oblivion. But the silence which followed the rings at the door and had already lasted for some time finally succeeded – less rapidly, it is true – in rousing me from my musings, as the silence following Lindor's music wakes Bartholo from his sleep.[25] Fearing I might have been forgotten and that they had already passed to table, I hurried to the drawing-room. At the door of the Elstir collection I found a servant waiting for me, white-haired or powdered I could not tell, and looking like a Spanish minister, though he treated me with the same respect he would have shown to a king. His manner gave me the impression that he would have waited for me for another hour, and I felt alarm at the thought that I had delayed dinner, especially since I had promised to be with M. de Charlus by eleven.

The Spanish minister conducted me to the drawing-room (not before I had encountered on the way the footman plagued by our concierge; he was radiant with delight when I inquired after his fiancée, told me that, as it happened, they both had the day off tomorrow and would be able to spend the whole of it together, and sang the praises of Mme de Guermantes). I feared that I should find M. de Guermantes in a bad mood. On the contrary, he welcomed me with a delight that was obviously partly assumed and dictated by politeness, but was otherwise sincere, prompted both by his stomach, famished by the long delay, and by his awareness that his impatience was shared by the rest of his guests who completely filled the room. I learned later that I had kept them waiting for nearly three-quarters of an hour. The Duc de Guermantes probably thought that it would do no harm to prolong the general torment for a couple of minutes, and that since his politeness had driven him to postpone moving to table for so long, it would be more consummate still if, by not having dinner announced immediately, he could persuade me that I was not late and had not kept people waiting. And so he asked me, as if we had an hour to kill before dinner and some of the guests had not yet arrived, what I thought of the Elstirs. But in the same breath, taking care not to let his hunger pangs become too obvious, and in order not to lose another second, he began, in concert with the Duchesse, to start introducing me to the guests. It was only then that I became aware (I, who until this evening – apart from my introductory spell in Mme Swann's salon – had been accustomed, in my mother's drawing-room in Combray or Paris, to the patronizing or defensive gaze of strait-laced bourgeois ladies who treated me as a child) of a change of surroundings comparable to Parsifal's sudden introduction to the world of the flower-maidens.[26] The flower-maidens who surrounded me now, in extremely low-cut gowns (their naked flesh appearing on either side of a twisting spray of mimosa or the broad petals of a rose), greeted me only with long, caressing glances, as though shyness alone held them back from kissing me. Which is not to say that the majority of them were not highly respectable, morally speaking; the majority, but not all, for even the more virtuous among them did not share the revulsion my mother would have felt towards those of easier virtue. In the Guermantes world, vagary of conduct, denied by saintly friends in the face of the evidence, seemed to matter much less than the maintenance of social relations. People feigned ignorance of their hostess's sexual availability, provided that there were no embarrassing omissions on her guest-list. Since the Duc paid little attention to his other guests (from whom he had long had no more to learn, and vice versa) but a great deal to me, whose particular brand of superiority was unfamiliar to him and inspired the sort of respect which the great noblemen at the court of Louis XIV used to feel for bourgeois ministers, he clearly considered that my not knowing the people present was a matter of no importance – to me, if not to them – and while I was worried, on his account, about the impression I might make on them, he was thinking only of the impression they would make on me.

And the very first thing that happened was a miniature twofold imbroglio. Indeed, no sooner than I had entered the drawing-room than M. de Guermantes, without even giving me the opportunity of paying my respects to the Duchesse, led me, as though he wanted to give a pleasant surprise to the person in question, to whom he seemed to be saying: 'Here's your friend; you see, I'm bringing him along by the scruff of his neck,' towards a lady of rather diminutive proportions. Well before the Duc had propelled me towards her, the large, soft, dark eyes of this lady had been turned in my direction, fixed upon me with the sort of knowing smile we address to an old friend who has perhaps not recognized us. Given that this was indeed the case with me and I could not remember for the life of me who she was, I averted my gaze as I moved towards her, in order not to have to respond until our introduction released me from the awkward situation. Meanwhile the lady continued to maintain in precarious balance the smile she was fixing upon me. She seemed eager to be relieved of it, and to hear me say: 'Ah, Madame, of course! How happy Mama will be to hear that we've met again!' I was as impatient to know her name as she was to see that I did greet her with every sign of recognition, so that her smile, after being indefinitely prolonged like some sustained musical note, might finally drop. But M. de Guermantes so mismanaged our introduction (or so it seemed to me) that I ended up with the impression that he had named only me and I was still left in ignorance as to the identity of this unknown friend I was supposed to know; nor did she have the good sense to name herself, so obvious did the grounds of our intimacy seem to her, however obscure they were to me. Indeed, as soon as I drew close, she did not offer me her hand, but clasped mine as if she had known me all her life, and spoke to me as if the happy memories to which her mind reverted were as much mine as hers. She told me how sorry Albert (her son, it seemed) would be not to have been present. I racked my brains for a school-friend called Albert and could think only of Bloch, but this could not be Bloch's mother since she had been dead for many years. I struggled in vain to imagine the past experience common to her and to me to which her thoughts were taking her back. But I could no more identify it through the jet-black translucence of the wide, soft pupils which allowed only her smile to pierce the surface, than one can distinguish a landscape from behind a pane of blackened glass, even when the sun is blazing on it. She asked me whether my father was not working too hard, if I would like to go with Albert to the theatre some time, if I was in better health, and as my replies fumbled through the mental darkness I found myself in and became distinct only when I explained that I was not feeling very well that evening, she drew up a chair for me herself, putting herself out in ways I had never known from other friends of my parents. The clue to my puzzlement was finally supplied by the Duc: 'She thinks you're charming,' he murmured in my ear. I somehow felt I had heard these words before. They were the words Mme de Villeparisis had spoken to my grandmother and myself after we had made the acquaintance of the Princess of Luxembourg. The situation was now clear to me: the present lady had nothing in common with Mme de Luxembourg, but from the words uttered by the man who had served her up to me, I recognized what sort of species of creature I was dealing with. Someone of royal blood. She had never once heard of my family or myself, but, as a daughter of the noblest race and someone with the greatest fortune in the world (she was the daughter of the Prince of Parma and had married an equally princely cousin), she was always anxious, out of gratitude to her Creator, to prove to her neighbour, however poor or humble he might be, that she did not look down on him. And indeed I ought to have guessed this from her way of smiling, for I had already observed this sort of behaviour when I saw the Princess of Luxembourg buying rye-bread rolls on the beach in Balbec to give to my grandmother, as though to a deer at the zoo. But this was only the second princess of royal blood to whom I had been presented, and I might have been excused for my failure to recognize in her the characteristic affability of the great. Besides, had not the great themselves gone out of their way to warn me not to overestimate this affability, since the Duchesse de Guermantes, who had gestured such lavish greetings to me at the Opéra, had looked so much askance when I acknowledged her in the street subsequently, like someone who has given a person a gold piece and feels that this releases her from any further obligation. As for M. de Charlus, his changes of mood were even more sharply contrasted. And as the reader will learn, I was later to know highnesses and majesties of a quite different sort, queens who play at being queens and speak not after the conventions of their kind, but like queens in Sardou's plays.[27]

If M. de Guermantes had been in so much haste to present me, it was because the presence of anyone not personally known to a royal personage is an intolerable state of affairs and must not continue for a second more than it has to. It was the same haste Saint-Loup had shown to be introduced to my grandmother. A further point: in a fragmentary survival of court life, known as social etiquette and which, far from being superficial, operates an outside-in reversal through which it is the surface that becomes essential and profound, the Duc and Duchesse de Guermantes saw it as their duty (more incumbent upon them, more inflexible than the duties of charity, chastity, pity and justice, which at least one of them all too often neglected) to make sure that when they addressed the Princess of Parma, they hardly ever did so other than in the third person.

As a compensation for the visit to Parma I had never made (and which I had wanted to make ever since certain Easter holidays well back in the past now), meeting its princess – who, I knew, owned the finest palazzo in that unique city where in fact everything must be homogeneous, isolated as it was from the rest of the world within its polished walls, in the atmosphere, stifling as an airless summer evening on the piazza of a small Italian town, of its dense and cloying name – ought to have brought about a sudden revelation, in place of what I had tried so long to imagine, of all that was real about Parma, in a sort of fragmentary arrival there without ever having made the journey; it was, in terms of the algebra of my journey to the city of Giorgione,[28] something like a simple equation with Parma as the unknown factor. But if for years now, like a perfumer adding fragrance to a solid block of fat, I had been drenching this name, Princess of Parma, with the scent of thousands of violets, my efforts were merely rewarded, when I set eyes on the Princess, who until then I would have sworn must be no less than La Sanseverina herself,[29] by the onset of a further process (not completed, let me say, until a few months later), which consisted in expelling, by means of fresh chemical additives, all the essential oil of violets and all the Stendhalian perfume from her name, and replacing them with the image of a little dark lady, bent on good works, and so humbly amiable that it did not take more than a moment to sense the lofty pride from which such amiability stemmed. And while she was essentially similar to any other great lady, she was no more Stendhalian than, say, the rue de Parme in the Quartier del'Europe,[30] which bears far less resemblance to the name of Parma than it does to the other neighbouring streets and reminds one less of the Charterhouse in which Fabrice dies than of the concourse in the Gare Saint-Lazare.

There were two explanations for her amiability. The first and more general one was to do with the way this daughter of kings had been brought up. Her mother (not merely related to all the royal families of Europe but also – in contrast to the ducal house of Parma – richer than any reigning princess) had instilled into her from her earliest childhood the arrogantly humble precepts of an evangelical snobbery; with the result that every line of her daughter's face, the curve of her shoulders, the movements of her arms, seemed to repeat those precepts: 'Never forget that if God has caused you to be born on the steps of a throne you must not make that an excuse for looking down upon those to whom Divine Providence has willed (praise the Lord) that you should be superior by birth and fortune. On the contrary, you must be kind to those of humble station. Your ancestors were Princes of Cleves and Juliers from the year 647; God in his bounty has decreed that you should hold the vast majority of the shares in the Suez Canal and three times as many Royal Dutch as Edmond de Rothschild; your pedigree in a direct line had been established by genealogists from the year 63 of the Christian era; you have two empresses as sisters-in-law. So never speak to anyone as if you were mindful of these great privileges, not that they are unstable (for nothing can alter the antiquity of blood and the world will always need oil), but because it is unnecessary to draw attention to the fact that you are of nobler birth than others or that your investments are gilt-edged, since everyone knows this already. Support the needy. Give to all those whom the bounty of heaven has been gracious enough to put beneath you all that you can afford to give without debasing your rank, that is to say help in the form of money, even tending to the sick, but of course never any invitations to your receptions, which would do them no good and, by diminishing your prestige, would detract from the effectiveness of your good deeds.'

And so, even at times when she could not do good, the Princess endeavoured to make it plain, or rather to let it be thought, by a whole external play of sign-language, that she did not consider herself superior to the people she was with. She treated each of them with the charming politeness with which well-bred people treat their inferiors and was continually trying to oblige by pushing back her chair to make more room, holding my gloves, offering me all the helpful attention which a middle-class person would frown upon but which is willingly bestowed by sovereign ladies or, instinctively and out of professional habit, by trusty servants.

The other reason for the amiability shown me by the Princess of Parma was more specific, yet in no way dictated by some mysterious liking for me. But I did not have the opportunity to dwell on it at the time. For already the Duc, who seemed to be in a hurry to complete the round of introductions, had whisked me off to another of the flower-maidens. When I heard her name I mentioned that I had passed by her château, not far from Balbec. 'Oh, I should have been so delighted to show you round,' she replied almost in a whisper as though to emphasize her modesty, yet in a tone deliberately chosen to express her deep regret at the loss of an opportunity to enjoy so exceptional a pleasure, and she added with a meaningful look: 'I do so hope that another visit is not entirely out of the question. But I have to say that what would interest you even more is my aunt Brancas's château. It was built by Mansard[31] and it's the jewel of the area.' It was not only she herself who would have been happy to show me her place, but her aunt Brancas would have been no less delighted to do me the honours of hers, or so I was assured by this lady, who was evidently of the opinion that, especially at a time when the land looked like passing into the hands of financiers with their vulgar habits, it was important that the great should maintain the lofty traditions of lordly hospitality, by issuing promises which did not commit them to anything. It was also because she was anxious, like everyone else in her world, to say the things that would give most pleasure to the person she was addressing, to give him the highest idea of himself, to make him think that he flattered people by writing to them, that his hosts were honoured by his presence, that he was a most sought-after guest. The desire to give people this comforting picture of themselves does, it is true, sometimes exist even among the middle classes. They too can have the same amiable disposition, in the form of an individual quality compensating for some defect, if not, alas, in the case of the most reliable male friends among them, then at least in the most agreeable of the female ones. But with the middle classes, such a disposition flourishes only in isolated cases. In an important section of the aristocracy, on the contrary, this characteristic has ceased to be individual; cultivated by upbringing, sustained by the idea of a personal grandeur that need fear no humiliation, that knows no rival, realizes that affability can put people at their ease and is happy to be affable, it has become the generic feature of a class. And even those whose personal shortcomings are too contrary for them to feel it in their hearts bear the unconscious trace of it in their words or gestures.

'She's a very good-hearted woman,' said the Duc de Guermantes of the Princess of Parma, 'and she knows how to play the grande dame better than anyone.'

While I was being introduced to the ladies in the room, one of the gentlemen there had been showing constant signs of agitation: this was Comte Hannibal de Bréauté-Consalvi. Arriving late, he had not had time to find out who the other guests were, and when I entered the room, not recognizing me as a guest who was one of the Duchesse's regular circle and who must therefore have some extraordinary claim to admission, he settled his monocle beneath the vaulted arch of his eyebrow, in the firm belief that this would enable him to see what manner of man I was. He was aware that Mme de Guermantes had a 'salon' (the invaluable prerogative of really superior women), which meant that from time to time she added to the people of her own set some celebrity who had lately come into the public eye after discovering a new cure or producing a masterpiece. The Faubourg Saint-Germain had not yet recovered from the shock of learning that the Duchesse had not been afraid to invite M. Detaille[32] to the reception given for the King and Queen of England. The more intelligent women of the Faubourg were not easily consolable for not having been invited, so deliciously exciting would it have been to come into contact with that strange genius. Mme de Courvoisier claimed that M. Ribot[33] had also been of the party, but this was mere invention, designed to make people believe that Oriane was plotting an embassy for her husband. And to top it all, M. de Guermantes, with a gallantry that put him in the same league as the Maréchal de Saxe,[34] had presented himself at the stage-door of the Comédie-Française and begged Mlle de Reichenberg[35] to come and recite before the King, something she had duly done and which constituted an event without precedent in the long tradition of society receptions. As he recalled all these unexpected turns of event (and they had his entire approval, since he himself was an ornament to any salon and, in the same way as the Duchesse de Guermantes, but with the difference of gender, a figure who set the seal of distinction upon it) M. de Bréauté, when he asked himself who I could be, felt that the field of possibility was very wide. For an instant the name of M. Widor[36] passed through his mind, but he concluded that I was too young to be an organist, and M. Widor not sufficiently acclaimed to be received. It seemed more plausible to regard me simply as the new attaché at the Swedish Legation who had been mentioned to him, and he was preparing to enquire about King Oscar, by whom he had several times been very hospitably received; but by the time the Duc introduced me and gave my name, M. de Bréauté, even though the name was completely unknown to him, had decided that since I was there, I must be some sort of celebrity. It was utterly typical of Oriane, who had the knack of attracting to her salon men who were in the public eye; one of them to a hundred of her own of course, otherwise the tone would have been lowered. Satisfied on this point, M. de Bréauté began to lick his chops and to sniff the air hungrily, his appetite whetted not only by the certainty of a good dinner but by the character of the party, which my presence could not fail to make interesting and which would add spice to his table-talk next day when he went to luncheon at the Duc de Chartres's. He had not quite decided whether I was the man who had been making those experiments with a serum against cancer, or the author of the new 'curtain-raiser' currently in rehearsal at the Théâtre-Français, but, as a great intellectual, a great collector of 'travellers' tales', he kept constantly bowing in my direction, sending me signs of mutual understanding, smiles filtered through his monocle; either he had the mistaken notion that someone of distinction would esteem him more highly if he could manage to convey the illusion that for him, the Comte de Bréauté-Consalvi, the privileges of the mind were no less worthy of respect than those of birth, or he simply needed to express his satisfaction and found it difficult to do so, in his ignorance of the language in which he ought to address me; the overall impression was of someone who found himself face to face with one of the 'natives' of an undiscovered country on which his raft had landed, from whom, in the hope of gain, he would endeavour, as he observed their customs with interest and made sure he maintained demonstrations of friendship by uttering loud cries of benevolence like themselves, to obtain ostrich eggs and spices in exchange for glass beads. Having responded as best I could to his joyous satisfaction, I went on to shake hands with the Duc de Châtellerault, whom I had already met at Mme de Villeparisis's and who remarked that she was a shrewd old bird. He was a Guermantes through and through with his fair hair, his aquiline profile, the skin blemishes on his cheeks, all of these traits of the Guermantes family portraits which have come down to us from the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. But since I was no longer in love with the Duchesse, her reincarnation in the features of a young man offered me no attraction. I read the hook in the Duc de Châtellerault's nose as the signature of a painter whose work I had long studied but who no longer interested me at all. I then said good evening also to the Prince de Foix and was rash enough to submit my knuckles to the vice-like grip of the Prince von Faffenheim's German handshake, accompanied by an ironical or good-natured smile, from which they emerged the worse for wear; this was M. de Norpois's friend, who, thanks to the craze for nicknames dominant in this circle, was known so universally as Prince Von that he himself would sign his letters 'Prince Von' or, when he was writing to his intimates, 'Von'. The abbreviation at least had the merit of being understandable, given his triple-barrelled name. It was less easy to understand the reasons for replacing 'Elizabeth' with 'Lili' or 'Bebeth', like the swarm of 'Kikis' that flourished in a very different social world. One can understand how people, idle and frivolous though they are in general, might have adopted 'Quiou' in order not to waste the time it would have taken to say 'Montesquiou.' But it is less easy to see what they gained by nicknaming one of their cousins 'Dinand' instead of 'Ferdinand.' It would none the less be wrong to suppose that in the invention of nicknames the Guermantes invariably proceeded by syllabic cuckoo-ing. For instance, two sisters, the Comtesse de Montpeyroux and the Vicomtesse de Vélude, both of them enormously fat women, were never known to be addressed, without the least trace of annoyance on their part or of amusement on anyone else's, so ingrained was the habit, as anything other than 'Petite' and 'Mignonne' respectively. Mme de Guermantes, who adored Mme de Montpeyroux, would, if the latter had been seriously ill, have asked her sister with tears in her eyes if 'Petite' was dreadfully poorly. Mme de l'Eclin, who parted her hair in the middle and brought it down to cover her ears entirely, was always known as 'Starving belly'.[37] Sometimes an -a was simply added to the surname or first name of the husband to designate the wife. For instance, the most miserly, most sordid, most inhuman man in the Faubourg was called Raphael; his charming lady, his flower springing also from the rock, always signed herself 'Raphaela'. But these are just a few specimens of the many many name-games to which we can always return if need be, and explain some of them.

I then asked the Duc to introduce me to the Prince d'Agrigente. 'You mean to tell me that you've not met our wonderful Gri-gri!' he exclaimed and gave M. d' Agrigente my name. The Prince's own, so often dropped by Françoise, had always seemed to me like a transparent sheet of glass, through which I could see, struck by the slanting rays of a golden sun, on the shore of the violet sea, the pink cubes of an ancient city of which I did not doubt that the Prince – who happened by some brief miracle to be passing through Paris – was himself the actual sovereign, as luminously Sicilian and shiny with age as the city itself. Alas, the vulgar bumbler to whom I was introduced and who wheeled round to bid me good evening with a heavy-handed nonchalance he mistook for elegance, was as remote from his name as he was from a work of art he might have owned without betraying any reflection of it, or without ever having looked at it. The Prince d'Agrigente was so entirely devoid of anything princely, anything remotely reminiscent of Agrigento, that one began to imagine that it was his name alone, utterly distinct from himself, bound in no way to his person, that had been able to draw into itself anything vaguely poetic there might have been about this man, as about any other, and then to have imprisoned it in its magic syllables. If such a process had occurred, then it had done so most successfully, for there remained not an atom of charm to be elicited from this kinsman of the Guermantes. With the result that he found himself at one and the same time the only man in the world who was the Prince d'Agrigente and of all the men in the world the one who was perhaps least so. For all that, he was very happy to be what he was, but as a banker is happy to hold a number of shares in a mine, without caring whether the mine answers to the charming name of Ivanhoe or Primrose or is simply called Mine Number One. These introductions have taken so long to recount, but in fact they only lasted a few moments after my entry into the room; as they were drawing to a close, and Mme de Guermantes was saying to me in an almost imploring voice: 'I'm sure Basin is tiring you out, dragging you around from person to person; we want you to meet our friends, but we are particularly anxious not to tire you. We so much want you to come again often,' the Duc, with a somewhat awkward and timorous gesture, gave the signal (which he would gladly have given at any point during the hour I had spent with the Elstirs) for dinner to be served.

I should mention that one of the guests was still missing, M. de Grouchy, whose wife, née Guermantes, had arrived on her own, her husband being due to come straight from the country, where he had been shooting all day. This M. de Grouchy, a descendant of the First Empire Grouchy, of whom it has been falsely said that his absence at the start of the Battle of Waterloo was the principal cause of Napoleon's defeat, came from an excellent family, though not excellent enough for those obsessed with blue blood. Thus the Duc de Guermantes, who was to prove less fastidious about such matters in later life in regard to himself, was in the habit of saying to his nieces: 'What a misfortune for that poor Mme de Guermantes (the Vicomtesse de Guermantes, Mme de Grouchy's mother) that she has never succeeded in marrying off any of her children. – But, uncle, the eldest girl married M. de Grouchy. – I don't call that a husband! But it seems that your uncle François has proposed to the youngest one, so perhaps they won't all be left to live as old maids.'

No sooner had the order to serve dinner been given than with a vast gyratory swish, multiple and simultaneous, the double doors of the dining-room swung open; a butler who looked like a court chamberlain bowed before the Princess of Parma to announce: 'Madame est servie', in the same tone of voice he would have used to say 'Madame is in her death throes'; this, however, did nothing to cast gloom over the party, for it was with the sprightly air of summer frolics at Robinson[38] that the couples advanced behind each other towards the dining-room, separating only when they reached their places and the footmen settled them in their seats; last of all, Mme de Guermantes advanced towards me to be taken in to dinner, without my feeling the least shadow of possible timidity, for, like a huntress whose great muscular dexterity has given her a natural grace of movement, and no doubt observing that I had placed myself on the wrong side of her, she pivoted round me so skilfully that I found her arm resting on my own and fell quite naturally into her rhythm of precise and noble deportment. I yielded to this all the more readily because the Guermantes attached no more importance to it than a truly learned man does to his learning, with the result that one is less intimidated in his company than in that of an ignoramus; other doors swung open to admit the steaming soup, as though the dinner were taking place in an artfully contrived puppet-theatre, where, at a signal from the puppet-master, the late arrival of the young guest set all the machinery in motion.

The signal from the Duc which had set in motion that vast, ingenious, obedient and sumptuous human clockwork had been timid, not majestically imposing. As far as I was concerned, the indecisiveness of the gesture did not detract from the effect of the spectacle it commanded. For I sensed that what had made it hesitant and uneasy was the fear of letting me see that they had been waiting only for me to begin dinner and that they had been waiting for a long time, in the same way that Mme de Guermantes was afraid that, after looking at so many pictures, a continuous flow of introductions would tire me out and prevent me from relaxing in their company. So that it was the absence of grandeur in this gesture that disclosed the Duc's true grandeur and his indifference to the splendour of his surroundings, his consideration for a guest, however insignificant, whom he wished to honour. It was not that there was anything particularly extraordinary about M. de Guermantes in many ways, nor that he was exempt from the absurd foibles of a man with too much money and from the arrogance one would expect from an upstart, which he certainly was not. But just as a public official or a priest sees his own humble talents multiplied to infinity (as a wave is by the whole mass of sea behind it) by the forces that stand behind him, the machinery of French Government or the Catholic Church, so M. de Guermantes was carried along by that other force, the genteel manners of the aristocracy in their truest form. This courteous gentility excluded a great many people. Mme de Guermantes would have not have admitted Mme de Cambremer or M. de Forcheville to her society. But the moment that anyone appeared eligible for admission to the Guermantes circle (as was the case with me), this courtesy disclosed a wealth of hospitable simplicity more splendid still, if such a thing is possible, than those historic rooms and their marvellous furniture.

When he wished to give pleasure to someone, by skilfully turning to advantage the particular circumstances and place, M. de Guermantes saw to it that the person in question felt he was the centre of attention. No doubt at Guermantes his 'distinctions' and 'favours' would have assumed another form. He would have ordered his carriage to take me for a drive alone with himself before dinner. Such as they were, there was something touching about his attentions, as there is, when one reads the memoirs of the period, about the courtesy of Louis XIV when he responds in a kindly manner, with a smile and slight bow, to someone who has come to solicit his favour. At the same time, we need to bear in mind that, in both instances, such politeness did not extend beyond the strict sense of the word.

Louis XIV (much as he is reproached for his scant regard for etiquette by those of his contemporaries who were obsessed with true nobility, so much so that, according to Saint-Simon, he ranked very low as a king beside Philippe de Valois, Charles V and the like) had the most meticulous instructions drawn up in order that princes of the blood and ambassadors should know to what sovereigns they ought to give precedence. In certain cases, when agreement cannot be reached, a compromise solution is provided: the son of Louis XIV, Monseigneur, will receive such and such a sovereign out of doors, in the open, so that it may not be said that in entering the palace one of them had preceded the other; and the Elector Palatine, entertaining the Duc de Chevreuse to dinner, in order not to let his guest take precedence, pretends to be taken ill and dines with him lying down, thus solving the difficulty. When Monsieur le Duc avoids the occasions when he must wait upon Monsieur, the latter, on the advice of the King, his brother, who is deeply attached to him, finds some excuse for making his cousin attend his levee and forcing him to put on the royal shirt. But as soon as deeper feelings are involved, matters of the heart, this sort of duty, so inflexible when etiquette alone prevails, changes entirely. A few hours after the death of this brother, one of the people he loved most dearly, when Monsieur was 'still warm' (as the Duc de Montfort puts it), Louis XIV is to be found singing tunes from operas, amazed that the Duchesse de Bourgogne, who can scarcely conceal her grief, should be looking so melancholy, and, in an attempt to restore gaiety to his court at once, ordering the Duc de Bourgogne to start a game of brelan in order to get his courtiers back to the card-tables. Now, M. de Guermantes showed a similar contrast, not only in his social and more public activities, but in his most spontaneous utterances, his preoccupations, his daily routine: the Guermantes were no more prone to grief than other mortals, and it could even be said that they were really less sensitive to it; yet one saw their names every day in the social columns of the Gaulois on account of the incredible number of funerals at which they would have felt it culpable not to have their presence recorded. Like a traveller discovering the almost identical turf-roofed houses and the terraces which may have greeted the eyes of Xenophon or St Paul, I discovered still intact after two centuries in the manners of M. de Guermantes, a man of touching kindness and unspeakable inflexibility, a slave to the most petty obligations yet not to the most sacred commitments, the same aberration that typified court life under Louis XIV, which removes scruples of conscience from the domain of the affections and morality and transforms them into questions of pure form.

Another reason for the friendliness shown me by the Princess of Parma, a more specific one again, was that she was convinced beforehand that everything she saw at the Duchesse de Guermantes's, people and things alike, was superior to anything she had herself. It is true that she behaved in the same way at everyone else's house; the simplest dish, the most ordinary flowers sent her into raptures, and she would ask if she might send round her head cook or head gardener the next morning to copy out the recipe or to examine the species of flower in question, to the chagrin of both cook and gardener, who were highly paid, kept their own carriages and, more importantly, jealously guarded their professional reputations; they found it deeply humiliating to have to come and inquire about a dish they despised or to adopt a variety of carnation that was not half as fine or as variegated, did not produce as large a blossom as the ones they had long been growing for the Princess. But if, on the one hand, her astonishment at the sight of the most ordinary things was contrived and intended to show that her superior rank and riches did not spur her to the arrogant pride forbidden by her early instructors, masked by her mother and intolerable in the eyes of her Creator, on the other, she regarded the Duchesse de Guermantes's drawing-room, in all sincerity, as a privileged place in which she could move only from surprise to delight. The Guermantes were certainly different from the rest of society (they were more precious and rare), but not enough to justify such a reaction. My first impression of them had been quite the opposite; I had found them very ordinary, just like anyone else, but this was because before actually meeting them I had seen them, as I saw Balbec, Florence and Parma, as magical names. And of course all the women in this drawing-room, whom I had imagined as Dresden figures, turned out to be like the great majority of women. But, in the same way as Balbec or Florence, the Guermantes, after initially disappointing the imagination by having more in common with the rest of humanity than with their name, were subsequently capable, though to a lesser degree, of presenting various distinctive characteristics as food for thought. Their actual physique, the colour (a peculiar pink merging at times into purple) of their skin, a particular sort of almost luminous, fine blond hair, even in the men, massed in soft, golden tufts, half-way between wall lichen and cats' fur (a strikingly bright feature which went hand in hand with a certain intellectual brightness, for if people spoke of a Guermantes complexion, Guermantes hair, they also spoke of Guermantes wit, as of the wit of the Mortemart family – a certain social quality of superior refinement dating back well before Louis XIV and all the more widely recognized in that they promulgated it themselves), all this meant that in the very core material, however precious it might be, of the aristocratic society in which they were to be found embedded here and there, the Guermantes remained recognizable, easy to detect and to follow, like the streaks of paleness in jasper and onyx, or better still, like the supple waves of the tresses of light whose unbraided hairs run like flexible rays inside moss-agate.

The Guermantes – those at least who were worthy of the name – were not only graced with an exquisite quality of flesh, of hair, of limpid gaze, but had a way of holding themselves, of walking, of bowing, of looking at you before shaking your hand, which made them as different in all these respects from any ordinary member of fashionable society as he himself was from a peasant in a smock. And despite their affability one was apt to think: 'Is it not true that they have the right, though they do not show it, when they see us walk, bow, leave a room, or do any of the things which, when done by them, become as graceful as the flight of a swallow or a swaying rose, to think: "These people are of a different breed from us, and we are the princes of the universe"?' Later on, I realized that the Guermantes did indeed think of me as belonging to a different breed, but one that aroused their envy because I possessed merits of which I was unaware and which they professed to regard as the only things that mattered. Later still I came to feel that this profession of faith was only half sincere and that in their responses to things admiration and envy went hand in hand with scorn and astonishment. The bodily flexibility peculiar to the Guermantes was twofold: on the one hand it was always in action, at every moment, so that if, for example, a male of the Guermantes species were about to bow to a lady, he offered a silhouette of himself in which there was a precarious balance between asymmetry of movement and nervous attempt to compensate for it, one leg dragging a little, either deliberately or because it had been broken so often in the hunting-field that, in its effort to keep pace with the other leg, it caused a slump in the trunk of the body which was counterpoised by the upward thrust of one shoulder, while the monocle was inserted in the eye to raise the eyebrow just as the tuft of hair on the forehead fell forward in the bowing movement; on the other hand, like the shape which wave, wind or wake have permanently bequeathed to a shell or a boat, the other manifestation of this flexibility was, so to speak, stylized into a sort of fixed mobility, curving the arched nose which, beneath the blue, protruding eyes, above the over-thin lips from which, in the women, there emerged a husky voice, recalled the legendary origin fawningly attributed in the sixteenth century by parasitic and Hellenizing genealogists to this family, ancient beyond question, but not to the extent they claimed when they gave as its source the mythological coupling of a nymph and a divine Bird.

The Guermantes were no less odd from the intellectual than from the physical point of view. Apart from Prince Gilbert (the husband of 'Marie-Gilbert', a man of antiquated ideas, who made his wife sit on his left when they went out in their carriage because her blood, though royal, was inferior to his own, and who was in any case an exception, a laughing-stock to the rest of his family when he was not present and the butt of endlessly invented anecdotes), the Guermantes, while they moved among the cream of the aristocracy, affected to set no store by nobility. The theories of the Duchesse de Guermantes, who, admittedly, by virtue of being a Guermantes, had become something rather different and more appealing, set intelligence so far above everything else and were so socialist politically that one wondered where in her mansion the genie in charge of the aristocratic way of life had room to hide; always invisible, yet clearly lurking about the place, in the entrance hall, in the drawing-room, in her dressing-room, this genie reminded the servants of this woman who did not believe in titles to address her as 'Madame la Duchesse', and reminded the woman herself, who cared only for reading and was no respecter of persons, to go out to dinner with her sister-in-law when the clock struck eight, and to put on a low-cut dress for the occasion.

The same family genie presented Mme de Guermantes with a picture of the social duties of duchesses (or at least of the grandest among them who like herself were also multi-millionaires), of hours sacrificed to boring tea-parties, society dinners and festivities, when they might have been spent reading interesting books, as tiresome necessities comparable to rainy days and to which Mme de Guermantes acquiesced with a sparkle of rebellious humour, but without going so far as to examine the reasons for her acquiescence. Yet the curious coincidence by which Mme de Guermantes's butler addressed her always as 'Mme la Duchesse' did not appear to shock this woman who believed only in the intellect. It never occurred to her to ask him to address her simply as 'Madame'. Giving her the utmost benefit of the doubt, it was just credible that absent-mindedness caused her to catch only the word 'Madame' and that the other words appended to it passed unheard. But though she might feign deafness, she was not dumb. And of course, whenever she had a message to give to her husband, she would say to the butler: 'Remind Monsieur le Duc…'

The family genie had other functions as well, one of which was to prompt them to hold forth on morality. It is true that there were Guermantes who cultivated intellect and Guermantes who cultivated morals, and the two tendencies were usually distinct. But the former – including a Guermantes who had forged cheques, who cheated at cards and was the most delightful of them all, open to every new and plausible idea – had more intelligent things to say about morals than the latter, and in the same mode as Mme de Villeparisis, when the family genie chose to express itself through the lips of the old lady. When it expressed itself through them, you would suddenly find the Guermantes adopting a tone almost as antiquated, as good-natured, and (because of their superior charm) more touching than that of the Marquise, to say of a servant: 'One feels that she is basically very sound, not at all a common girl; she must come from a decent family, a girl who's never got into trouble, certainly.' At such moments the family genie displayed itself as a tone of voice. But at times it manifested itself in a person's bearing too, in facial expression, the same in the Duchesse as in her grandfather the Maréchal, a sort of mercurial convulsion (like that of the Serpent, the genius of the Carthaginian Barca family) [39] which had more than once made my heart jump on those morning walks of mine when, before I had recognized Mme de Guermantes, I could feel her eyes fixed upon me from inside a small cheesemonger's. This genie had intervened in a situation which was far from insignificant not merely for the Guermantes but for the Courvoisiers, a rival branch of the family and, though from as noble stock as the Guermantes (it was in fact to his Courvoisier grandmother that the Guermantes attributed the strong bias shown by the Prince de Guermantes to speak of birth and titles as the only things that mattered), their opposite in every sense. Not only did the Courvoisiers not assign to intelligence the same importance as the Guermantes, they had a different notion of what it was. For a Guermantes (even a stupid one), to be intelligent meant to have a scathing tongue, to be capable of making tart comments, of not taking no for an answer; it also meant the ability to hold one's own in painting, music and architecture alike, and to speak English. The Courvoisiers had a less exalted notion of intelligence and, unless one belonged to their world, being intelligent came near to meaning 'having probably murdered one's parents'. For them intelligence was the sort of burglar's jemmy by means of which people one did not know from Adam forced their way in to the most distinguished salons, and the Courvoisiers knew to their cost that you always ended up rueing the day you allowed people of 'that sort' into your circle. The most trivial statements made by intelligent people outside the 'society' world met with the Courvoisiers' systematic distrust. When someone once happened to remark: 'But Swann is younger than Palamède,' Mme de Gallardon had retorted: 'That's what he told you and coming from him, you may be sure it's in his interest to have said so.' Better still, when someone remarked, in relation to two highly distinguished foreign ladies whom the Guermantes were entertaining, that one of them had been received first because she was the elder, Mme de Gallardon had enquired: 'But is she really the elder?', not in a positive manner indicating that such persons did not have an age, but as if they were in all likelihood devoid of any civil or religious status, any familiar mould, and were therefore more or less of an age, like two kittens from the same litter which only a veterinary surgeon would be able to distinguish from each other. Yet in a sense, the Courvoisiers, more than the Guermantes, preserved the integrity of the titled class, through both the narrowness of their minds and the malevolence of their hearts. Just as the Guermantes (for whom, below the royal families and a few others like the Lignes, the La Trémoïlles and their kind, all the others were a vague jumble of small fry) were insolent towards people of ancient stock who lived in the vicinity of Guermantes, precisely because they paid no attention to the second-rate qualities so prized by the Courvoisiers, so the absence of such qualities was of little matter in their eyes. Certain women who did not enjoy a particularly exalted rank in their native provinces but had made brilliant marriages and were rich, pretty, the darlings of duchesses, became highly desirable, elegant imports in Paris, where people are never particularly awake to who one's 'father and mother' were. It might even happen, though this was rare, that such women were received, through the good offices of the Princess of Parma, or by virtue of their own attractions, by certain members of the Guermantes family. But the indignation with which the Courvoisiers regarded them was relentless. To meet with such people between five and six in the afternoon at their cousin's, people with whose relatives their own did not care to be seen associating at home in the Perche, became a growing source of rage and endless ranting. For instance, the minute the charming Comtesse G entered the Guermantes drawing-room, Mme de Villebon's face assumed exactly the expression required of it had she been compelled to recite the line:

Et s'il n'en reste qu'un, je serai celui-là,[40]

a line which, as it happened, was unknown to her. Almost every Monday, this Courvoisier had tucked into cream-stuffed éclairs within a few feet of the Comtesse G, but to no consequence. And Mme de Villebon confessed in secret that she was at a loss to understand how her cousin Guermantes could receive into her society a woman who, in Châteaudun, did not belong even to the ranks of the second-best. 'Why my cousin should be so particular about whom she knows, I really can't imagine – what does she think she's about!' was Mme de Villebon's conclusion, accompanied by a change of facial expression, this time smilingly sardonic in its exasperation, which, in a game of charades, would have merited another line of verse, no more familiar to her than the first:

Grâce aux dieux! Mon malheur passe mon espérance.[41]

And let us anticipate events to comment that the persévérance (which rhymes with espérance in the following line) shown by Mme de Villebon in snubbing Mme G was not entirely without its effect. In the eyes of Mme G it endowed Mme de Villebon with a distinction so exalted (and so imaginary) that when the time came for Mme G's daughter, the prettiest girl and the wealthiest one too in the ball-rooms of that season, to marry, people were astonished to see her turn down a whole string of dukes. And this was because her mother, remembering the weekly humiliations she had to endure in the rue de Grenelle in memory of Châteaudun, could conceive of only one possible husband for her daughter – a Villebon son.

A single point at which the Guermantes and the Courvoisiers converged was the art – and such a various art it is – of keeping one's distance. The Guermantes way of doing this was not entirely uniform throughout the family. And yet, to take an example, all of them, all those who were true Guermantes, that is, when you were introduced to them, indulged in a kind of ceremony, almost as though by holding out their hands to you they were performing an act as weighty as conferring a knighthood upon you. The moment he heard your name uttered by the person introducing you, a Guermantes, even a twenty-year-old Guermantes, but treading already in the footsteps of his elders, let fall upon you, as though he had not made up his mind to acknowledge you, a gaze which was generally blue and always as cold as a steel blade seemingly destined to plunge into the deepest recesses of your heart. And this is just what the Guermantes imagined themselves to be doing, since they all regarded themselves as first-class psychologists. They also felt that this inspection intensified the affability of the greeting which was to follow it and would not be delivered without a shrewd idea of your worth. All this occurred at a distance from yourself which would have been too close for a passage of arms, but seemed immense for a hand-shake and was as chilling in the latter case as it would have been in the former, so that when the Guermantes in question, after a lightning tour of the last hiding-places of your soul and your integrity, had deemed you worthy to consort with him in future, his hand, directed towards you at the end of an arm stretched out to its full length, seemed to be presenting a rapier for single combat, and the hand was in fact placed so far in front of the Guermantes himself at that moment that when he proceeded to bow his head it was difficult to distinguish whether it was yourself or his own hand he was acknowledging. Some of the Guermantes who lacked any sense of moderation or were incapable of refraining from repeating themselves incessantly, went even further and repeated this ceremony every time they met you. Given that they had no further need to proceed with the preliminary psychological scrutiny for which the 'family genie' had delegated its powers to them and whose findings they had presumably kept in mind, the persistence of the delving gaze preceding the handshake could be explained only in terms of an automatic reflex the gaze had acquired or by some hypnotic power they believed themselves to possess. The Courvoisiers, whose physique was different, had tried in vain to adopt the same penetrating gaze and had been forced to fall back upon a haughty starchiness or a hurried offhandedness. On the other hand, it was from the Courvoisiers that a rare handful of Guermantes women seemed to have borrowed the feminine form of greeting. So that when you were presented to one of them, she made you a sweeping bow in which she carried towards you, almost at an angle of forty-five degrees, her head and bust, while the rest of her body (which was very tall) up to the pivot-point of her belt remained stationary. But no sooner had she projected the upper part of her person towards you in this way than she thrust it backwards beyond the vertical in a brusque withdrawal of roughly equal length. This subsequent reversal neutralized what seemed to have been conceded to you, the ground you believed yourself to have gained did not even remain with you as in a duel, the original positions were retained. The same annulment of affability through retreat into distance (originating with the Courvoisiers and intended to show that the initial advances made were no more than a momentary feint) was equally evident in the letters you received from ladies of both the Courvoisier and Guermantes families, and particularly in the early days of acquaintance with them. The 'body' of the letter might contain the sort of things you would be likely to write only to a friend, but you would have been hard put to it to see yourself as a friend of the lady in question, since the letter would open with: 'Monsieur' and end with 'Croyez, Monsieur, à mes sentiments distingués'. Yet between this cold opening and the icy formula of conclusion which altered the meaning of everything else, there might (if it were in answer to a letter of condolence) be a series of the most touching accounts of the grief experienced by the Guermantes lady at the loss of her sister, of the closeness that had existed between them, of the beauty of the place where she was staying, of the consolation she derived from her delightful grandchildren, in short it was simply a letter such as one finds in printed collections, the intimate character of which implied no more intimacy between yourself and the writer than if she had been Pliny the Younger or Mme de Simiane.[42]

It is true that certain Guermantes ladies wrote to you from the first as 'My dear friend', or 'Dear friend': and these were not inevitably the most unaffected of them, but rather those who, living among kings and being at the same time women of 'easy virtue', assumed in their pride the certainty that everything that came from them gave pleasure and in their corruption the habit of not grudging you any of the satisfactions they had to offer. Yet since to have had a common great-great-grandmother in the reign of Louis XIII was enough for a young Guermantes to be able to refer to the Marquise de Guermantes as 'Aunt Adam', the Guermantes were so numerous that even in simple rituals, like the form of salutation given to a new-comer for example, they had a whole repertory of different forms. Each sub-group of any refinement had its own ritual and it was handed down from parents to children like a recipe for a healing poultice or a special way of making jam. Thus we have seen Saint-Loup ready to unleash his hand-shake in an almost involuntary gesture as soon as he heard one's name, without any concomitant eye movement, without any additional form of greeting. Any unfortunate commoner who happened to be presented to a member of the Saint-Loup sub-group for some particular reason – though this rarely occurred – would scratch his head over this abrupt and minimal greeting with its deliberately adopted stance of non-recognition, wondering what it was that this Guermantes (male or female) had against him. And he would be mightily surprised to learn that the Guermantes in question had thought fit to make a special point of writing to the person responsible for introducing them in order to tell him how delighted he or she had been with the stranger and what a pleasure it would be to meet him again. As idiosyncratic as this mechanical gesture of Saint-Loup was the rush of complicated hopping and skipping practised by the Marquis de Fierbois (condemned as ludicrous by M. de Charlus) or the gravely measured paces of the Prince de Guermantes. But given the sheer size of the corps de ballet involved, it is not possible to describe here the richness of this Guermantes choreography.

To return to the lively antipathy which set the Courvoisiers against the Duchesse de Guermantes, the former might have had the consolation of feeling sorry for her so long as she was still unmarried, for at that stage of her life she was by no means wealthy. Unfortunately, a sort of smoky haze of its own peculiar kind had always enveloped and concealed from view the wealth of the Courvoisiers, which, however great it might be, remained obscure. If an extremely wealthy daughter of the Courvoisier family married very advantageously, it did her little good; it was invariably the case that the young couple had no house of their own in Paris, would 'descend on' their in-laws there, and spend the rest of the year in the provinces in the midst of a society that was unadulterated but dull. While Saint-Loup, who had almost nothing to his name but debts, dazzled Doncières with his carriages and horses, a Courvoisier who was rolling in money always took the tram. And (though many years earlier, of course) a Guermantes of the opposite sex, Mlle de Guermantes (Oriane), who had hardly a penny, created more of a stir by the way she dressed than all the Courvoisiers put together. The very outrageousness of her remarks was a sort of advertisement for her style of dressing and doing her hair. She had had the audacity to say to the Russian Grand Duke: 'Well, sir, it seems that you would like to have Tolstoy assassinated?' at a dinner-party to which none of the Courvoisiers, who knew next to nothing about Tolstoy, had been invited. They knew even less about the Greek authors, if we may judge by the example of the Dowager Duchesse de Gallardon (mother-in-law of the Princess de Gallardon, herself a young girl at the time), whom Oriane had not honoured with a single visit in all of five years, replying to someone who had asked why Oriane failed to put in an appearance: 'It seems that she recites Aristotle (meaning Aristophanes) in society. I won't have that sort of thing in my house!'

One can imagine how greatly this 'sally' by Mme de Guermantes on the subject of Tolstoy, if it infuriated the Courvoisiers, commanded the admiration of the Guermantes and, beyond them, everyone who was not merely closely but even remotely attached to them. The Dowager Comtesse d'Argencourt, née Seineport, who received almost everyone because she was a blue-stocking and in the face of her son's terrible snobbery, passed on the remark to her literary friends with the comment: 'You know, Oriane de Guermantes is as sharp as a needle and clever as a monkey, a widely gifted woman who produces water-colours worthy of a great painter and better poetry than most great poets; and she couldn't come from a better family: her grandmother was Mlle de Montpensier, and she's the eighteenth Oriane de Guermantes, without any misalliance; it's the purest, the oldest blood in the whole of France.' And so the bogus men of letters, the half-baked intellectuals entertained by Mme d'Argencourt, picturing Oriane de Guermantes, whom they would never have the opportunity of knowing personally, as something more wonderful and more extraordinary than the princess Bedr-el-Budur,[43] not only felt ready to die for her when they learned that so noble a person worshipped Tolstoy above all others, but also felt their minds renewed with fresh strength in their love of Tolstoy, in their will to resist Tsarism. These liberal ideas of theirs might well have become enfeebled, they might have begun to doubt the superiority of them, no longer daring to confess to them, when suddenly along came Mme de Guermantes herself, that is to say a girl of such unmistakable culture and authority, who wore her hair flat on her forehead (something no Courvoisier would ever have dreamed of doing), and gave them this strong boost. A certain number of things, good or bad in themselves, gain enormously in this way by receiving the support of people who have authority over us. For instance, among the Courvoisiers, the rituals of civil behaviour in the street consisted in a certain manner of greeting people, very unbecoming and far from civil in itself, which was nevertheless recognized as the distinguished way of bidding someone good-day, with the result that everyone else, effacing their natural smiles of greeting, forced themselves to imitate these frigid gymnastics. But the Guermantes in general and Oriane in particular, even though they were thoroughly conversant with these rituals, did not hesitate, if they caught sight of you from a carriage, to greet you with a friendly wave, and in a drawing-room, leaving the Courvoisiers to give their stiff, self-conscious bows, they themselves bowed in the most charming way, held out their hands as though to an old friend with a smile in their blue eyes, so that suddenly, thanks to the Guermantes, the substance of stylish manners, previously rather dry and empty, was enhanced with everything that people would have naturally wished it to be but had forced themselves to shut out, a true welcome, an expression of genuine friendliness, something spontaneous. In a similar fashion, but by a process of rehabilitation which in this case is less easy to justify, people who are most prone to an instinctive taste for bad music and for tunes, however trite, which have something easy and alluring about them, manage to stifle this penchant of theirs by schooling themselves in symphonic music. But once they have arrived at this point, when they find a musician like Richard Strauss, whose dazzling orchestral palette they quite rightly admire, adopting the most vulgar motifs with an indulgence worthy of Auber, the original preferences of these people in the hands of so high an authority suddenly find a justification which delights them, and when they listen to Salomé they have no qualms about going into ecstasies, and with a twofold gratitude, about the sort of thing it would now be inadmissible for them to enjoy in Les Diamants de la Couronne.[44]

Whether it was authentic or not, Mlle de Guermantes's heckling remark to the Grand Duke, peddled from house to house, provided an opportunity to talk about the excessive elegance of Oriane's style of dress at the dinner-party in question. But if such splendour (and this is precisely what made it inaccessible to the Courvoisiers) springs not from wealth but from extravagance, then the latter nevertheless lasts longer if it is supported by the former, which allows it to come fully into its own with all lights ablaze. Now, given the principles openly paraded not only by Oriane but by Mme de Villeparisis, namely that nobility is of no importance, that it is ridiculous to concern oneself with rank, that money does not mean happiness, that intellect, feeling, talent are the only things that matter, the Courvoisiers were justified in hoping that, as a result of the formative influence of the Marquise, Oriane would marry someone who was not a society figure, an artist, a former criminal, a tramp, a free thinker, and that she would join the ranks, for good and all, of people the Courvoisiers referred to as having gone 'wildly astray'. Their expectation was all the more justified because Mme de Villeparisis, who was at that time experiencing an awkward crisis socially (none of the brilliant personalities I was to meet in her salon had at that point started to frequent it again), made no bones about displaying her intense horror of the society which excluded her. Even when she spoke of her nephew, the Prince de Guermantes, whom she did still see, she could not taunt him enough for his infatuation with his noble birth. But the moment it became a matter of finding a husband for Oriane, the operation was no longer guided by the principles paraded by aunt and niece, but by the mysterious 'family genie'. As unerringly as if Mme de Villeparisis and Oriane had never discussed anything but sources of income and family pedigrees as opposed to matters of literary quality and evaluation of character, and as if for a few days the Marquise had been – as she would be in the end – dead and lying in her coffin in the Combray church, where each member of the family became simply a Guermantes, devoid of individuality and first names (as attested by the single G in purple surmounted by the ducal coronet on the extensive black pall), it was on the wealthiest and the most nobly born, on the most eligible man in the Faubourg Saint-Germain, on the eldest son of the Duc de Guermantes, the Prince des Laumes, that the family genie had directed the sights of the intellectual, the defiant, the evangelical Mme de Villeparisis. And for two hours, on the day of the wedding, Mme de Villeparisis was at home to all the noble persons she was accustomed to pour scorn upon and whom she did scorn in the company of the few close middle-class friends she had invited and among whom the Prince des Laumes immediately left his visiting-card, only to sever connections with them the following year. And as a final disaster as far as the Courvoisiers were concerned, the same maxims about intellect and talent as the sole markers of social superiority began to be trotted out once again in the household of the Princess des Laumes immediately after her marriage. And in this respect, incidentally, the attitude maintained by Saint-Loup when he was living with Rachel, frequenting friends of Rachel and hoping to marry Rachel, whatever horror it provoked in the family, was less fraught with falsehood than that of the Guermantes young misses in general, in the way they sang the praises of the intellect, barely allowing the possibility that anyone could cast doubt upon the equality of mankind, all of which led, when it came to the point, to the same result as if they had clung to the opposite principles, which is to say to marrying an extremely wealthy duke. Saint-Loup, on the contrary, acted on what he believed, which led people to say that he was heading for a sorry downfall. Certainly, from a moral standpoint, Rachel left a lot to be desired. But it is by no means certain, had she been no better than what she was but had ranked as a duchess or millionairess, that Mme de Marsantes would not have been in favour of the match.

However, to return to Mme de Laumes (shortly afterwards, on the death of her father-in-law, to become the Duchesse de Guermantes), it was an added disaster for the Courvoisiers that the theories of the young Princesse, by remaining confined to her speech, should in no way have guided her conduct; for this philosophy (if this is what we are to call it) did absolutely nothing to detract from the elegance of the Guermantes salon. No doubt all those who were not received by Mme de Guermantes imagined that it was because they were not clever enough, and there was a rich American lady who had never owned a single book apart from an ancient little copy, never opened, of Parny's poems,[45] set in place on one of the tables in her small drawing-room because it belonged to the same period as the furniture, whose way of showing what store she set by the things of the mind was to rivet her gaze on to the Duchesse when the latter made her appearance at the Opéra. And again, no doubt Mme de Guermantes was sincere when she singled out someone on account of their intelligence. When she said of a woman: 'It seems she's quite charming,' or of a man that he was 'one of the cleverest people alive', she imagined herself to have no other reason for admitting them to her circle than the charm or the intelligence in question, unless the family genie intervened at the last moment; deeper under the surface, at the dark entrance to the domain where the Guermantes exercised their judgment, this vigilant genie debarred them from finding this man clever or that woman charming if they were without social merit, actual or potential. The man was pronounced learned, but in the sense that a dictionary is learned, or, on the contrary, as common, with the mind of a commercial traveller, the woman pretty, but with an appalling sense of style or too talkative. As for the people of indeterminate social status, they were just too dreadful – and what snobs they were! M. de Bréauté, whose country house was very near Guermantes, consorted with no one below the rank of Highness. But he was utterly unaffected by all that and longed only to spend his time in museums. And so when anyone described M. de Bréauté as a snob, Mme de Guermantes became indignant. 'Babal a snob! But my dear man, you must have taken leave of your senses; he's just the opposite. He loathes smart people. He won't let himself be introduced to any of them. Even in my house! If I invite him along with someone he doesn't know, he'll come, but he never stops grumbling about it.'

This is not to say that, even in practice, the Guermantes did not attribute a great deal more value to intelligence than the Courvoisiers. In a positive sense, the difference between the Guermantes and the Courvoisiers in this respect had already begun to bear very promising fruit. For example, the Duchesse de Guermantes, enveloped moreover in a mystery which had set so many poets dreaming from afar, had given the ball I have already mentioned, at which the King of England had never enjoyed himself so much ever before, for she had had the idea, which would never have occurred to any Courvoisier, and the audacity, which would have daunted the courage of all the Courvoisiers put together, of inviting, apart from the personages referred to earlier, the musician Gaston Lemaire and the dramatist Grandmougin.[46] But these intellectual leanings came across chiefly in a negative light. If the necessary quota of intelligence and charm declined steadily as the rank of the person who was anxious to be received by the Duchesse de Guermantes became more exalted, descending to zero when significant crowned heads of royalty were involved, by contrast, the further it fell below this royal level the more demanding this quota became. For instance, when the Princess of Parma received, there were a number of people whom Her Royal Highness would receive because she had known them since childhood, or because they were related to some duchess or other, or part of the entourage of some sovereign, regardless of whether these people were unattractive or boring; now, as far as a Courvoisier hostess was concerned, reasons such as 'a favourite of the Princess of Parma', or 'a half-sister of the Duchesse d'Arpajon on the mother's side', or 'spends three months every year with the Queen of Spain', would have been sufficient to make her invite such people, but Mme de Guermantes, who had politely acknowledged their greetings at the Princess of Parma's for ten years, had never once allowed them to cross her threshold, since she was of the view that the same rule applied to a drawing-room in a social as in a physical sense: it would take only a few pieces of furniture which were not particularly pleasing, but had been put there to fill the room and as a sign of the owner's wealth, to turn it into something dreadful. A drawing-room of this sort is like a book in which the author cannot refrain from using language to parade his own learning, brilliance, fluent ease. Like a book, like a house, the quality of a salon, Mme de Guermantes quite rightly thought, depended essentially on what you excluded.

Many of the friends of the Princess of Parma, and whom the Duchesse de Guermantes had acknowledged for years with no more than the same conventional greeting or an exchange of calling-cards without ever receiving them at her house or going to their receptions, complained about this in undertones to Her Highness, who, on days when M. de Guermantes came to visit her on his own, would drop a hint in his direction. But the wily nobleman, a bad husband to the Duchesse in that he kept mistresses, but her most reliable accomplice when it came to the proper functioning of her salon (and of Oriane's own witty sense of humour, which was the salon's chief attraction), would come out with: 'But does my wife know her? Oh, well, I suppose she ought to. But the truth is, Madame, that Oriane doesn't care for female conversation. She is surrounded by a court of superior minds – I'm not her husband, I'm only the senior valet. Apart from a handful of really witty women, the female sex bores her. And, Madame, Your Highness with all Her shrewd judgment is surely not going to tell me that the Marquise de Souvré is a witty woman. Yes, I quite understand, Your Highness receives her out of the goodness of Her heart. And then, Your Highness knows her. You tell me that Oriane has met her. It's quite possible, but only once or twice, I assure you. And then, I must explain to Your Highness, I'm rather to blame for all this. My wife is very easily tired, and she's always so very anxious to be friendly that if I let her have her way she would never stop calling on people. Only yesterday evening, despite the fact that she was running a temperature, she was afraid of offending the Duchesse de Bourbon by not paying her a visit. I had to put my foot down and forbid them to send the carriage round. Do you know, Madame, I've a very good mind not to tell Oriane that you've mentioned Mme de Souvré to me. Oriane is so devoted to Your Highness that she'll go at once to invite Mme de Souvré. That will mean another call to be made, it will oblige us to make ourselves known to the sister, whose husband I know well. I'd rather not mention it to Oriane at all, if Your Highness has no objection. We'll save her a great deal of fatigue and flurry. And I assure you, it will be no loss to Mme de Souvré. She has a wide acquaintance, moves in the most brilliant circles. We hardly entertain at all, really, just a few little dinner-parties. Mme de Souvré would be bored to death.' The Princess of Parma, naïvely convinced that the Duc de Guermantes would not pass on her request to the Duchesse and dismayed at her failure to procure the invitation solicited by Mme de Souvré, was all the more flattered to think that she was one of the habitués of such an exclusive salon. This flattering state of affairs was certainly not without its problems. Thus whenever the Princess of Parma invited Mme de Guermantes, she had to rack her brains to be sure that there was no one among her other guests whose presence might offend the Duchesse and make her decline further invitations.

On ordinary weekdays (after dinner, to which she always invited a few people, very early, for she held on to old customs), the Princess of Parma's drawing-room was open to her regular guests and, generally speaking, to the whole of the higher aristocracy, French and foreign. The order of her receptions was for her to leave the dining-room, to sit down on a sofa in front of a large round table and chat with a couple of the most important ladies who had dined with her, or else to cast her eyes over a magazine, or to play cards (or pretend to play, in accordance with a German court custom), either a game of patience or a game with some prominent partner – real or imaginary – of her choice. Towards nine o'clock the double doors of the big drawing-room were constantly opening and closing and opening up again to admit the visitors who had bolted their dinner (or, if they had dined out, skipped coffee with a promise to return later, after intending only 'to go in at one door and out through another') in order to accommodate themselves to the Princess's time-table. She, meanwhile, absorbed in her game or her conversation, pretended not to notice the new arrivals, and it was only when they were standing a few feet away that she rose graciously from the sofa with a benevolent smile for the women. The latter would then make a deep curtsey before Her Highness, who would stand there to receive what was tantamount to a genuflection, and this involved them bringing their lips down to the level of her handsome hand, held very low, and kissing it. At this point the Princess, just as if she had been surprised each time by a formality with which she was in fact perfectly familiar, would raise the kneeling lady almost bodily, with incomparable grace and sweetness, and kiss her on both cheeks. A grace and sweetness that were conditional, one might say, upon the meekness with which the arriving guest bent her knee. This was probably the case; and it seems that in an egalitarian society social etiquette would disappear, not, as people imagine, through lack of breeding, but because the one side would lose the deference due to a prestige which must be imaginary to be effective, while, more importantly, the other would lose the affability that is generously dispensed and cultivated when it is felt to be infinitely precious to the recipient, a sense of the precious which, in a world based on equality, would suddenly die a death, like everything that has only a fiduciary value. But this disappearance of social etiquette in a transformed society is by no means a certainty, and we are occasionally too ready to believe that present circumstances are the only ones in which certain phenomena can thrive. People of great intelligence believed that there could not be any diplomacy or foreign alliances in a republic, and that the peasant class would not tolerate the separation of Church and State. After all, the existence of social etiquette in an egalitarian society would be no more miraculous than the success of the railways or the use of the aeroplane in war. And then, if etiquette were to disappear, there is nothing to show that this would be a bad thing. And would not a society become secretly more hierarchical as it became ostensibly more democratic? Very possibly. The political power of the Popes has increased enormously since they ceased to possess either States or an army; cathedrals meant far less to a devout Catholic of the seventeenth century than they do for a twentieth-century atheist, and if the Princess of Parma had been the sovereign ruler of a State, no doubt it would have occurred to me to speak of her about as much as of a President of the Republic, which is to say not at all.

Once the postulant had been raised up and embraced by the Princess, the latter sat down again to her game of patience, unless the new-comer was a lady of some importance, in which case she sat her down in an armchair and talked to her for a while.

When the drawing-room became too crowded, the lady-in-waiting whose duty it was to act as a steward cleared some space by leading the guests into an immense hall on to which the room opened, a place filled with portraits and various trophies relating to the House of Bourbon. At this point the Princess's closest friends were quite willing to chaperone people around this hall and provide interesting commentaries, to which the younger guests had not the patience to listen, being more absorbed in the spectacle of living royalty (and the chance of getting themselves presented to it by the lady-in-waiting and her attendants) than in studying the relics of dead sovereigns. Too busy with the thought of meeting important people and angling for invitations, they had no idea, even after several years, of the contents of this priceless museum of the archives of the monarchy and held only a blurred memory of it as a place decorated with cacti and giant palms, which made this centre of social elegance look like the palmarium at the Paris Zoo.

Of course the Duchesse de Guermantes, in a spirit of self-sacrifice, did occasionally appear on these evenings to pay an after-dinner call on the Princess, who kept her all to herself for the whole evening, while engaging in banter with the Duc. But when the Duchesse came to dine, the Princess took care not to invite her regular guests and closed her doors to the world after dinner, in the fear that too indiscriminate a choice of guests might incur the displeasure of the fastidious Duchesse. On such evenings, should any of the faithful who had not been warned present themselves at Her Highness's doors, the porter would inform them: 'Her Royal Highness is not at home this evening,' and they would turn away. But many of the Princess's friends would have known in advance that on that particular day they would not be invited to call. These were special social occasions, ones that were barred to many who must have longed for admission. Those who were excluded were fairly certain who figured in the ranks of the elect, and would murmur among themselves in a fit of pique: 'You know, of course, that Oriane de Guermantes never goes anywhere without her entire general staff.' With the help of this body, the Princess of Parma attempted to surround the Duchesse with a sort of protective rampart against those whose chances of impressing her were in any way slight. But there were several of the Duchesse's preferred friends, several members of this glamorous 'general staff', towards whom the Princess of Parma found it difficult to be affable, seeing that they displayed scant affability towards herself. It is very likely that the Princess of Parma would have been the first to admit that people might derive more pleasure from the company of the Duchesse de Guermantes than from her own. She could not ignore the fact that there was always a dense throng of people at the Duchesse's 'at homes', or that she herself would often encounter three or four members of royalty there who thought that she deserved no more than to receive their visiting-cards. And however much she might memorize Oriane's witticisms, copy her style of dress, serve identical strawberry tartlets at her own tea-parties, there were still occasions when she was left by herself all day in the sole company of her lady-in-waiting or some counsellor from a foreign legation. And so, whenever someone never let a day pass without going to spend a couple of hours at the Duchesse's (as Swann had done, for instance, at an earlier period) yet only set foot at the Princess of Parma's once in every two years, the latter was not particularly inclined, even for the sake of humouring Oriane, to make 'advances' to this Swann or whoever by inviting him to dinner. In short, inviting the Duchesse to her house was for the Princess of Parma a rather vexed business, so strongly was she beset by fear that Oriane would find fault with everything. But by contrast, and for the same reason, when the Princess of Parma came to dine with Mme de Guermantes, she could be certain in advance that everything would be perfect, delightful, and she had only one misgiving, the fear of being unable to understand, remember, engage people, of being unable to assimilate ideas and personalities. On this score, my presence aroused her attention and stimulated her cupidity, in exactly the same way that a novel style of decorating a dinner-table with garlands of fruit might have done, uncertain as she was which of the two – the table decoration or my presence – was more distinctive as one of those charms which were the secret of the success of Oriane's receptions, and, in her uncertainty, firmly resolved to try to have them both at the next dinner-party she gave. In fact what fully justified the ecstatic curiosity the Princess of Parma brought to the Duchesse's house was that element of the comical, the dangerous, the exciting into which the Princess would plunge in a kind of timidity, a thrill of shock and delight (as at the seaside when the waves are heavy and the bathing-attendants warn people of the danger for the simple reason that none of them can swim), and from which she would emerge feeling braced, happy, rejuvenated – the element known as the Guermantes wit. This wit of the Guermantes – something as non-existent as the squared circle in the eyes of the Duchesse, who regarded herself as the only Guermantes to possess it – had the same sort of repute as rillettes de Tours or biscuits made in Rheims. All the same, it is probable (since an intellectual characteristic does not propagate itself through the same channels as the colour of someone's hair or complexion) that various close friends of the Duchesse, who were not of her blood, possessed the same wit, which, by contrast, had failed to inculcate itself into certain members of the Guermantes family who were all too impervious to wit of any kind. Generally speaking, those who were endowed with the Guermantes wit and not related to the Duchesse shared the characteristic feature of having been brilliant men, well equipped for a career either in the arts, diplomacy, parliamentary eloquence or the army, to which they had preferred a clannish society life. Perhaps such a preference could be explained by a certain lack of originality, initiative, will-power, health, luck – or by snobbishness.

For some of them (though these, it must be said, were the exception), if the Guermantes salon had been the stumbling-block in their careers, it had been against their will. So, for instance, a doctor, a painter and a diplomat with a fine career before him had failed to achieve the sort of success for which they were none the less more brilliantly equipped than most, because their friendship with the Guermantes meant that the first two were regarded as men of fashion and the third as a reactionary, and this had prevented all three from earning the recognition of their peers. The old-fashioned gown and red cap still donned by the electoral bodies of the university faculties are – or at least were, until fairly recently – something more than a purely external survival from a narrow-minded past and an unyielding sectarianism. Beneath the cap with its golden tassels, like the high priests of the Jews in their conical headgear, the 'professors' were still, in the years that preceded the Dreyfus case, deeply rooted in strictly pharisaical ideas. Du Boulbon was at heart an artist, but he was safe because he did not care for society. Cottard belonged to the Verdurin circle, but Mme Verdurin was one of his patients, then was further protected by his vulgarity while at his own house he entertained no one outside the Faculty, at banquets bathed in a whiff of carbolic acid. But in staunchly corporate bodies, where in fact rigid prejudice is simply the price to be paid for a spotless reputation, for the most lofty conceptions of morality, which falter in more tolerant, liberal (and ultimately more corrupt) milieux, a professor in his gown of scarlet faced with ermine, like that of a Doge of Venice (that is to say the equivalent of a duke) shut away in the ducal palace, was as virtuous, as committed to noble principles, but as merciless towards any outside element as that other admirable but fearsome Duc, M. de Saint-Simon. The outsider here was the fashionable society doctor with his alien manner, his different social connections. To make good, the unfortunate man of whom we are now speaking, so as not to be accused by his colleagues of scorning them (who but a man of fashion would think of such a thing!) by keeping the Duchesse de Guermantes from them, would hope to disarm them by throwing mixed dinner-parties at which the quota of medical guests was outnumbered by the fashionable ones. He was unaware that this was a way of signing his own death-warrant, or rather he discovered as much when the Council of Ten[47] (a little larger in number) had to appoint to a vacant chair, when it was inevitably the name of another doctor, a more regular if more mediocre one, that emerged from the fatal ballot, and the 'Veto' echoed around the ancient Faculty, as solemn, as absurd, and as terrible as the 'Juro' that spelt the death of Molière.[48] The same was true of the painter who was permanently labelled a 'society figure', when those members of fashionable society who dabbled in art had managed to get themselves labelled as artists; the same was true of the diplomat who had too many ties with reactionaries.

But such cases were extremely rare. The typical kind of distinguished man who formed the backbone of the Guermantes salon was someone who had voluntarily (as he saw it at least) renounced all else, everything that was incompatible with the Guermantes wit, the Guermantes code of manners, with the subtle charm that was odious to any 'body' of people who were in the least 'corporate'.

And the people who were cognizant of the fact that one of the habitués of the Duchesse's drawing-room had once been awarded the gold medal of the Salon, that another, Secretary to the Bar Council, had made a brilliant debut in the Chamber, that a third had ably served France as chargé d'affaires, might well have found themselves regarding people who had now done nothing for twenty years as 'failures'. But few of them were apprised of such facts, and the persons concerned would have been the last to remind anyone, since precisely by keeping step with the very spirit of the Guermantes wit, they considered these former claims to distinction as valueless: was it not just such wit that encouraged them to denounce as a toadying bore and as a shop-boy respectively, a couple of eminent ministers, one a trifle solemn, the other with a taste for puns, whose praises were sung by the newspapers, but in whose company Mme de Guermantes would begin to yawn and show signs of impatience if a hostess had unwisely sat them next to her at dinner? Since to be a high-ranking statesman was in no sense a recommendation in the eyes of the Duchesse, those of her friends who had resigned from a 'career' in the diplomatic services or the army, who had never stood for parliament, as they came day after day to lunch and talk with their great friend, or when they encountered her in the houses of royalty (held by them, as it happened, in low esteem – or so they said), felt that they had made the right choice, however much their melancholy air, amid all the gaiety, seemed to suggest that the reality of their feeling was slightly different.

And it must be said that the refinements of society life, the sparkle of conversation at the Guermantes', did have something real about it, even tenuously so. No official office was worth more than the personal charm of certain of Mme de Guermantes's favourites, whom the most powerful ministers would have failed to attract to their houses. If in this salon so many intellectual ambitions and even noble endeavours had been buried for ever, then at least from their dust the rarest flowering of society sophistication had blossomed. Indeed witty men, like Swann for instance, regarded themselves as superior to men of merit, whom they despised, but that was because what the Duchesse prized above all else was not intelligence but – intelligence in a superior form, in her view, rarer, more exquisite, elevating it to a verbal species of talent – wit. And in the past at the Verdurins', when Swann branded Brichot and Elstir as a pedant and an oaf respectively, in the face of all the learning of the one and the genius of the other, it was the infiltration of the Guermantes spirit that had led him to classify them in these terms. Never would he have ventured to present either of them to the Duchesse, in his instinctive awareness of the manner in which she would have received Brichot's verbal onslaughts and Elstir's 'tosh', since to the Guermantes mind pretentious and prolix speech in a serious or farcical vein was consigned to the category of the most intolerable imbecility.

As for those Guermantes of the true flesh and blood, if the Guermantes spirit had not infected them as completely in a way that is familiar in literary coteries for example, where everyone has identical pronunciation, enunciation and, as a consequence of this, the same way of thinking, it was certainly not because originality is more strongly ingrained in society circles and therefore inhibits imitation. But imitation requires not only the absence of any unsuppressible originality, but also a relatively skilful ear enabling you first of all to discern what you will then go on to imitate. And there were Guermantes who lacked this musical sense just as completely as the Courvoisiers.

To take as an example the activity that is known (in another sense of the word imitation) as 'giving an imitation of someone' (the Guermantes called it 'doing take-offs'), Mme de Guermantes could do these to perfection until she dropped, and still the Courvoisiers were as incapable of realizing what was going on as if they had been a bunch of rabbits instead of men and women, because they had never managed to observe the particular defect or accent the Duchesse was endeavouring to impersonate. When she 'took off' the Duc de Limoges, the Courvoisiers would protest: 'Oh, no, he doesn't really speak like that. I dined with him again at Bebeth's last night and he talked to me all evening. He didn't speak like that at all!' whereas any Guermantes who had a smattering of culture would exclaim: 'My word, how droll Oriane is! The startling thing is that when she's mimicking him she actually looks like him! It's as if he's in the room. Oriane, do give us a little more Limoges!' Now Guermantes like these (without even including those utterly remarkable members of the family who greeted the Duchesse's impersonations of the Duc de Limoges with the admiring remarks: 'Oh, you really have got him off to a tee!' or 'You do get him exactly right!') might well be devoid of wit in Mme de Guer mantes's eyes (and she was right about this), but by dint of hearing and repeating the Duchesse's words they had managed, more or less, to end up imitating her way of expressing herself, of judging people, everything that Swann, like the Duchesse herself, would have called her way of 'editing' what she said, so that in their conversation they presented something which seemed to the Courvoisiers to be uncomfortably close to Oriane's wit, and which they themselves regarded as Guermantes wit. Since such Guermantes were to her not only kinsfolk but admirers into the bargain, Oriane (who kept the rest of the family strictly at arm's length and now used her disdain to avenge the spitefulness they had shown her in her girlhood) went to call on them now and again, generally accompanied by the Duc, when she drove out with him in the summer months. These visits were quite something. As she entertained her guests in her large drawing-room on the ground floor, the Princesse d'Épinay's heart would miss a beat when she saw from a distance, like the first glimmer of a harmless enough fire or the 'scouting party' of an unexpected invasion, making her way slowly across the courtyard in a diagonal, the Duchesse wearing a stunning hat and tilting a parasol which wafted summer fragrance. 'Why, it's Oriane,' she would remark, as if she were saying 'On guard!' as a prudent warning to her lady visitors, so that they should have time to retreat in an orderly manner and evacuate the drawing-rooms without panic. Half the people present did not dare to stay and would rise to go. 'But please, why? Do sit down again, you really must do me the pleasure of staying a little longer,' the Princesse would say in an off-hand, easy manner (to show she was a grande dame) but in a voice that now rang false. 'You may well have things to say to each other. – No? you're in a hurry? Oh, very well, I shall come and see you,' the lady of the house would reply to those whom she would just as soon see take their departure. The Duc and the Duchesse would give a very courteous greeting to the people they had been seeing there for years though without ever coming to know them any better, while for their part the people concerned had the good sense scarcely to muster a good-day. Scarcely had they left the room before the Duc would begin to enquire benignly who they were, to give the impression that he was taking an interest in the intrinsic quality of people he never received on account of the malevolence of fate or the state of Oriane's nerves, on which the company of women had a harmful effect: 'Tell me, who was that little woman in the pink hat? – But, my dear cousin, you've seen her hundreds of times, she's the Vicomtesse de Tours, one of the Lamarzelles by birth. – But what I'm saying is she was pretty and she has a lively look about her. If it weren't for a slight defect in her upper lip, I'd say she was quite stunning. If there's a Vicomte de Tours, the man can't have a dull moment. Oriane, do you know who her eyebrows and hair line reminded me of? Your cousin Hedwige de Ligne.' The Duchesse de Guermantes, who was apt to become listless whenever mention was made of any woman other than herself, let the subject drop. She had not reckoned with her husband's weakness for letting it be known that he knew all about the people he did not personally receive, a trait of his which convinced him that he showed himself to be more 'serious' than his wife. 'But, he would suddenly exclaim emphatically, you mentioned the name Lamarzelle. I remember, when I was in the Chamber, hearing a remarkable speech made … – That was the uncle of the young woman you saw a moment ago. – Indeed! What talent!… No, my dear girl,' he assured the Vicomtesse d'Egremont, whom Mme de Guermantes could not endure but who, in her refusal to budge from the Princesse d'Épinay's drawing-room, where she willingly demeaned herself in the role of parlour-maid (even if this did not stop her from slapping her own when she returned home), stayed there, abashed and tearful, but stayed there all the same, when the ducal couple were present, taking their cloaks, trying to make herself useful, discreetly offering to retire to the next room, 'you're not to make tea for us, let's just sit and talk together, we're unassuming people, no fuss. Besides,' he went on, turning to the Princesse d'Épinay (leaving Mistress d'Egremont to her blushes, abasement, ambition and zealous attentiveness), 'we can only spare you a quarter of an hour.' This quarter of an hour would be entirely devoted to a sort of exhibition of the witty remarks made by the Duchesse during the previous week and which she herself would have certainly made no mention of had not her husband, by appearing, with great adroitness, to scold her by alluding to the incidents that had provoked them, obliged her to repeat them as though reluctantly.

The Princesse d'Épinay, who was fond of her cousin and knew that she had a weakness for compliments, would go into raptures over her hat, her parasol, her witty remarks. 'You can talk to her as long as you like about her clothes,' the Duc would say in the gruff tone he had assumed and then tempered with a wicked smile so that his gruffness should not be taken seriously, 'but for heaven's sake don't speak to her about her wit. I could well do without having such a witty wife. You're probably thinking of the disgraceful pun she made about my brother Palamède,' he added, knowing quite well that the Princesse and the rest of the family had not yet heard it, and delighted to have an excuse for showing off his wife. 'In the first place, I find it quite disgraceful that someone who, I have to admit, has occasionally said some quite good things, should make bad puns, but especially about my brother, who is very touchy, and if it's going to lead to any unpleasantness between us, that would really be taking things too far!

– But we've no idea! One of Oriane's puns? It's sure to be outstanding. Oh, do tell us?

– No, no, rejoined the Duc, still gruff but his face lighting up with a smile. I'm more than glad you haven't heard it. Seriously now, I'm very fond of my brother.

– Look here, Basin,' the Duchesse would exclaim, the moment having come for her to take up her husband's cue, 'I can't think why on earth you should say that it might annoy Palamdè, you know quite well it would do nothing of the sort. He's far too intelligent to take umbrage at a stupid joke which has nothing offensive about it. You'll make people think I said something nasty when I simply came out with something that wasn't in the least funny. You're the one who's making a mountain out of it by getting so indignant. I simply don't understand you.

– You're intriguing us horribly. What's it all about?

– Oh, obviously nothing serious! exclaimed M. de Guermantes. You may have heard that my brother wanted to give Brézé, the country house he got from his wife, to his sister Marsantes.

– Indeed, but we were told that she didn't want it, that she didn't care for that part of the country, that the climate didn't suit her.

– Exactly. Well, someone told my wife all about it and said that if my brother was giving this house to our sister it wasn't so much to please her as to tease her. What this person actually said was that Charlus was such a tease. Well, you know Brézé is fit for a king. It must be worth millions. It used to be crown property and it has one of the finest forests in France. There are plenty of people who'd be only too delighted to be teased about something like that. And so when she heard the word "tease" applied to Charlus because he was giving away such a marvellous property, Oriane couldn't stop herself bursting out, quite involuntarily, I have to say, without any hint of malice – it came out like a flash of lightning – with the words: "A tease? A teaser? Then he must be Teaser Augustus!" You understand,' he went on, resuming his gruff tone, but not before he had cast a sweeping glance round the room to see how his wife's witticism had been taken – and in some doubt as to the extent of Mme d'Épinay's knowledge of ancient history, 'you understand, it's an allusion to Augustus Caesar, the Roman Emperor. It's rather stupid, a bad play on words, quite unworthy of Oriane. But then I'm more circumspect than my wife. I may be less witty, but I think of the consequences. Should the remark reach my brother's ears by some ghastly misfortune, life won't be worth living. All the more so, he added, because Palamède as you know is very high and mighty and a great stickler in these matters, very sensitive to gossip. You have to admit that, quite apart from this business of Brézé, "Teaser Augustus" suits him really quite well. That's what redeems my wife's witticisms: even when she stoops to feeble puns, she's always witty and she really does describe people rather well.'

And so, thanks on one occasion to 'Teaser Augustus', on another to something else, the visits the Duc and Duchesse paid to their kinsfolk replenished the stock of anecdotes, and the excitement they caused lasted long after the witty lady and her impresario had left. The hostess in question would begin by lingering delightedly with the privileged guests who had been at the entertainment (those who had remained, that is) upon the clever things Oriane had come out with. 'You hadn't heard "Teaser Augustus"? the Princesse d'Épinay would ask. – But of course, the Marquise de Bavano would reply with a blush, the Princesse de Sarsina-La Rochefoucauld told me about it, but not in quite the same terms. But it must have been so much more interesting to hear it repeated like that in the company of my cousin,' she added, as though she had been speaking of a song accompanied by the composer himself. 'We were speaking about Oriane's latest sally – she was here just now, people would say to some recently arrived caller who was bound to be extremely upset that she had not come an hour earlier.

– What! has Oriane been here?

– Yes indeed, if you'd come a little earlier…' the Princesse d'Épinay would reply, not exactly reproachfully, but making it clear how much the blunderer had missed. She had only herself to blame if she had not been present at the creation of the world or at Mme Carvalho's latest performance.[49] 'What do you think of Oriane's latest? I must say I really like "Teaser Augustus",' and the witticism would be served up again cold at lunch the next day in the company of a few close friends invited for the purpose, and would reappear with different sauces throughout the rest of the week. Indeed that very week Mme d'Épinay, in the course of her annual visit to the Princess of Parma, seized the opportunity to ask whether Her Royal Highness had heard the witticism, and repeated it to her. 'Ah! "Teaser Augustus",' said the Princess of Parma, wide-eyed with admiration aforethought, but begging for complementary glosses which Mme d' Épinay was by no means loth to furnish. 'I have to admit that I like Teaser Augustus enormously as a piece of "editing",' the Princesse concluded. In fact the word 'editing' was not at all appropriate for the pun in question, but the Princesse d'Épinay, who had the temerity to believe that she had inherited part of the Guermantes wit, had borrowed the expressions 'original edition' and 'editing' from Oriane and used them rather indiscriminately. Now the Princess of Parma, who was not over-fond of Mme d'Épinay, whom she considered ill-favoured, knew to be penny-pinching and believed, on the authority of the Courvoisiers, to be malicious, recognized the word 'editing', which she had heard Mme de Guermantes use but would not herself have known how or when to apply. She came to the vague conclusion that it must indeed have been the 'original editing' that formed the attraction of 'Teaser Augustus' and, without quite forgetting her antipathy towards her plain and miserly guest, could not repress a hint of admiration for a person endowed to such a degree with the Guermantes wit, so much so that she was on the point of inviting the Princesse d'Épinay to the Opéra. She was held back by the thought that it would perhaps be wiser to consult Mme de Guermantes first. As for Mme d'Épinay, who, unlike the Courvoisiers, was for ever going out of her way to be obliging to Oriane and was genuinely fond of her, though jealous of her fashionable friends and slightly irritated by the fun the Duchesse made of her in front of everyone on account of her meanness, she reported, when she returned home, how hard the Princess of Parma had found it to grasp the point of 'Teaser Augustus' and declared what a snob Oriane must be to number such a cuckoo among her friends. 'I should never have been able to call regularly on the Princess of Parma even if I'd wanted to, she told the friends who were dining with her, because M. d'Épinay would have never allowed it on account of her immorality,' alluding to certain purely fictive excesses on the Princess's part. 'But even if I had had a more lenient husband, I have to say that I could never have called on her on a regular basis. I don't know how Oriane can support going to see her so frequently. I go there once a year, and it's all I can do to stay to the end of my call.' As for those of the Courvoisiers who happened to be at Victurnienne's[50] on the day of Mme de Guermantes's visit, the Duchesse's arrival put most of them to flight on account of their exasperation at the 'high-fangled salaams' people directed at Oriane. One alone remained on the day of 'Teaser Augustus'. He did not quite see the point, but he half-understood it, being an educated man. And the Courvoisiers went about repeating that Oriane had called Uncle Palamède 'Caesar Augustus', which was, according to them, a good enough description of him. 'But why all this endless fuss about Oriane, they pursued. People couldn't create more fuss if she were a queen. After all, what is Oriane? I'm not saying that the Guermantes aren't an old family, but the Courvoisiers are in no way inferior to them, neither in illustriousness, antiquity nor marriage alliances. It must not be forgotten that on the Field of the Cloth of Gold,[51] when the King of England asked François I who was the noblest of the lords there present, the King of France replied, "Courvoisier, Sire." ' But even if all the Courvoisiers had stayed in the room to hear them, Oriane's words would have fallen on deaf ears, since the incidents that usually gave rise to them would have been regarded by them from a totally different point of view. If, for instance, a Courvoisier found herself running out of chairs in the middle of a reception she was giving, or if she mistook the name when she was talking to a guest whose face she did not recall, or if one of her servants said something stupid, the Courvoisier lady, extremely annoyed, flushed, quivering with agitation, would deplore so unfortunate an occurrence. And when she had a gentleman visitor in the room and Oriane was expected, she would ask in an anxious and imperious tone: 'Do you know her?', fearing that if her visitor was not acquainted with her, his presence might make a bad impression on Oriane. But on the contrary, Mme de Guermantes used such incidents as opportunities to invent stories which would make the Guermantes laugh until the tears ran down their cheeks, so that one was forced to envy the lady in question for having run out of chairs, for having made a gaffe or allowing her servant to make one, for having received someone no one else knew, as one is forced to be thankful that famous authors have been kept at a distance and betrayed by women when their humiliations and sufferings have been, if not the actual goad to their genius, then at least the subject matter of their writings.

The Courvoisiers were equally incapable of rising to the spirit of innovation the Duchesse de Guermantes introduced into society life and which, adapted by her with unerring instinct to the demands of the moment, made it into something artistic, when the purely mechanical application of hard and fast rules would have produced results as unfortunate as those faced by a man who, anxious to succeed in love or in politics, had in his own life followed the exploits of Bussy d'Amboise[52] to the letter. If the Courvoisiers gave a family dinner or a dinner-party to meet some prince, the additional presence of some man of wit or some friend of their son seemed to them sufficiently anomalous to produce the direst consequences. A Courvoisier lady, whose father had been a minister under the Empire and who had to give an afternoon reception in honour of the Princesse Mathilde, deduced with geometrical logic that she could invite only Bonapartists. She knew practically none. All the smart women of her acquaintance, all the presentable men she knew, were ruthlessly barred because, with their Legitimist views or affiliations, they might, according to Courvoisier logic, have given offence to Her Imperial Highness. The latter, who in her own house was accustomed to receive the flower of the Faubourg Saint-Germain, was somewhat surprised when all she found at Mme de Courvoisier's was a notorious old sponger, a widow whose husband had been a préfet under the Empire, the widow of the Postmaster General and a handful of other people known for their loyalty to Napoleon III, for their stupidity and dreariness. Yet the Princesse Mathilde was far from chary with her flow of sweetness and sovereign grace towards these disastrous plain Janes, whom the Duchesse de Guermantes, for her part, took good care not to invite when it was her turn to entertain the Princesse, but invited instead, without any a priori reasoning about Bonapartism, the most choice assembly of all the beautiful women, of every cast of mind, of every celebrity whom, by some flair, some subtle sense of tact, she felt likely to be acceptable to the niece of the Emperor, even when they actually belonged to the Royal House. Even the Duc d'Aumale was present, and when, as she made her exit, the Princesse raised Mme de Guermantes from her deep curtsey and her attempt to kiss her hand, and kissed her on both cheeks, it was from the bottom of her heart that she was able to assure the Duchesse that she had never spent so agreeable an afternoon nor attended so successful a party. The Princess of Parma was a Courvoisier in that she was incapable of innovation in social matters, but unlike the Courvoisiers in that the surprises the Duchesse de Guermantes perpetually held in store for her engendered in her not, as in them, antipathy but a sense of wonder. This reaction was further intensified by the fact that the Princess's state of culture lagged enormously behind the times. Mme de Guermantes was herself a great deal less advanced than the Princess supposed. But it only needed for her to be the tiniest bit more advanced than Mme de Parme to astound the latter, and, as each generation of critics confines itself to maintaining a diametrically opposite view of the truths espoused by its predecessors, she had only to say that Flaubert, that enemy of the bourgeois, was a bourgeois to his finger-tips or that there was a great deal of Italian music in Wagner, to expose the Princess, at the cost of constantly renewed mental exhaustion, as the swimmer's eyes are exposed in a stormy sea, to horizons that seemed to her to be unimaginable and condemned to remain dim. Stupefaction was also caused by the paradoxes uttered not merely in connection with works of art but with persons of their acquaintance and with current goings-on in society. No doubt the incapacity that prevented Mme de Parme from distinguishing the genuine Guermantes wit from certain crudely acquired manifestations of it (this tended to make her believe in the high intellectual worth of certain Guermantes, especially certain female members of the family, whom she later found herself bewildered to hear described by the Duchesse as utter dimwits), was one of the causes of the astonishment the Princess invariably felt when she heard Mme de Guermantes pass judgment on other people. But there was also a further reason, one which I, who knew more about books than people at that time, more about literature than about life, explained to myself with the thought that the Duchesse, by thriving on this worldly life, the idleness and sterility of which are to real social activity what, in art, criticism is to creativity, extended to the members of her circle the instability of viewpoint, the unhealthy thirst, of the quibbler who, in order to slake a mind too desiccated, goes in search of any old paradox that is at all fresh and will not hesitate to uphold the thirst-quenching opinion that the great Iphigénie is Piccini's and not Gluck's, and at a pinch that the true Phèdre is the one by Pradon.[53]

When an intelligent, educated, witty woman had married a diffident lout who was seldom seen and never heard, Mme de Guermantes would get it into her head one fine day to indulge in an intellectual thrill not only by decrying the wife but in 'discovering' the husband. In regard to the Cambremer household, for instance, had she found herself living in such a section of society at the time, she would have decreed that Mme de Cambremer was stupid, and by contrast, that the interesting party, misunderstood and delightful, condemned to silence by a prattling wife but worth a thousand of her kind himself, was the Marquis, and by declaring this the Duchesse would have felt the same sense of refreshing relief as the critic who, after people had been admiring Hernani for seventy years, confesses to a preference for Le Lion amoureux.[54] From this same morbid need of arbitrary novelty, if there was a model wife, a saintly woman whom people had been pitying since her youth for being married to a scoundrel, a day would come when it would occur to Mme de Guermantes to assert that this scoundrel was perhaps a frivolous man but one with a heart of gold, and that he had been driven to utterly irresponsible behaviour by the implacable harshness of his wife. I knew that in the long course of the centuries it was not only with the works of different artists but actually with the various works of one artist, that critics had enjoyed pushing back into the shade what for too long had been radiant, and bringing into the light what had seemed doomed to permanent obscurity. Not only had I seen Bellini, Winterhalter, the Jesuit architects, a Restoration cabinet maker,[55] come to take the place of men of genius, who were described as tired simply because idle intellectuals had grown tired of them, in the same way that neurasthenics are tired and faddish. I had seen Sainte-Beuve preferred alternately as critic and poet, Musset rejected for his verse apart from a few insignificant pieces, and vaunted as a writer of stories. No doubt it is wrong of certain essayists to set above the most famous scenes of Le Cid or Polyeucte some speech from Le Menteur[56] which, like an old plan, gives us information about the Paris of the day, but their predilection, justified if not by aesthetic considerations then by documentary interest, is still too rational for the irrationality of critical taste. It will give away all of Molière for a single line of L'Étourdi,[57] and, even when it pronounces Wagner's Tristan to be deadly boring, will make an exception of 'a charming note on the horns' at the point where the hunt goes by. This depravity of judgment helped me to understand the similar tendency in Mme de Guermantes which led her to conclude that a man of their circle, who was recognized as a good chap but a fool, was a monster of egoism, shrewder than people thought, that another, who was well known for his generosity, might be taken as the personification of avarice, that a good mother had no time for her children, and that a woman who was thought to be loose was really someone of the noblest sentiments. As though vitiated by the inanity of society life, Mme de Guermantes's intelligence and sensibility were too vacillating for disgust not to follow pretty swiftly in the wake of infatuation (even if it meant that she was still ready to be attracted once more by the kind of cleverness which she had alternately sought and abandoned) and for the charm she had seen in some kind-hearted man not to change, if he came to see her too often or took it too much for granted that she would be able to guide him in a way she could not, into an irritation she believed came from her admirer but which was due in effect to the utter impossibility of finding pleasure when one spends all one's time looking for it. The Duchesse's vagaries of judgment spared no one, except her husband. He alone had never loved her; in him she had always sensed a soul of iron, indifferent to her caprices, disdainful of her beauty, violent, one of those unbendable wills under whose domination alone highly-strung people can set themselves at rest. For his own part, M. de Guermantes, pursuing a single model of feminine beauty but seeking it in mistresses whom he regularly replaced, had, once he had left them, as his accomplice in mocking them, one lasting and identical associate whose chatter often irritated him, but whom he knew that everyone regarded as the most beautiful, the most virtuous, the cleverest, the most cultured woman among the aristocracy, as a wife whom he, M. de Guermantes, was only too lucky to have found, who covered up for all his carryings-on, entertained like no one else in the world and sustained the reputation of their salon as the foremost one in the whole Faubourg Saint-Germain. This was a common opinion that he himself shared; often out of sorts with his wife, he was proud of her. If, being as tight with money as he was ostentatious, he refused her the most petty sums for charities or for the servants, he insisted on her having the most sumptuous clothes and the finest equipages to be had. Finally, he was anxious to show off his wife's wit. Now, whenever Mme de Guermantes had just thought up some new and savoury paradox suddenly setting askew the merits and defects of one of their friends, she would be dying to try it out on those who were capable of appreciating it, to bring out the full flavour of its psychological originality and the brilliance of its lapidary malice. These new opinions probably and usually contained no more truth than previous ones, often less; but this very element of the arbitrary and the unexpected gave them something intellectual which made them thrilling to communicate. Only, the patient on whom the Duchesse had exercised her psychological gifts was normally an intimate friend in regard to whom the people she was keen to present with her discovery were utterly unaware that he did not still figure at the centre of her good books; and there was also the fact that Mme de Guermantes's reputation for being an incomparable friend, feeling, tender and devoted, made it difficult for her to launch the attack herself; the most she could do was to intervene later, as though under constraint, by taking up her cue in order to appease and, to all effects and purposes, to contradict but to actually support a partner who had taken it upon himself to provoke her; this was precisely the role in which M. de Guermantes excelled.

As for social behaviour, Mme de Guermantes experienced yet another arbitrarily theatrical pleasure in expressing some of those views on the subject which whipped the Princess of Parma into a state of perpetual and delicious surprise. But the particular pleasure the Duchesse experienced in this area was something whose nature I tried to comprehend not so much with the help of literary criticism as with instances of political life and the reports of parliamentary debates. Since the flow of contradictory edicts by which Mme de Guermantes constantly reversed the scale of values among the people of her world was no longer enough to distract her, she also sought, in the way she conducted her own social behaviour and accounted for her own most trifling decisions on society matters, to savour those artificial emotions, to fulfil those artificial duties which stir the feelings of parliaments and impress themselves on the minds of those who dabble in politics. We know that when a minister explains to the Chamber that he believed he was doing the right thing in following a line of conduct which actually seems quite straightforward to the common-sense person who sees the report of the sitting in his newspaper the next morning, nevertheless this common-sense reader feels suddenly stirred, and begins to doubt whether he was right to approve the minister's conduct, when he reads that the latter's speech was heard amid an uproar and punctuated with expressions of reprehension such as: 'It's a disgrace!' uttered by a deputy whose name and titles take up so much space in the report and are followed by an account of such emphatic reactions on his part, that in the space devoted to describing this outburst, the words 'It's a disgrace!' occupy less room than a hemistitch in an alexandrine. For instance in the days when M. de Guermantes, the Prince des Laumes, sat in the Chamber, one would read the following sort of thing in the Paris newspapers, though what one was reading was intended primarily for the Méséglise constituency, to show the electorate there that they had not given their votes to an inactive or dumb representative:

MONSIEUR DE GUERMANTES-BOUILLON, PRINCE DES LAUMES: 'This is a serious matter, gentlemen.' (Hear, hear! from the centre and from some of the benches on the right, loud exclamations from the extreme left.)

The common-sense reader still retains a glimmer of loyalty to the wise minister, but finds his heart stirred by fresh palpitations when he reads the first words of the speaker who rises to reply to this:

'The astonishment, or should one say stupor even (tangible stirrings on the right side of the House) caused me by the words of one who is still, I presume, a member of the Government…' (thunderous applause; several deputies then rush forward towards the ministerial bench; the Under-Secretary of State for Postal and Telegraphic Services, without rising from his seat, gives a nod of approval.)

This 'thunderous applause' banishes the last vestige of resistance from the mind of the common-sense reader; he regards as an insult to the Chamber, a monstrous insult, what is in fact a way of proceeding that is intrinsically insignificant; it may be some quite predictable item, such as wanting to make the wealthy pay more than the poor, the exposure of some iniquity, the preference for peace over war, and he will find it scandalous and see it as going against certain principles to which he had actually never given a thought, principles not engraved in the heart of man, but ones that move him strongly on account of the acclamations they provoke and the close-knit majorities they rally together.

It must at the same time be recognized that this subtlety on the part of politicians which served to explain the Guermantes circle to me and, at a later stage, other social groups, is no more than the perversion of a particular nicety of interpretation often described by the expression 'reading between the lines'. If representative assemblies contain elements of this absurdity, brought about by the perversion of such nicety of distinction, they also contain elements of stupidity, brought about by the lack of it, in the public, who take everything literally, who do not suspect dismissal when a high dignitary is relieved of his office 'at his own request', and say: 'He cannot have been dismissed, because he was the one who asked to go,' nor suspect defeat when, in the face of the Japanese advance, the Russians strategically fall back on stronger positions, prepared in advance, nor a refusal when a province has demanded its independence from the German Emperor and he cedes it religious autonomy. But to revert to these sessions in the Chamber, it is also possible that when they commence, the deputies themselves are like the common-sense person who will read the report in the newspapers. Informed that a group of workers on strike have sent their delegates to parley with a minister, they may ask themselves naïvely: 'Well, well, I wonder what they've been talking about? Let's hope it's all settled,' at the very moment the minister rises to address the Chamber in a solemn silence that is already setting the tone for artificial emotions. The minister's first words ('There is no need for me to inform the Chamber that I have too high a sense of government duty to have received a deputation which the authority invested in me is under no obligation to take into account') produce a dramatic effect, for this was the one hypothesis that the common sense of the deputies had failed to anticipate. But precisely because of its dramatic effect, it is greeted with such applause that it takes several minutes before the minister can make himself heard again, and he will return to his bench to be congratulated by his colleagues. They are as deeply moved as they were on the day he failed to invite the chairman of the municipal council, a man who supported the Opposition, to a grand official reception, and his colleagues declare that on this occasion as on the previous one he has acted like a true statesman.

At this period of his life, M. de Guermantes had, to the great scandal of the Courvoisiers, often been among the crowd of colleagues who came forward to congratulate the minister. I later heard it said that even at a time when he was playing a fairly important role in the Chamber and was being thought of as a likely candidate for ministerial office or for an embassy, when a friend came to ask him a favour, he was infinitely less affected, and his political behaviour a great deal less that of a person of importance, than anyone else who did not happen to be the Duc de Guermantes. For if he said that nobility was of little account, that he considered his colleagues to be his equals, he actually believed no such thing. He sought, and pretended to value but in fact despised political status, and since in his own eyes he remained M. de Guermantes, it did not cocoon his person in the sort of starchiness of high office which affects others and makes them unapproachable. And in this respect his pride was a protection against every assault not only for his behaviour, which was ostentatiously familiar, but for any genuine simplicity he might actually possess. To return to the artificial, dramatic decisions of his wife, so like those of politicians, Mme de Guermantes was no less disconcerting to the Guermantes, the Courvoisiers, the Faubourg in general and the Princess of Parma most especially, in her habit of issuing unexpected decrees behind which one sensed certain principles, all the more impressive the less one was aware of them. If the new Greek Minister gave a fancy dress ball, everyone chose a costume and everyone wondered what the Duchesse would wear. One lady imagined that she would appear as the Duchesse de Bourgogne, another suggested the Princess of Deryabar[58] as a likelihood, a third as Psyche. Finally a Courvoisier asked: 'What are you going as, Oriane?' and received the tart rejoinder: 'Why, nothing at all!', the only response no one had thought of, and one which set every tongue wagging in relation to what was seen as something that revealed Oriane's opinion as to the true social position of the new Greek Minister and the proper form to be adopted towards him, that is to say the opinion which ought to have been anticipated, namely that a Duchesse 'was not obliged' to attend the fancy dress ball given by this new minister. 'I don't see that there's any necessity to go to the Greek Minister's: I don't know him; I'm not Greek; so why should I go to his house? I have no cause for social intercourse in such a place,' said the Duchesse.

'But everyone's going, it will be charming, from everything I hear, cried Mme de Gallardon.

– But it's also just as charming to stay at home by one's own fireside,' rejoined Mme de Guermantes.

The Courvoisiers could not get over this, but the Guermantes, without following suit with their cousin, approved: 'Of course, not everyone's in a position like Oriane to flout convention so utterly. But in a sense you can't say she's wrong in her desire to show that we do rather overstep the mark in grovelling before these foreigners, when we're not always sure quite where they come from.'

Naturally Mme de Guermantes, perfectly aware of the string of comments which either attitude would provoke, derived as much pleasure from appearing at a party at which the hostess dared not rely on her presence as she did by staying at home or spending the evening at the theatre with her husband, on the night of a party to which 'everyone was going', or else, when people imagined that she would put the finest diamonds to shame by wearing some antique historic tiara, by making her entrance without a single jewel and wearing a style of dress quite different from the one that people had wrongly supposed to be obligatory for the occasion in hand. Although she was anti-Dreyfusard (while believing Dreyfus to be innocent, just as she devoted her time to society life while believing only in the life of the mind), she had created a stunning sensation at a party given by the Princesse de Ligne, first of all by remaining seated when all the ladies present had risen to their feet as Général Mercier[59] entered the room, and then by getting up and asking for her carriage in a voice for all to hear when a nationalist speaker had started to hold forth, thereby showing that in her opinion talking politics had no place in the world of society; all heads had turned in her direction at a Good Friday concert at which, although a Voltairean, she had felt it indecent to bring Christ on to the stage. We know how important, even for the great queens of society, that time of year is when the social calendar commences: so much so that the Marquise d'Amoncourt, who, with her burning need to say something (a psychological quirk, and a lack of sensitivity to boot), always ended up making a fool of herself, had even gone so far as to reply to someone who had called to offer their condolences on the death of her father, M. de Montmorency: 'I think what makes such grief more difficult to bear is that it should come at a time when one's mantelpiece is simply smothered in invitation cards.' Well, at this point in the social calendar, when anyone invited the Duchesse de Guermantes to dine, with great urgency in case she was already engaged, she would turn down the invitation with the one excuse which no society person would ever have thought of: she was about to set off on a cruise – 'quite fascinating, my dear!' – of the Norwegian fjords. Society people were thunderstruck by this, and, without any notion of following the Duchesse's example, nevertheless derived from her project the sense of relief you get when you read Kant and when, after the most rigorous demonstration of determinism, it transpires that above the world of necessity there is the world of freedom. Every really original invention stirs the interest even of people who can derive no benefit from it. The invention of steam navigation was almost nothing when compared to the implementation of steam navigation at that sedentary time of the year known as 'the season'. The idea that anyone could turn down a hundred dinners or luncheon-parties on purpose, twice as many tea-parties, three times as many receptions, the most brilliant Mondays at the Opéra and Tuesdays at the Théâtre Français to visit the Norwegian fjords was no more explicable to the Courvoisiers than the idea of Twenty Thousand Leagues under the Sea, but it conveyed to them a similar impression of independence and charm. So that not a day passed without somebody being heard to ask, not merely: 'You've heard Oriane's latest quip?' but 'You know Oriane's latest?' And following upon 'Oriane's latest?' and 'Oriane's latest quip', people would say: 'How typical of Oriane!', 'Isn't that sterling Oriane for you?' For instance, Oriane's latest might be that, finding herself obliged to write on behalf of some patriotic circle to Cardinal X, Bishop of Mâcon (normally referred to by M. de Guermantes as 'Monsieur de Mascon', because he thought this to be more 'traditional'), when everybody was trying to figure out what form her letter would take, and had no problem as to the opening address, the choice being between 'Eminence' and 'Monseigneur', but was in a quandary as to the rest, Oriane's letter, to the general astonishment, began: 'Monsieur le Cardinal', following an old Academic formula, or 'My cousin', this term being in use among the Princes of the Church, the Guermantes and crowned heads of state, who were accustomed to praying God to take each and all of them into 'His fit and holy keeping'. All that was needed to start people talking about 'Oriane's latest' was to be in a theatre at which everyone who was anyone in Paris was present for the performance of some charming play, to look for Mme de Guermantes in the Princess of Parma's box, in the box of the Princesse de Guermantes, or in those of countless others who might have invited her, and to discover her sitting by herself, dressed in black, wearing a diminutive hat, in a stall in which she had taken up her seat before the curtain went up. 'You can hear better, when it's a play that's worth listening to,' she would explain to the scandalized Courvoisiers, the admiringly bewildered Guermantes and the Princess of Parma, who suddenly became convinced that the 'fashion' for hearing the beginning of a play was more up to date, betokened more originality and intelligence (no surprise coming from Oriane) than late arrival for the last act after a grand dinner-party and a look-in at some reception or other. These then were the various ways of astonishing people for which the Princess of Parma knew she ought to be prepared if she asked Mme de Guermantes about some literary or society matter, and which meant that, during these dinner-parties at the Duchesse's, Her Royal Highness never broached the slightest subject unless it was with the uneasy and titillating caution of the bather emerging from between two knife-edged breakers.

Among the elements that were absent from the two or three other roughly equivalent leading salons of the Faubourg Saint-Germain and differentiated the Duchesse's own from them, just as Leibniz allows that each monad reflects the whole universe and also adds to it something of its own, one of the least attractive was normally furnished by one or two extremely beautiful women who had no other claim to be there but their beauty and the use to which M. de Guermantes had put it, and whose presence revealed at once, as does the presence of otherwise unaccountable paintings in other salons, that in this one the husband was a passionate connoisseur of the feminine graces. These women were all more or less the same; for the Duc had a taste for tall women, at once statuesque and nonchalant, of a type half-way between the Venus de Milo and the Winged Mercury; often fair-haired, rarely dark, occasionally auburn, like the most recent addition, who was at this dinner, the very Vicomtesse d'Arpajon with whom he had been so enamoured that for a long time he had obliged her to send him as many as ten telegrams a day (to the Duchesse's mild irritation) and corresponded with her by carrier pigeon when he was staying at Guermantes, and from whose company in fact he had long been so incapable of tearing himself away that, one winter which he had been forced to spend in Parma, he travelled back to Paris every week, making a two-day journey in order to see her.

In the normal run of events, these bit-part beauties had once been his mistresses but no longer were (as in the case of Mme d'Arpajon) or were on the point of ceasing to be. It may well have been that the glamour the Duchesse held in their eyes and the hope of being invited to her salon, though they themselves came from highly aristocratic backgrounds, however second-rank, had prompted them, even more than the good looks and generosity of the Duc, to yield to his desires. Not that the Duchesse would have imposed any insurmountable obstacle in the way of their being admitted to her society; she was aware that in more than one of them she had found an ally, thanks to whom she had obtained countless things she wanted and which M. de Guermantes pitilessly refused to his wife so long as he was not in love with someone else. And so the reason they were not received by the Duchesse until a liaison was already far advanced was essentially to do with the fact that the Duc, each time he embarked on a full-scale love affair, had expected it to be no more than a brief fling, in exchange for which he considered an invitation from his wife to be excessive. And yet he found himself offering just this as the reward for far less, for a first kiss for instance, because he had met with unexpected resistance or, conversely, because there had been no resistance. In love, it often happens that gratitude, the desire to give pleasure, causes us to be generous beyond the limits of what hope and self-interest had envisaged. But then the implementation of this offer would become hindered by further complications. For a start, all the women who had responded to M. de Guermantes's love, and occasionally even when they had not yet yielded to it, he had kept cut off from the world one after the other. He no longer allowed them to see anyone, spent almost all his time in their company, looked after the education of their children, to whom he sometimes, if one was to judge by certain glaring resemblances later on, had occasion to present a little brother or sister. And if, at the start of the liaison, the idea of an introduction to Mme de Guermantes, utterly absent from the Duc's intentions, had played a part in the mind of the mistress in question, in the course of the liaison the lady's views had altered; the Duc was no longer for her the husband of the most fashionable woman in Paris but a man whom the new mistress was in love with, and a man who had given her the means and the inclination for a more luxurious style of life and had turned upside down her notions of the relative importance of questions of social snobbery and material advantage; and occasionally these mistresses of the Duc were animated by a jealousy of Mme de Guermantes, in which all these factors played a part. But this was extremely rare; besides, when the day set aside for the introduction eventually came round (usually at a time when it had become a matter of more or less indifference to the Duc, whose behaviour, like everyone else's, was more often dictated by previous behaviour than by the original motive for the introduction, which had ceased to operate), it frequently happened that it was Mme de Guermantes who had sought the acquaintance of the mistress, in whom she hoped, and was so very anxious, to find a precious ally against her dreadful husband. None of this means that in their own house, except on rare occasions, when, if the Duchesse talked too much, he let fall a few words or, more dreadful still, maintained an excruciatingly meaningful silence, M. de Guermantes failed in the keeping up of 'outward appearances' towards his wife. People who did not know them might easily be taken in. Sometimes, in the autumn, between the Deauville races, taking the waters, and departure for the hunting-season in Guermantes, in the few weeks which people spend in Paris, since the Duchesse was fond of café-concerts, the Duc would accompany her to one in the evening. The audience noticed at once, in one of the little open boxes where there is just enough room for two people, this Hercules in his 'smoking' (for in France anything that is the least bit British gets given the name it happens not to have in England),[60] his monocle scrunched into his eye, a fat cigar, from which he now and then took a puff, in his fleshy but finely-shaped hand, on the ring-finger of which a sapphire sparkled, keeping his eyes mostly turned towards the stage, but, when he did let them fall upon the audience, in which there was absolutely no one he knew, softening them with a gentle look, reserved, polite and respectful. When a refrain struck him as amusing and not too risqué, the Duc turned round to his wife with a smile and would share with her, with a twinkle of indulgent complicity, the innocent merriment the new song had aroused in him. And the spectators might well have believed that there was no better husband in the world, nor anyone more enviable than the Duchesse – this woman who was excluded from all the real interests in the Duc's life, the woman he did not love and to whom he had never once stopped being unfaithful; when the Duchesse felt tired, the audience would see M. de Guermantes rise to his feet, put on her wrap with his own hands, arranging her necklaces so that they did not catch in the lining, and clear the way for her to the exit with an attentive show of care which she received with the haughty chill of a woman of the world who takes such behaviour for granted, simply as conventional good manners, at times even regards it with the slightly ironical bitterness of the disabused wife who has no illusions left to shatter. Despite these outward appearances – another of the aspects of that politeness which has transferred, at some remote point in time which has never come to an end for those who have survived it, a deep-seated sense of duty from the depths to the surface – the Duchesse did not have an easy life. M. de Guermantes reverted to humane behaviour and generosity only when there was a new mistress, who would, as it happened, more often than not side with the Duchesse: the latter could then see opportunities opening up for her once more to be generous towards inferiors, charitable towards the poor and even, later on, to buy herself a fabulous new motor-car. But the irritation which generally arose fairly rapidly in Mme de Guermantes in regard to persons she found too submissive did not spare the Duc's mistresses. The Duchesse very soon grew tired of them. As it happened, at that time too, the Duc's liaison with Mme d'Arpajon was coming to an end. There was another mistress in the offing.

No doubt the love M. de Guermantes had borne each of them in turn would one day make itself felt anew: for a start this love, as it faded away, bequeathed his mistresses to the surroundings like beautiful marble statues – beautiful to the Duc at least, since part of him became an artist in this respect, because he had loved them and was appreciative now of contours he would not have noticed without making love to them – which juxtaposed, in the Duchesse's drawing-room, their various forms, which had long been hostile to one another, eaten up with jealousies and quarrels, but were finally reconciled in the peace of amity; and then this amity was itself an effect of the love which had caused M. de Guermantes to observe, in the women who had been his mistresses, virtues shared by all human beings but perceptible only to the lover's sensuality, to the point where an ex-mistress who has become 'a really close friend' and would do anything in the world for one has become a cliché, like the doctor or father who is not a doctor or a father but a friend. But during the initial stages of rupture, the woman whom M. de Guermantes was on the point of abandoning would make a fuss, create scenes, become demanding, appear indiscreet and pestering. The Duc would begin to take a sudden dislike to her. At this stage Mme de Guermantes would have the opportunity to bring to light the real or imagined defects of a person who annoyed her. Known to be kind, Mme de Guermantes would take the constant telephone calls from the abandoned mistress, receive her confidences, offer a shoulder to cry on, without complaint. She would laugh about it with her husband, then with a few close friends. And imagining that the sympathy she showed towards the unfortunate woman gave her the right to make fun of her, even to her face, whatever the lady in question might say, provided it could be kept within the bounds of the absurd behaviour that the Duc and herself had recently decided to ascribe to her, Mme de Guermantes had no qualms about exchanging ironically knowing glances on the matter with her husband.

Meanwhile, as she took her place at table, the Princess of Parma suddenly remembered that she had thought of inviting Mme d'Heudicourt to the Opéra, and, seeking assurance about any offence to Mme de Guermantes that might be involved, she was looking for an opportunity to sound her out on the matter. At this point M. de Grouchy came into the room, his train having been held up for an hour owing to a derailment. He offered his apologies as best he could. Had she been a Courvoisier, his wife would have died of shame. But Mme de Grouchy was not a Guermantes for nothing. As her husband was offering his excuses, she broke in:

'I see that even in small matters, arriving late is a tradition in your family.

– Sit down, Grouchy, and don't let them disparage you, said the Duc. While I move with the times, I have to admit that the Battle of Waterloo had its good side, since it brought about the Bourbon Restoration and, better still, in a way that made them unpopular. But it seems to me that you're a real Nimrod![61]

– As it happens, I did get quite a good bag. You'll allow me, of course, to send six brace of pheasant to the Duchesse tomorrow?'

Some thought seemed to flicker in Mme de Guermantes's eyes. She insisted that M. de Grouchy must not put himself to the trouble of sending the pheasants. And signalling to the footman with a fiancée with whom I had chatted on my way from the Elstir room, she said to him:

'You'll go and collect M. le Comte's pheasants tomorrow and bring them straight back. Grouchy, you won't mind if I give a few of them away, will you? Basin and I can't eat a dozen pheasants by ourselves.

– But the day after tomorrow will be soon enough, said M. de Grouchy.

– No, I'd rather it were tomorrow,' the Duchesse insisted. Poullein had turned pale; he would miss his meeting with his fiancée. This was adequate opportunity for the Duchesse to divert the conversation; she liked to cultivate the common touch with people.

'I know it's your day off, she said to Poullein, all you need to do is to change with Georges. He can take tomorrow off and stay here on duty the day after.'

But the day after, Poullein's fiancée would not be free. He had no interest at all in having the day off then. As soon as Poullein had left the room, everyone complimented the Duchesse on her kindness towards her servants.

'But I only treat them as I'd like people to treat me.

– But that's just it. They have every reason to say they've found a good position in this house.

– Nothing so very special about that. But I think they all like me. That one is a trifle irritating because he's in love. He finds it fitting to go about with a lovesick look on his face.'

At this point Poullein re-entered the room.

'You're right, said M. de Grouchy, he doesn't look very cheerful. One needs to be kind to these people, but not too kind.

– I realize that I'm not very good with servants. He'll have nothing to do all day but go and fetch your pheasants, sit around the house doing nothing, then eat his share of the treat.

– There are plenty of people who would be glad to be in his place, said M. de Grouchy. Envy makes people blind.

– Oriane, said the Princess of Parma, I had a visit from your cousin Heudicourt the other day. Of course she's a highly intelligent woman. She's a Guermantes – need one say more? – but they tell me she has a wicked tongue…'

The Duc's eyes met his wife's in a prolonged gaze of deliberate stupefaction. Mme de Guermantes began to laugh. The Princess took some time to become aware of this.

'But… do you mean… you don't agree with me?… she said with some misgiving.

– Really, Madame, it's too good of you to pay any attention to the faces Basin makes. Now, Basin, you're not to insinuate anything nasty about our relatives.

– Does he think she's over-malicious? the Princess asked pointedly.

– Oh, certainly not! came the Duchesse's reply. I don't know who told Your Highness she was malicious. Quite the contrary. She's an excellent creature who never spoke ill of or did any harm to a soul.

– Oh, I see, said Mme de Parme, much relieved, it was not something I had noticed myself either. But I know it's difficult not to be malicious when one has a great deal of wit…

– Ah! now wit is a quality of which she has even less.

– What, less wit? … asked the Princess, stupefied.

– Come now, Oriane, broke in the Duc in a slightly sulky tone, as he darted amused glances about the table, you heard the Princess tell you she was highly intelligent.

– But isn't she?

– Highly wide around the waist, certainly.

– Don't listen to him, Madame, he's not being truthful. She's as stupid as a (euh) goose,' interposed Mme de Guermantes in a loud and husky voice (she had far more 'old-world charm' than the Duc himself could sometimes muster when he was not deliberately trying, but her charm was quite different from the deliquescent, lace-jabot style of her husband and far more subtle in fact, with its almost countrified pronunciation and its delightfully rough, earthy tang.) 'But she's the finest woman in the world. And I'm not sure how far one can talk of stupidity in her case. I don't believe I know anyone like her; she's a case for medical treatment, there's something pathological about her, some sort of natural naïvety, or stupidity, or "retarded development", like the sort of thing you come across in melodramas or in L'Arlésienne.[62] When she comes here, I'm always wondering whether the moment may not have arrived for her intelligence to show itself at last, which always makes me a little jumpy.' These turns of phrase impressed the Princess wonderfully, but she remained flabbergasted by the Duchesse's verdict. 'She told me your joke about "Teaser Augustus" – Mme d'Épinay mentioned it as well. Quite delightful,' she said by way of response.

M. de Guermantes explained the joke to me. I was wanting to tell him that his brother, who pretended not to know me, was expecting me that very evening at eleven. But I had not enquired of Robert whether I might mention this rendezvous and, given that M. de Charlus had arranged it with me in a way that practically contradicted what he had told the Duchesse, I thought it more tactful not to mention it.

' "Teaser Augustus" isn't bad, said M. de Guermantes, but Mme d'Heudicourt probably didn't tell you about the far better remark Oriane made to her the other day in reply to a luncheon invitation?

– Oh, no! Do tell me!

– Come now, Basin, there's no need for that. In the first place it was a stupid remark, and it will make the Princess think me even worse than my dopey cousin. Though I don't know why I call her my cousin. She's one of Basin's cousins. Still, I suppose she is related to me in a sense.

– Oh!' exclaimed the Princess of Parma as she confronted the idea that she could possibly think of Mme de Guermantes as stupid, protesting desperately that nothing could ever make the Duchesse fall from the place she held in her esteem.

'Besides, we've already deprived her of the qualities of the mind and, since the remark you're referring to tends to deny her certain qualities of the heart, it seems to me quite out of place to repeat it.

– "Deny her!" "Out of place!" How well she expresses herself! said the Duc with a pretence of irony, to win admiration for the Duchesse.

– Come, come, Basin, you mustn't make fun of your wife.

– I should explain to your Royal Highness, the Duc went on, that Oriane's cousin may be superior, kind, on the stout side, anything you care to mention, but she isn't exactly – how shall I put it – open-handed.

– Oh, I know, she's terribly close-fisted, the Princess broke in.

– I should not have ventured to put it like that, but you have hit on exactly the right words. It comes across in the way she keeps house, especially the food she serves. It's excellent, but she does eke it out.

– That can give rise to some fairly amusing goings-on, M. de Bréauté broke in. For instance, my dear Basin, I once went down to Heudicourt on a day when you were expected, Oriane and yourself. The most sumptuous preparations had been made, and then, in the afternoon, a footman brought in a telegram to say you weren't coming.

– That doesn't surprise me at all,' said the Duchesse, who was not only difficult to pin down, but liked people to know it.

'Your cousin read the telegram, was bitterly disappointed, then immediately, quick as a flash, telling herself that there was no point in going to unnecessary expense for unimportant nobility such as myself, she called the footman back: "Tell the cook not to put on the chicken," she shouted. And that evening I heard her asking the butler: "And what about yesterday's left-over beef? Aren't you going to serve it up?"

– All the same, one has to say that the fare one gets there is of the best,' said the Duc, who imagined that the use of this word would show him to be very much of the old school. 'I know of no establishment where one eats better.

– Or less, the Duchesse chipped in.

– The food is quite wholesome and quite adequate for what you would call an old Farmer Grimes like myself, the Duc went on. One doesn't over-indulge.

– Oh, if we are to understand it as taking a cure, then that's another matter; it's clearly more health-inspired than rich and copious. Not that's it's that special,' Mme de Guermantes added as someone who was not too keen that the award of 'best table in Paris' should go to any table but her own. 'My cousin follows the same pattern as the constipated writers who present us with a one-act play or a sonnet every fifteen years. The sort of things people call little masterpieces, little jewels of nothing, the sort of thing I really hate in fact. The food at Zénaïde's place isn't bad, but one would find it more humdrum if she was less parsimonious. There are things her cook does well, and others he makes a complete mess of. I've had some dreadful dinners there, as one does in most places, only they've done me less harm than elsewhere because one's stomach is, after all, more sensitive to quantity than to quality.

– Well, to get to the end of the story, the Duc concluded, Zénaïde was adamant that Oriane should go to luncheon with her and, since my wife is not very keen on going out anywhere, she resisted the invitation; she wanted to be sure that she was not being trapped into some great shindig and tried in vain to find out who else would be there to luncheon. "You must come, insisted Zénaïde, as she boasted about all the good things there would be to eat. There'll be a chestnut purée, that's all I need to tell you, and there'll be seven little bouchées à la reine. – Seven! cried Oriane, then there'll be at least eight of us to lunch!" '

After a few seconds the Princess finally saw the point and let her laughter break forth like a clap of thunder. 'Ah, "there'll be at least eight of us" – it's a delightful one. How very charmingly you edit it!' she said after making a supreme effort to recall the expression she had heard used by Mme d'Épinay and which was more appropriate in this instance.

'Oriane, that was very delightful of the Princess; she said your remark was "well edited".

– But, my dear, there's nothing new in what you're saying. I know how witty the Princess is,' replied Mme de Guermantes, who readily appreciated a remark when it was uttered by a royal personage and flattered her own wit at the same time. 'I am very proud that Madame should appreciate my humble attempts at "editing". Though I don't remember saying such a thing. And if I did, it was to flatter my cousin, for if she had catered for seven "mouthfuls",[63] the mouths to feed, if I can put it like this, would have been a dozen if not more.'

During this time the Comtesse d'Arpajon, who had told me before dinner that her aunt would have been so happy to show me round her Normandy residence, was saying to me, over the Prince d'Agrigente's head, that where she would most like to invite me was to the Côte d'Or, because there, at Pont-le-Duc, she would be in her own home.

'The archives of the château would be of interest to you. There is some absolutely fascinating correspondence between all the most prominent figures in the seventeenth, eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. I spend many very happy hours there, living in the past,' the Comtesse assured me, and I was reminded of M. de Guermantes remarking that she was an extremely cultured woman as far as literature was concerned.

'She owns all M. de Bornier's[64] manuscripts,' the Princess continued, alluding to Mme d'Heudibert, and eager to make the most of any good cause she might have for cultivating the society of such a person.

'She must have dreamed it, I don't believe she ever even knew him, said the Duchesse.

– The really interesting thing about these correspondences is that they are between people of different countries,' the Comtesse d'Arpajon continued, as someone who was allied to the principal ducal and even reigning families of Europe and was always happy to remind people of the fact.

'But surely, Oriane, said M. de Guermantes meaningfully, you can't have forgotten that dinner-party where you had M. de Bornier next to you at table!

– Basin, the Duchesse broke in, if you're trying to tell me that I knew M. de Bornier, why of course I did, he even called on me on several occasions, but I could never bring myself to invite him because it would have meant having the house disinfected with formol after every visit he made. As for the dinner you're referring to, how could I ever forget it? but it was certainly not at Zénaïde's place. She never set eyes on Bornier in her life and would probably think, if you mentioned La Fille de Roland to her, that you were talking about a Bonaparte princess who was thought to be engaged to the son of the King of Greece. No, it was at the Austrian Embassy. That dear man Hoyos imagined he was doing me a favour by plonking that evil-smelling Academician right next to me. It was like sitting next to a whole platoon of gendarmes. I was obliged to hold my nose as best I could all through dinner. I didn't dare breathe until they brought on the gruyère!'

M. de Guermantes had obtained his hidden objective and conducted a furtive inspection of his guests' faces to gauge the effect produced by the Duchesse's witticisms.

'And I find there is a peculiar charm in old exchanges of letters,' continued the lady of impressive literary culture who had such fascinating letters in her château, quite undeterred by the intervening head of the Prince d'Agrigente.

'Have you noticed that an author's letters are often superior to the rest of his work? Who was the man who wrote Salammbô?'

I should have preferred not to have to reply and to curtail this conversation, but I felt that this would be rather unkind to the Prince d'Agrigente; he was pretending to know perfectly well who Salammbô was by and to be leaving it to me to say, whereas he was actually in a painful quandary.

'Flaubert,' I ended up by saying, but the assenting nods performed by the Prince's head smothered the sound of my remark, with the result that the lady I was talking to was not exactly sure whether I had said Paul Bert or Fulbert, names which did not ring quite right in her ears.

'At all events, she went on, how fascinating his correspondence is, and how superior to his books! It explains him, in fact, because one sees from everything he says about the difficulty he has writing a book that he wasn't a true writer, not a talented man.

– Talking of correspondences, I find Gambetta's quite wonderful,' said the Duchesse de Guermantes, to show that she was not afraid to display her interest in a proletarian and a radical. M. de Bréauté, who fully grasped the witty effect of her audaciousness, looked around him with a gaze at once tipsy and affectionate before wiping his monocle.

'By God, it was devilish dull, that Fille de Roland,' said M. de Guermantes, with the satisfaction he derived from the sense of his own superiority over a work that had bored him to tears, and perhaps also from the suave mari magno[65] sensation one has in the middle of a good dinner when one recalls such terrible evenings at the theatre. 'Still, it had some good lines, and a patriotic spirit.'

I said something that implied my utter lack of enthusiasm for M. de Bornier.

'Ah! you've got something against him?' the Duc asked with curiosity, for he always supposed, when anyone spoke ill of a man, that it must be on account of a private resentment, just as to speak well of a woman indicated an incipient infatuation.

'You clearly bear him some sort of grudge. What did he do to you? Do tell us! Come on, there must be some skeleton in the cupboard or you wouldn't sound so disparaging. It goes on too long, La Fille de Roland, but there is a whiff of feeling to it.

– 'Whiff' is exactly the right word for an author with such a smell about him,' broke in an ironic Mme de Guermantes. 'If this poor child has ever been in the man's company one can quite understand that he got up his nose!

– I have to say, though, Madame, the Duc went on, addressing the Princess of Parma, that quite apart from La Fille de Roland, I'm terribly old-fashioned in my literary and even in my musical tastes. There's no old junk too rubbishy for my palate. You won't believe this perhaps, but in the evenings when my wife sits down at the piano, I find myself asking for some old tune by Auber or Boieldieu, or even Beethoven! That's what I like. But as for Wagner, it sends me to sleep immediately.

– You're wrong there, said Mme de Guermantes. Even with his insufferable long-windedness, Wagner had elements of genius. Lohengrin is a masterpiece. Even in Tristan there are occasionally intriguing passages. And the Spinning Chorus in The Flying Dutchman is perfect heaven.

– But I'm right, aren't I, Babal?' said M. de Guermantes, turning to M. de Bréauté, 'what we like is:

Les rendezvous de noble compagnie

Se donnent tous en ce charmant séjour.[66]

That's delightful. And Fra Diavolo, and The Magic Flute, and Le Chalet, and The Marriage of Figaro, and Les Diamants de la Couronne – that's what we call music! It's the same thing in literature. For instance, I love Balzac, Le Bal de Sceaux, Les Mohicans de Paris.[67]

– Oh! my dear, if you're off on the subject of Balzac, we'll be here for ever. Save it up for one of Mémé's visits. He's even worse, he knows Balzac by heart.'

Irritated by his wife's interruption, the Duc shot her a momentary look of menacing silence. In the meantime, Mme d'Arpajon had been involved in an exchange with the Princess of Parma about poetry, tragic and otherwise, the words of which did not reach me distinctly until I caught the following remark from the lips of Mme d'Arpajon: 'Oh, Madame is quite right, I admit that he paints us an ugly picture of the world because he can't distinguish between ugliness and beauty, or rather because his insufferable vanity leads him to believe that everything he says is beautiful. I agree with Your Highness that in the piece we're talking about, there are some ludicrous things, quite unintelligible, and some errors of taste, and that it's difficult to understand, as much trouble to read as if it were written in Russian or Chinese, because quite clearly it's simply not what we'd call French; but still, when one has taken the trouble, how rewarding a work it is, how truly imaginative!' I had missed the opening sentences of this little lecture. I eventually gathered not only that the poet who was incapable of making the distinction between beauty and ugliness was Victor Hugo, but furthermore that the poetry which was as hard to understand as Russian or Chinese was:

Lorsque l'enfant paraît, le cercle de famille

a piece dating from the poet's earliest period and perhaps even nearer to Mme Deshoulières than the Victor Hugo of La Légende des siècles.[68] Far from thinking Mme d'Arpajon ridiculous, I saw her (the first person at this table – such an ordinary, humdrum table – at which I had sat down with such disappointment), I saw her in my mind's eye, beneath that lace cap of hers with the long spiral ringlets falling remorsefully from either side, a cap worn by Mme de Rémusat, Mme de Broglie, Mme de Saint-Aulaire,[69] all those distinguished ladies whose delightful letters quote so learnedly and so aptly from Sophocles, Schiller and the Imitation of Christ, but whose reactions to the earliest poetry of the Romantics provoked the alarm and exhaustion which were inseparable, in my grandmother's eyes, from Mallarmé's late poetry.[70]

'Mme d'Arpajon is very fond of poetry,' the Princess of Parma remarked to Mme de Guermantes, impressed by the tone of the former's lecture.

'No, she doesn't understand a thing about it,' returned Mme de Guermantes in an undertone, taking advantage of the fact that Mme d'Arpajon, who was countering an objection raised by the Général de Beautreillis, was too intent on what she was saying to hear what the Duchesse was whispering. 'She's become very bookish since she was abandoned. I don't mind telling Your Highness that I'm the one who has to bear the brunt of it all, because it's to me she comes running whenever Basin hasn't been to see her, which is practically every day. But it really isn't my fault if she bores him, and I can't force him to go and see her, though I'd prefer him to be a little more loyal to her, because it would mean I saw rather less of her myself. But she drives him mad and no wonder. She's not a dreadful person, but, believe me, she's unimaginably boring. She gives me such a headache each day that I'm forever having to take pain-killers. And it's all because Basin took it into his head to go to bed with her behind my back for a year or so. And as if that wasn't enough, I've got a footman who's in love with a little slut and goes about sulking if I don't ask the young lady to quit her street-walking profits for half an hour to come and take tea with me! It's enough to drive one mad!' the Duchesse concluded languidly. The main reason why Mme d'Arpajon was driving M. de Guermantes to distraction was because he had recently become the lover of another woman, the Marquise de Surgis-le-Duc, as I discovered.

As it happened, the footman who had been deprived of his day off was at that moment waiting at table. And it struck me that he had not recovered from his disappointment and was doing his job with all this on his mind, for I noticed that, as he was offering the various dishes to M. de Châtellerault, he performed his task so awkwardly that the young Duc's elbow was constantly coming into contact with his own. The young Duc showed no sign of annoyance with the blushing footman, but on the contrary looked up at him with a smile in his clear blue eyes. I saw this good humour as a token of kindness on the guest's part. But the insistent smiling eyes led me to think that he was aware of the servant's disappointed hopes and that what he was in fact feeling was perhaps a malicious amusement.

'But, my dear, you're revealing nothing new, you know, in what you're telling us about Victor Hugo,' the Duchesse went on, turning this time to Mme d'Arpajon, whose worried turn of the head she had just intercepted. You mustn't expect to launch his early work. We all know it is talented. It's the late Victor Hugo that's so dreadful, La Légende des siècles, and the other titles I can't remember. But Les Feuilles d' automne, Les Chants du crépuscule, are often the work of a poet, a true poet. Even Les Contemplations still has some fine things in it,' added the Duchesse, with whom her listeners dared not disagree, and with good reason. 'But I confess that I prefer to venture no further than the Crépuscule! It's certainly true that in Victor Hugo's better poems, and they do exist, one frequently stumbles upon an idea, even a profound one.'

And with just the right shade of feeling, bringing out the melancholic thought with the full force of her intonation, projecting it to a world beyond the sound of her voice, and gazing steadily ahead of her in a dreamy, charming manner, the Duchesse said 'Listen to this,' and started to slowly recite:

'La douleur est un fruit, Dieu ne le fait pas croître Sur la branche trop faible encor pour le porter.[71]

Or this,' she continued:

'Les morts durent bien peu…
Hélas, dans le cercueil ils tombent en poussière,
Moins vite qu'en nos coeurs!'[72]

And, while a smile of disillusionment puckered her sorrowful lips with an elegant twist, the Duchesse rested the dreamy gaze of her lovely clear blue eyes upon Mme d'Arpajon. I was getting to know those eyes, and that voice, with its heavy drawl, its rasping flavour. In this voice and those eyes, I recognized much of the natural world around Combray. It is true that in the affected way the voice sporadically betrayed the earthiness of the soil there were many elements involved: the wholly countrified origins of one branch of the Guermantes family, longer-rooted, sturdier, wilder, more pugnacious than others; and then that automatic reflex characteristic of genuinely refined people and people of intelligence who know that refinement has nothing to do with mincing one's words, the reflex of nobles who fraternize more readily with their farmers than with the middle classes; all of these being particularities which Mme de Guermantes's regal status enabled her to show off more freely, with no holds barred. It appears that some of her sisters shared the same voice; she detested them, and they – less intelligent than herself and married to men somewhat below their station (if one can use such an expression to refer to unions with obscure noblemen, burrowed away in the provinces or in one of the lacklustre circles of the Faubourg Saint-Germain in Paris) – possessed this voice themselves but had curbed it, corrected it, toned it down as far as they were able to do so, just as any one of us seldom has the nerve to be himself as opposed to putting his efforts into aping the most fashionable models of the done thing. But Oriane was far more intelligent, far wealthier and, most importantly, so much more fashionable than her sisters; as the Princesse des Laumes, she had commanded such an impressive dash in the company of the Prince of Wales, that she came to realize that her discordant voice was an attraction, and, with audacious confidence in her own idiosyncrasy, she had used it to create, in the world of society, what in the theatrical world a Réjane or a Jeanne Granier[73] (and of course no comparison is implied here between the respective merits and talents of these two actresses) created with theirs, something admirable and distinctive which certain sisters of Réjane and Granier, utterly unknown to the world, possibly tried to conceal as a defect.

In support of all these reasons for cultivating her native idiosyncrasies, Mme de Guermantes's favourite writers – Mérimée, Meilhac and Halévy – had contributed, together with a respect for 'naturalness', an inclination towards the prosaic through which she attained to poetry and a purely society cast of mind which called up various landscapes before my eyes. Besides, the Duchesse was quite capable, by bringing an artful refinement of her own to these various influences, of having selected for most of her words the pronunciation she thought of as most 'Ile-de-France,' most 'Champenoise', since, if not to the same degree as her sister-in-law Marsantes, she rarely strayed beyond the pure choice of words that might have been used by an old-established French writer. And when one was tired of the composite hotchpotch of modern speech, it was very restful to listen to Mme de Guermantes's talk, even with the knowledge that it could express far fewer things – almost as restful, if one was alone in her company and she restrained and clarified the flow of her speech still further, as listening to an old song. Then, as I looked and listened to Mme de Guermantes, I could see, calmly imprisoned in the unending afternoon of her eyes, an expanse of sky of the Ile-de-France or of Champagne, bluish, slanting, at the same angle of incline as in the eyes of Saint-Loup.

And so, in these various influences, Mme de Guermantes expressed at once the most ancient period of aristocratic France, then, much later, the manner in which the Duchesse de Broglie might have enjoyed and found fault with Victor Hugo under the July Monarchy, and, finally, a keen liking for the literature that sprang from Mérimée and Meilhac. I found the first of these influences more to my taste than the second, and it did more to alleviate the disappointment of my journey to and arrival at the Faubourg Saint-Germain, so different from what I had imagined it to be; but I found the second preferable to the last. For while Mme de Guermantes was a Guermantes almost to her finger-tips, her à la Pailleron[74] preferences, her taste for the younger Dumas[75] were calculated and deliberate. Since such tastes were the opposite of my own, she fed me with literature when she spoke to me about the Faubourg Saint-Germain, and never seemed so stupidly Faubourg Saint-German as when she talked about literature.

Moved by the last lines recited, Mme d'Arpajon burst forth with: 'Monsieur, you must write that down for me on my fan, she said to M. de Guermantes.

'Ces reliques du coeur ont aussi leur poussière! [76]

– The poor woman, I feel sorry for her! the Princess of Parma remarked to Mme de Guermantes.

– No, please, Madame, spare your feelings. She has only got what was coming to her.

– But – you'll forgive me for saying this – she does really love him, doesn't she?

– Oh, not in the least. She isn't capable of it. She thinks she loves him just as at this very moment she thinks she has been quoting Victor Hugo, when in fact she was reciting a line from Musset. Look, said the Duchesse in a melancholic voice, nobody could be more moved by true feeling than myself. But let me tell you something. Only yesterday she made a terrible scene with Basin. Your Highness is perhaps inclined to think that it was because he's in love with other women, because he no longer loves her. Far from it. It was because he won't put her sons forward for the Jockey! Is that the behaviour of a woman in love, Madame? No! I will go further, Mme de Guermantes added sharply, she is a creature of unusual insensitivity.'

Meanwhile, it was with an eye sparkling with satisfaction that M. de Guermantes had been listening to his wife talking 'point-blank' about Victor Hugo and quoting those few lines. The Duchesse might often be irritating, but at moments such as this he was proud of her. 'Oriane is really extraordinary. She can talk about anything, she's read everything. She couldn't possibly have guessed that the conversation this evening would turn to Victor Hugo. Whatever the subject, she's ready for it. She can hold her own with the most learned people. This young man here must be quite enthralled.'

'But shall we change the subject? Mme de Guermantes continued. She's a very highly-strung woman. You must think me very old-fashioned, she continued, turning to me, I know that nowadays it's seen as a weakness to favour ideas in poetry, poetry with some thought to it.

– It's old-fashioned?' the Princess of Parma asked, slightly a-tremble at the effect upon her of this new wave she had not expected, although she knew that the Duchesse de Guermantes's conversation was always apt to offer a succession of delightful thrills, the breath-taking panic, the healthy fatigue after which her thoughts instinctively turned to the necessity of taking a footbath in a bath cubicle and a brisk walk in order to 'adjust herself' to the experience.

'Personally speaking, Oriane, said Mme de Brissac, I don't have any objection to Victor Hugo having ideas, quite the contrary, but I do object to the way he seeks them in hideous things. It was he, in the end, who accustomed us to ugliness in literature. There's already quite enough ugliness in life as it is. Why can't we just be allowed to forget it while we're reading? A painful sight from which we should turn away in real life, that's what attracts Victor Hugo.

– Victor Hugo is not as realistic as Zola, surely?' enquired the Princess of Parma.

At the name Zola, not a single muscle stirred on the face of M. de Beautreillis. The General's anti-Dreyfusism lay too deep for him to even attempt to give expression to it. And his benign silence when such topics were broached touched the hearts of the uninitiated as the sign of the same delicacy that a priest shows in avoiding any reference to one's religious obligations, a financial adviser in making sure that he does not recommend the companies he himself controls, a strong man in behaving like a lamb and refraining from fisticuffs.

'I know you're related to Admiral Jurien de la Gravière,' Mme de Varambon, the Princess of Parma's lady-in-waiting, said to me with a knowing look. An excellent woman within her limits, she had been procured for the Princess a long time ago by the Duc's mother. She had not so far addressed me, and subsequently I could never rid her, despite the admonitions of the Princess of Parma and my own protestations, of the idea that I was in some way connected with the admiral-Academician, who was a complete stranger to me. The utter refusal of the Princess of Parma's lady-in-waiting to see me as anything other than the nephew of Admiral Jurien de La Gravière was in itself quite a common and laughable phenomenon. But the mistake she made was only an extreme and desiccated instance of the countless mistakes, more trivial, more pointed, unintentional or deliberate, which accompany our names on the particular index card the world allots us. I remember a friend of the Guermantes who had expressed a keen desire to make my acquaintance and alleged as the reason for this that I was a great friend of his cousin, Mme de Chaussegros, 'a charming woman, so very fond of you'. I was punctilious enough to insist – in vain – that there was some mistake, that I was not acquainted with Mme de Chaussegros. 'Then it's her sister you know; it comes down to the same thing. She met you in Scotland.' I have never been to Scotland and, in my honesty, I went to the trouble – a complete waste of time – of pointing this out to the person I was addressing. It was Mme de Chaussegros herself who had said that she knew me (and no doubt she sincerely believed it) as the result of some initial confusion, for from then on she never failed to greet me whenever she caught sight of me. And since, after all, the milieu in which I moved was identical to that of Mme de Chaussegros, there was no rhyme or reason in the way I played the situation down. To say that I was a close friend of the Chaussegros family was, quite literally, a mistake, but from the social point of view it gave some idea of my actual position, if one can speak of social position in regards to the young man I was at the time. It mattered little that this friend of the Guermantes should tell me things about myself which were untrue, and the idea of me he continued to hold neither underestimated nor overestimated me in society terms. After all, for those of us who are not in the acting profession, when another person forms a false idea of us, imagines we are friends with a lady who is unknown to us but we have reputedly met in the course of a delightful journey we have never made, the tedium of constantly inhabiting the same skin becomes dispelled for a moment, as if we were actually going on stage. Mistakes that proliferate harmlessly enough when they are without the unbending rigidity of the one that had been made, and would continue to be made for the rest of her life, in spite of my denials, by Mme de Parme's fool of a lady-in-waiting, stuck for all time in the belief that I was related to that boring man, Admiral Jurien de La Gravière. 'She's got no head for these things, the Duc told me, and she really ought not to overdo the alcohol. I think she's somewhat under the influence of Bacchus at the moment.' As it happened, Mme de Varambon had only been drinking water, but the Duc liked an opportunity to pop up with his favourite expressions.

'But Zola's not a realist, he's a poet, Madame!' said Mme de Guermantes, drawing her inspiration from the critical articles she had read over the last few years and converting them to her individual brilliance. Agreeably jostled up to this point by the experience of bathing in wit, a bath stirred up especially for her, which she was taking this evening and which, in her view, must be particularly beneficial for her health, allowing herself to be borne along by the successive waves of paradox as they broke, the Princess of Parma now gave a sudden start for fear of being knocked to her feet. And it was with a catch in her voice, as though her breath had been taken away, that she gasped out:

'Zola a poet!

– Why, certainly,' answered the Duchesse laughing, delighted by this suffocated reaction. 'Your Highness has surely observed how he elevates everything he touches. I can see you're about to tell me that he only touches the things that bring us… pleasure. But he makes that into something colossal. He's master of the epic dungheap! the Homer of the sewers! He can't write Cambronne's expletive[77] in big enough letters.'

Despite the intense exhaustion she was beginning to feel, the Princess was enchanted; never had she felt in better sorts. She would not have exchanged the highly invigorating salts of these divine dinner-parties at Mme de Guermantes's for an invitation to Schönbrunn,[78] which was the one thing that really flattered her.

'He writes that word with a big C, Mme d'Arpajon burst forth.

– Surely with a big M, I think, my dear,' replied the Duchesse de Guermantes, but not until she and her husband had looked at each other with a twinkle in their eyes which implied: 'How stupid can you get?' 'And while I think of it…' said Mme de Guermantes, turning to me with a smiling, tender gaze that lingered on my face, because, as an accomplished hostess, she was anxious to display her knowledge of an artist who was of particular interest to me and to provide me with the opportunity to exhibit mine if I wanted, 'while I think of it', she said, gently waving her feather fan, utterly conscious of the fact that she was at that moment exercising the full duties of hospitality, and simultaneously, in order not to be found wanting in any of them, signalling for me to be served again with more asparagus sauce mousseline, 'while I think of it, I do believe that Zola has actually written a study on the work of Elstir, the painter whose pictures you were looking at a while ago. The only ones of his that I like, as it happens,' she added. In fact she hated Elstir's painting, but found something special in anything that was in her own house. I asked M. de Guermantes if he knew the name of the gentleman in the top hat who featured in the picture of the crowd and whom I recognized as the same person whose formal portrait was next to this picture in the Guermantes collection, both paintings dating roughly from the same period of Elstir's work when his individuality had not yet fully emerged and he modelled himself slightly on Manet. 'Heavens! he replied, I know it's someone who is neither unknown nor a fool in his line of business, but I have no head for names. It's on the tip of my tongue, Monsieur… Monsieur… oh, well, never mind, I've forgotten. Swann would be able to tell you. He's the one who made Mme de Guermantes buy all that stuff. She's always too good-natured, always afraid of hurting people's feelings if she says no. Between you and me, I think he's landed us with a lot of old doodles. What I can tell you is that the gentleman you mean is a sort of Maecenas for M. Elstir. He launched him and has often helped him out of difficulties by commissioning paintings from him. As a token of gratitude to this man – if gratitude is what you call it, it's a matter of taste – Elstir painted him among that crowd. He stands out rather oddly, all dressed up to the nines like that. He may be one of your real pundits, but he's obviously got no idea where and when one wears a top hat. With that thing on his head, among all those hatless girls, he looks like a small-time provincial lawyer out on the spree. But, tell me, you seem really keen on his paintings. Had I known that, I'd have had all the answers ready for you. Not that there's much need to rack one's brains to say all there is to be said about M. Elstir's paintings, as there would be if we were talking about Ingres's La Source or The Princes in the Tower by Paul Delaroche.[79] The thing one appreciates in Elstir is the shrewd observation, the humour, the Parisian aspect, and after that one moves on to the next thing. You need no special knowledge to look at that sort of thing. I realize of course they're only sketches, but I don't find that they're worked enough. Swann had the cheek to try and make us buy a painting called A Bundle of Asparagus. It was in the house for several days in fact. That was all there was in the picture, a bundle of asparagus just like the ones you're eating now. But I have to say I refused to swallow M. Elstir's asparagus. He was asking three hundred francs for it. Three hundred francs for a bunch of asparagus! A louis is as much as they're worth, even early in the season. I thought it was a bit stiff. And when his things have people in them as well, I find it all rather sordid and depressing, not nice at all. It surprises me that someone with a discriminating mind like yourself, someone with a superior mind, actually likes that sort of thing.

– I really don't know why you say that, Basin,' said the Duchesse, who did not take kindly to any aspersions cast on the contents of her reception rooms. 'I am rather disinclined to dismiss every aspect of Elstir's work as undistinguished. There are things one takes to, others one doesn't. But you can't say there's a consistent lack of talent. And you have to admit that the paintings I purchased are unusually beautiful ones.

– As far as that sort of painting is concerned, Oriane, I infinitely prefer that little sketch by M. Vibert[80] we saw at the water-colour exhibition. There's nothing much in it, if you like, you could hold it in the palm of your hand, but you can see that there's a sense of wit written all over it: that unkempt scarecrow of a missionary standing in front of the snug prelate who is making his little dog do tricks, it's a perfect little poem of shrewdness and even profundity.

– I believe you are acquainted with M. Elstir, the Duchesse said to me. As a man, he's very nice.

– He's intelligent enough, said the Duc. After talking to him, it comes as quite a surprise that his paintings should be so run-of-the-mill.

– He's more than intelligent, he's really quite witty,' said the Duchesse with that look of unequivocal appreciation of someone who knew what she was talking about.

'Didn't he start doing a portrait of you, Oriane? enquired the Princess of Parma.

– Indeed he did. He painted me as red as a beetroot. It's not the sort of thing that's going to set him down for posterity. It's ghastly. Basin wanted to destroy it.'

This last statement was one which Mme de Guermantes was always making. But at other times she chose to judge differently: 'I don't care for his work, but he did once do a good portrait of me.' The first of these judgments was usually addressed to people who asked the Duchesse about her portrait, the second to those who did not mention it and whom she was anxious to apprise of its existence. The first was inspired by concern with her appearance, the second by vanity.

'Make a portrait of you look ghastly! In that case, it wouldn't be a portrait, it would be a travesty. I don't even know how to hold a paintbrush, but I'm sure if I were to paint you by merely setting you down as I see you, I'd produce a masterpiece, said the Princess of Parma ingenuously.

– He probably sees me as I see myself, without the frills.' said Mme de Guermantes with a look that was at once melancholic, modest and winsome, the one that she saw as best calculated to make her appear different from what Elstir had portrayed.

'That portrait cannot be without its appeal for Mme de Gallardon, said the Duc.

– Because she knows nothing about pictures?' asked the Princess of Parma in the knowledge that Mme de Guermantes had unbounded contempt for her cousin. 'But she's a very kind-hearted woman, is she not?' The Duc assumed a look of deep astonishment.

'Why, Basin, can't you see that the Princess is making fun of you? (Nothing was further from the Princess's mind.) She knows as well as you do that Little Miss Gallardon is a venomous serpent,' continued Mme de Guermantes, whose vocabulary was confined by habit to all these antiquated expressions and as richly flavoured as the dishes you can come across in the delicious books of Pampille,[81] but which have become so rare in real life, food in which the jellies, the butter, the juices, the quenelles are all unadulterated, in which even the salt comes specially from the salt-marshes of Brittany: from her accent, her choice of words, one felt that the basis of the Duchesse's conversation came directly from Guermantes. In this respect the Duchesse was very different from her nephew Saint-Loup, who was steeped in countless new ideas and expressions; it is hard, when the mind is murky with Kantian ideas and Baudelairean longings, to write the exquisite French of Henri IV, and so the very purity of the Duchesse's language was a sign of limitations and that, in her, intelligence and sensitivity alike had remained closed to any new departures. Here again, Mme de Guermantes's mind attracted me just because of what it excluded (which was precisely what constituted the substance of my own mind) and everything which, on account of this exclusion, it had been able to preserve, the seductive vigour of supple bodies which no exhausting reflection, no moral anxiety or nervous disorder has distorted. Her mind, shaped so long before my own, was for me the equivalent of what had been offered me by the behaviour of the girls of the little gang along the sea-shore. Mme de Guermantes offered me, tamed and subdued by good manners, by respect for intellectual values, the energy and charm of a cruel little girl from one of the noble families around Combray, who from her childhood had ridden horses, sadistically tormented cats, gouged out the eyes of rabbits, and, while remaining a paragon of virtue, might equally well have been, some years back now, and so much did she share his dashing style, the most glamorous mistress of the Prince de Sagan. The only thing was that she was incapable of understanding what I had sought for in her – the magic surrounding the name Guermantes – and the tiny speck of it I had actually found, a countryfied vestige from Guermantes. Our contact was based on a misunderstanding which could not fail to become apparent the moment my homage, instead of being addressed to the relatively superior being she believed herself to be, was diverted to some other woman of similar mediocrity and exuding the same unconscious charm. A misunderstanding so natural, and one that will always exist between a young dreamer and the society woman he elects, but one that disturbs him profoundly for as long as he remains ignorant of the nature of his imaginative bent and has not yet resigned himself to the inevitable disappointments he is bound to discover with people, as is the case with the theatre, with travel, with love.

After M. de Guermantes had declared (following upon Elstir's asparagus and the asparagus that had just been served after the poulet financière) that green asparagus grown in the open and, as the charming writer who signs herself E. de Clermont-Tonnerre[82] so quaintly puts it, 'without the impressive rigidity of their sisters', ought to be eaten with eggs, M. de Bréauté came out with the reply: 'One man's meat is another man's poison. In the province of Canton, in China, the greatest delicacy that can be offered to someone is a dish of ortolan eggs in a state of advanced putrefaction.' M. de Bréauté, the author of an essay on the Mormons which had appeared in the Revue des Deux Mondes,[83] moved only in the most aristocratic circles, but even then only in such as boasted a certain reputation for intellect. The result of this was that his presence, if it was at all regular, in a lady's house indicated that she had a 'salon'. He claimed to loathe society, and assured each one of his duchesses in turn that it was for her wit and beauty that he sought out her society. They all believed him. Whenever he resigned himself, with a heavy heart, to attending an important function at the Princess of Parma's, he collected all his ladies around him to bolster himself up, and thus appeared to be moving only in the midst of a close circle of acquaintances. So that his reputation as an intellectual might not be eclipsed by his society interests, he put into practice certain maxims from the Guermantes repertory, and would set out with fashionable women on long scientific expeditions during the season of society balls, or when some snobbish character, in other words some person who had not yet 'arrived' socially, began to make his presence felt socially, he would become ferociously obstinate in his refusal to make that person's acquaintance, to allow himself to be introduced. His hatred of snobs derived from his own snobbishness, but it led the simple-minded (in other words everyone) to believe that he was untainted by it.

'Babal always knows everything! the Duchesse de Guermantes exclaimed. I find it quite charming that there's such a thing as a country where your dairyman will supply you with really rotten eggs dating back to the year dot. I can just picture myself dipping my fingers of buttered toast into them. And I must say that it's not unknown for such things to happen at Aunt Madeleine's (Mme de Villeparisis), things served up in a state of putrefaction, even eggs.' Then, at signs of protest from Mme d'Arpajon, she added: 'Come, now, Phili, you know it as well as I do. You can see the chicken in the egg. I can't for the life of me think how they're well-behaved enough to stay inside the shell. It's not an omelette she serves, it's a whole chicken-coop, but at least it's not written on the menu. It was as well you didn't come there to dinner the day before yesterday, we had brill poached in carbolic acid! Not exactly a hospitable table – more like a hospital for contagious disease. I must say that Norpois pushes loyalty to the heights of heroics: he had a second helping!

– I think I saw you there the day she said her piece to that man Bloch (M. de Guermantes, in a possible attempt to give a Jewish name a more foreign lilt, did not pronounce the ch in Bloch like a k but as the ch in the German hoch) when he described some *pow u*t (poet) or other as sublime. Châtellerault made a brave attempt to break M. Bloch's shins, but the fellow didn't understand and thought that my nephew's kicks were aimed at a young woman sitting right next to him. (At this juncture M. de Guermantes coloured slightly.) He didn't realize that he was irritating our aunt by overdoing all those 'sublimes' of his. Anyway, Aunt Madeleine, who's never short of words, came out with "In that case, Monsieur, what adjective are you going to keep for M. de Bossuet?" (M. de Guermantes was of the opinion that when you mentioned a famous name, the use of "Monsieur" and the nobiliary particle was a must for anyone of the "old school".) It was worth waiting for.

– And what did M. Bloch have to say to that?' asked Mme de Guermantes in an off-hand sort of way, copying her husband's Teutonic pronunciation to compensate for a momentary lapse in her own original contribution to the subject.

'Ah! I can assure you that M. Bloch didn't wait for any more. He's still running.

– And indeed, I have a distinct memory of seeing you there that evening,' Mme de Guermantes said to me with some insistence, as if a recollection of this sort on her part must be something deeply flattering to myself. 'It's always so interesting at my aunt's. At that last evening do, where we met in fact, I meant to ask you whether the old gentleman who was passing us wasn't François Coppée.[84] You must know who everybody is,' she continued, genuinely envious of my contacts with poets and their kind, and also in an attempt to be nice to me and to emphasize the standing, in the eyes of her other guests, of a young man so well versed in literature. I assured the Duchesse that I had not been aware of any celebrities at Mme de Villeparisis's reception. 'What!' exclaimed Mme de Guermantes unthinkingly, thus betraying the fact that her respect for men of letters and her contempt for society were more superficial than she said, or even thought perhaps, 'what! no famous authors present! You astonish me! I saw quite a number of impossible-looking people!'

I remembered the evening in question perfectly well, on account of an utterly trivial incident. Mme de Villeparisis had introduced Bloch to Mme Alphonse de Rothschild, but my old school-friend had not caught the name and, under the impression that he had been introduced to a slightly mad old English lady, had replied only in monosyllables to the garrulous remarks of this former beauty, until Mme de Villeparisis, introducing her to someone else, had pronounced the words 'Baronne Alphonse de Rothschild', quite clearly this time. At this point, in one fell swoop, so many ideas of millions and glamour, which it would have been wiser to distinguish separately, had suddenly coursed through Bloch's mind, that he had had something like a heart attack and a brainstorm combined, and had burst out in the dear old lady's presence: 'If only I'd known!', an outburst of such stupidity that it had prevented him from sleeping a wink for a whole week. There was nothing particularly interesting in this remark of Bloch's, but I retained it as proof that sometimes in life, in moments of exceptional emotion, people do say what they think.

'I do believe that Mme de Villeparisis is not exactly what one would call a… "moral" person,' said the Princess of Parma, who knew that people did not call on the Duchesse's aunt and, following the remarks just made by the Duchesse herself, thought it permissible to speak her mind quite freely on the subject. But catching a look of disapproval on the Duchesse's face, she immediately added: 'But of course, an intellect of such a high order excuses everything.

– You take the same view of my aunt as the rest of the world, replied the Duchesse. On the whole, it is quite mistaken. It's just what Mémé was saying to me only yesterday.' She blushed, and some memory that was hidden from me clouded her eyes. I formed the conjecture that M. de Charlus had asked her to cancel my engagement with him, given that he had sent Robert to ask me not to go to her dinner. I sensed that the blush – equally incomprehensible to me – I had noticed on the Duc's face when he made some brief reference to his brother was possibly there for the same reason. 'My poor aunt! she will always have a reputation as a lady of the Old School, a woman of sparkling wit and the loosest morals. And yet one couldn't conceive of a more middle-class, more serious-minded and lacklustre person. She will go down as a patroness of the arts, which is tantamount to saying that she was the mistress of a famous painter, though he was never able to make her understand what a painting was. And as for her personal life, far from being a depraved woman, she was so much cast in the mould of marriage, so conjugal from the very start that her lack of success in keeping a husband – and in any case he was a rotter – that she has never had a liaison without taking it as seriously as a regular marriage, with the same upsets, the same rows, the same fidelity. Mind you, such relationships are often the most genuine ones. Generally speaking, there are more inconsolable lovers than there are husbands.

– And yet, Oriane, if you take the case of your brother-in-law Palamède, whom you were speaking of a moment ago, no mistress in the world could ever dream of being grieved for as that poor Mme de Charlus has been.

– Ah! replied the Duchesse, Your Highness must allow me a slight difference of opinion on that matter. People don't all like to be mourned for in the same way. We all have our preferences.

– Still, he has made a regular cult of her since she died. It's true that people sometimes behave towards the dead in a way they would not have done towards the living.

– For a start,' rejoined Mme de Guermantes in a dreamy voice which masked her facetious intent, 'we go to their funerals, which we never do for the living!' M. de Guermantes gave M. de Bréauté a sly glance as though he were trying to incite him to laughter at the Duchesse's wit. 'At the same time, I admit quite frankly, Mme de Guermantes continued, that the manner in which I should like to be mourned for by a man I loved is not the one followed by my brother-in-law.'

A shadow passed over the Duc's face. He did not like to hear his wife pronounce random judgments, particularly about M. de Charlus. 'You're not easy to please. His grief was edifying for everyone,' was his curt rejoinder. But in dealing with her husband the Duchesse had the boldness of an animal-tamer, or of people who live with a madman and have no fear of provoking him:

'Well, if you want to put it like that, I suppose you're right: it is edifying. He goes every day to the cemetery to tell her how many luncheon guests he had, he misses her enormously, but it's as if he's mourning a cousin, a grandmother, a sister. It's not the grief of a husband. It's true that the two of them were real saints, which makes the whole thing rather out of the ordinary.' Incensed by his wife's chatter, M. de Guermantes glared at her with frightening fixity; his look was explosive. 'I'm not trying to say anything against poor Mémé, the Duchesse continued. By the way, he was unable to be here this evening. I know that there's no one as kind as he is. He's delightful, he has delicacy, and a sense of feeling that you don't usually find in men. He's as soft as a woman, is Mémé!

– Don't talk rubbish, M. de Guermantes broke in sharply. There's nothing effeminate about Mémé. I can't think of anyone more manly than he is.

– But I'm not suggesting for a moment that he's the least bit effeminate. Do at least try and follow what I'm saying, the Duchesse continued. He's always like this when he thinks anyone is getting at his brother… she added, turning to the Princess of Parma.

– It's very nice of him, a delight to hear him. There's nothing so fine as two brothers who are fond of each other,' said the Princess of Parma, as many humbler folk might have replied, for it is possible to belong to a princely family by blood and to a very plebeian one by intellect.

'While we're on the subject of your family, Oriane, said the Princess, I saw your nephew Saint-Loup yesterday. I suspect he wants to ask you a favour.' The Duc de Guermantes knitted his Olympian brow. When he was unwilling to do someone a favour, he did not care for his wife to take charge of it, knowing that it would come down to the same thing in the end and that the people to whom she would be obliged to address herself would put it down to the joint account of the household, just as much as if it had been requested by the husband alone.

'Why didn't he ask me himself? said the Duchesse, he spent two hours here yesterday and, good heavens, I can't tell you how tiresome he was. He would be no more stupid than anyone else if he had only had the good sense, like many people of our acquaintance, to remain a fool. It's that intellectual façade of his that gets in the way. He wants to be receptive… but receptive to all the things he doesn't have a clue about. The way he carries on about Morocco, it's dreadful.

– He can't go back there, because of Rachel, said the Prince de Foix.

– But I thought they'd split up, broke in M. de Bréauté.

– I don't know about splitting up, but I came across her two days ago in Robert's bachelor flat and they didn't look like two people who'd quarrelled, believe me,' replied the Prince de Foix, who liked to spread every bit of gossip that might possibly damage Robert's chances of marrying and who might have been misled by the intermittent resumptions of an affair that was to all intents and purposes at an end.

'Your Rachel was speaking to me about you. I run into her occasionally in the morning in the Champs-Élysées. She's rather flighty, as you put it, what you call loose, a kind of "Dame aux camélias"[85] figuratively speaking of course.' These words were addressed to me by Prince Von, with that desire of his to appear conversant with French literature and the refinements of Paris.

'But of course, that's what it was! – Morocco… the Princess burst forth, flinging herself into this opening.

– What can he want with Morocco? M. de Guermantes enquired sternly. Oriane can do nothing for him in that department, as he is perfectly well aware.

– He thinks he invented strategy, said Mme de Guermantes, pursuing her theme, and then he uses impossible words for the simplest thing, which doesn't stop him making smudges all over his letters. The other day he told us he'd been served some sublime potatoes, and that he'd taken a sublime stage box.

– He speaks Latin, said the Duc, going one better.

– What! Latin? queried the Princess.

– On my word of honour, Your Highness can ask Oriane if I'm not telling the truth.

– Why, yes, Madame. The other day, just like that, in a single sentence, he came out with: "I can think of no more moving example of sic transit gloria mundi." I can repeat the sentence to Your Highness because, after scores of enquiries and by having recourse to linguists, we managed to reconstruct it, but Robert just flung it out without pausing for breath, and we could barely perceive that there was Latin in it. He was like a character out of Le Malade imaginaire! And it was all to do with the death of the Empress of Austria![86]

– The poor woman! exclaimed the Princess. What a delightful creature she was!

– Yes, said the Duchesse, a wee bit mad, a tiny bit insane, but a thoroughly good sort, a nice, kindly lunatic. The only thing I could never understand was why she never managed to get herself a set of false teeth that fitted properly. They always came loose before she'd finished a sentence and she had to stop short in case she swallowed them.

– That Rachel was telling me about you. She said that our friend Saint-Loup idolized you, that he was even fonder of you than he was of her,' said Prince Von, addressing me and devouring his food like a red-faced ogre as he spoke, all his teeth exposed by his perpetual grin.

'In which case she must be jealous of me and hate me, I replied.

– Not in the least; she said all sorts of nice things about you. Now the Prince de Foix's mistress would perhaps be jealous if he preferred you to her. You don't know what I mean? Come home with me and I'll explain it all to you.

– I'm afraid that's not possible, I've an appointment with M. de Charlus at eleven.

– Well now, he sent me an invitation yesterday to dine with him this evening, but asked me not to come after a quarter to eleven. But if you really must go and see him, at least come with me as far as the Théâtre-Français, you'll be in the periphery,' said the Prince, who was doubtless under the impression that his last word meant 'neighbourhood' or possibly 'centrally placed'.

But the wide-eyed gaze on his coarse, handsome red face alarmed me and I declined his offer by telling him that a friend was coming to collect me. There was nothing offensive about this response as far as I could see. But the Prince apparently thought differently and did not address another word to me.

'I really must pay a visit to the Queen of Naples – she must be grieving terribly,' said the Princess of Parma, or at least appeared to me to have said as much. For her words had reached me only indistinctly through Prince Von's remarks, closer to my ear yet spoken in an undertone. No doubt he had been afraid, if he spoke any louder, that the Prince de Foix might have heard him.

'Oh, I don't really think that's the case, said the Duchesse, I don't believe she feels any grief at all.

– None at all? You always go to extremes, Oriane,' said M. de Guermantes, reverting to his role as the cliff which, by resisting the wave, forces it to fling its crest of foam even higher.

'Basin knows as well as I do, if not better, that I'm telling the truth, replied the Duchesse, but he feels he has to behave sternly because you're here and is frightened that I might shock you.

– Oh, please, not in the least!' exclaimed the Princess of Parma, fearing that some detail of these delicious evenings at the Duchesse de Guermantes's might get altered on her account and that she would lose this forbidden fruit which even the Queen of Sweden had not yet acquired the right to taste.

'Why, Basin himself had it from her own lips. When he asked her with the usual expression of condolence: "I see the Queen is in mourning. May I ask for whom? Your Majesty must be greatly grieved?", she said: "No, it's not full mourning but rather a light mourning, a very light mourning in fact. It's my sister." The truth is, she's delighted by it, as Basin knows perfectly well. She invited us to a party that very evening and presented me with two pearls. Would that she could lose a sister every day! She's not mourning for her sister's death, she's as pleased as can be about it. She probably says to herself, like Robert, "sic transit…" or whatever it is,' she added modestly, perfectly well aware of how to complete the tag.

All this was in fact merely Mme de Guermantes showing off her witty mind, and in the most mendacious manner, for the Queen of Naples, like the Duchesse d'Alençon, also tragically departed, was a warm-hearted woman and mourned her relations with sincerity. Mme de Guermantes knew these noble Bavarian sisters, her cousins, too well not to be aware of this.

'He is anxious not to return to Morocco,' said the Princess of Parma, seizing once more upon the name Robert, which Mme de Guermantes had held out to her, quite unintentionally, like a lifeline. 'I believe you know Général de Monserfeuil.

– Only very slightly,' replied the Duchesse, who was a close friend of the officer in question. The Princess explained what it was that Saint-Loup wanted.

'Heavens, well, yes, if I see him… It's possible I may run into him,' replied the Duchesse, trying to avoid seeming unhelpful – her relations with the Général de Monserfeuil appeared to have grown rapidly more remote the minute there had been any question of her asking him for some favour. This hesitancy was still not good enough for the Duc, who interrupted his wife:

'You know perfectly well you won't be seeing him, Oriane, he said, and besides, you've already asked him to do a couple of things which he hasn't done. My wife is obsessed with pleasing people,' he added, getting increasingly testy in order to force the Princess to withdraw her request without making her doubt his wife's good nature and so that Mme de Parme should put the whole thing down to his own fundamentally curmudgeonly nature. 'Robert could get anything he wanted out of Monserfeuil himself. Only, as he happens not to know what it is he wants, he gets us to do it because he knows there's no better way of making the whole thing fall through, Oriane has already asked too many favours of Monserfeuil. A request from her at this point would be a reason for him to refuse.

– Oh, in that case, it would be better for the Duchesse to do nothing, said Mme de Parme.

– Quite so, came the Duc's final word on the matter.

– That poor General, he's been defeated again at the elections, said the Princess of Parma, to change the subject.

– Oh, it's nothing serious, it's only the seventh time,' said the Duc, who, after being forced to quit politics himself, quite enjoyed hearing about other people's failures at the polls. 'He consoled himself by deciding to give his wife another baby.

– What! Is that poor Mme de Monserfeuil pregnant again? exclaimed the Princess.

– But of course, replied the Duchesse, it's the only sort of campaign the poor General has never lost.'

In the time that followed I was continually to be invited, however small the party, to the dinners and luncheons whose guests I had at one time imagined to resemble the Apostles in the Sainte-Chapelle. And in fact they did assemble there like the early Christians, not to partake of merely material nourishment, which was in fact exquisite, but in a sort of social Eucharist; and very soon, in the course of a few dinner-parties, I took in the acquaintance of all the friends of my hosts, friends to whom they introduced me with such a distinct hint of benevolent condescension (as to someone for whom they had always had a sort of parental affection) that there was not a single one of them who would have not felt he was failing the Duc and Duchesse if he had given a ball without including my name on the list, and along with all this, as I savoured one of the Yquems from the recesses of the Guermantes cellars, I enjoyed ortolans prepared in accordance with various recipes tastefully devised and modified by the Duc himself. However, for one who had already sat down more than once at the mystic board, the manducation of the ortolan was not obligatory. Old friends of M. and Mme de Guermantes would come in to see them after dinner, 'at tooth-pick time' as Mme Swann would have said, as casual visitors, and would be offered tilleul in winter in the lighted drawing-room or in summer a glass of orangeade in the darkness of the tiny rectangular garden outside. No one could remember the Guermantes serving anything other than orangeade at these after-dinner evenings in the garden. There was something ritualistic about it. The introduction of other refreshments would have seemed to be perverting the tradition, just as a grand reception in the Faubourg Saint-Germain is no longer such if it includes a play or music. It must be assumed that you have come along simply – even if there were five hundred people present – to pay a call on, let us say, the Princess de Guermantes. Because I managed to procure, in addition to the orangeade, a carafe of stewed cherry- or pear-juice, people marvelled at the weight I carried. It was to do with this that I took a dislike to the Prince d' Agrigente, who, like all people lacking in imagination but not in acquisitiveness, show great surprise at what you happen to be drinking and ask if they may taste a little of it themselves. The result of this was that on all of these occasions M d'Agrigente, by reducing my ration, spoiled my enjoyment. For this fruit-juice is never served in sufficient quantities to quench the thirst. There is nothing so easy to drink as this colour of a fruit, transmuted into a flavour, and the fruit, when stewed in this way, seems to have reverted to the time when it was blossom. With its crimson flush like an orchard in springtime, or else colourless and cool like the breeze beneath the fruit trees, the juice can be sniffed, its every drop admired, and M. d'Agrigente prevented me, regularly, from enjoying it to the full. Despite these fruit-juice concoctions, the time-honoured orangeade persisted, as did the tilleul. In these modest beverages, the social communion service still took place. In this respect no doubt, the friends of M. and Mme de Guermantes were still, as I had originally imagined them, more out of the ordinary than their disappointing appearance might have suggested to me. A great many elderly men came to call and to receive from the Duchesse, together with the invariable drink, a welcome that was often almost frosty. Now, snobbishness could not have accounted for this, since the men in question were of the highest rank; nor could love of luxury: they may well have had a taste for it, but they could have enjoyed glittering luxury in less exalted social surroundings, for on those very same evenings the charming wife of a colossally wealthy financier would have moved heaven and earth to have them join the brilliant two-day shooting-party she was to put on for the King of Spain. They had nevertheless declined her invitation and had called round completely on the off-chance to see whether Mme de Guermantes was at home. They were not even certain of finding absolutely like-minded people at her house or feelings that were particularly cordial; Mme de Guermantes would throw out occasional comments – on the Dreyfus case, on the Republic, on the anti-clerical laws, or even muted innuendoes about themselves, their weaknesses, their boring conversation – which they were obliged to pretend they had not heard. No doubt, if they chose to keep on coming, it was because of their polished training as epicures of refined society and their distinct awareness of the perfect, prime quality of the social platter, the reassuring familiarity and bite of what was to be tasted there, free from hybridity or adulteration, something with an origin and history they recognized as well as she who served it to them, so that they remained more 'noble' in this respect than they themselves realized. Now, among the visitors to whom I was introduced after dinner on this occasion, it turned out that there was the Général de Monserfeuil to whom the Princess of Parma had alluded and whom Mme de Guermantes, whose salon he frequented regularly, had not expected that evening. On hearing my name, he made a bow, as though I had been the President of the Supreme War Council. I had imagined it to be simply through some deep-seated reluctance to oblige, in which the Duc, as in wit if not in love, was his wife's accomplice, that the Duchesse had all but refused to speak to M. de Monserfeuil on her nephew's behalf. And I saw in all this an indifference all the more reprehensible in that I got the impression, from a few words which the Princess of Parma had let slip, that Robert's post was a perilous one and that it would be wise to have him assigned to something else. What really revolted me was the genuine malice on Mme de Guermantes's part when, after the Princess of Parma had made the timid suggestion that she herself might have a word with the General on her own initiative, the Duchesse did all she could to dissuade Her Highness.

'But Madame, she broke out, Monserfeuil has no standing or influence whatsoever with the new government. It would be an utter waste of effort.

– I think he can hear what we're saying,' murmured the Princess, as a way of inviting the Duchesse to lower her voice.

'Your Highness has nothing to fear, he's a deaf as a post,' said the Duchesse, making no attempt to speak more quietly. The General could hear her every word.

'What I find worrying is that I believe M. de Saint-Loup to be in a rather unsafe place, said the Princess.

– It can't be helped, the Duchesse replied, he's in the same situation as everyone else. The only difference is that he was the one who asked to be sent there. And then, it's not really unsafe, not really. If it was, you know me, I would do something about it. I'd have spoken to Saint-Joseph about it during dinner. He carries far more influence and he gets on with the job! As you can see for yourself, he's already left. And in fact it would be less awkward than speaking to this one, who just happens to have three of his sons in Morocco at present and is unwilling to ask for their transfer; he might well object on those grounds. Since Your Highness insists, I shall talk with Saint-Joseph… if I see him that is, or to Beautreillis. They explained to us the other day where Robert is. I don't think he could be anywhere better.

– What a pretty flower, I've never seen one like that. There's no one like you, Oriane, for finding such marvellous things!' said the Princess of Parma, fearing that the Général de Monserfeuil might have overheard the Duchesse and seeking to change the subject. I recognized the plant as one of those I had watched Elstir painting.

'I'm delighted you like it; these flowers are ravishing, just look at the little mauve velvet collars on them; the unfortunate thing is that – as sometimes happens with people who are very pretty and very nicely dressed – they have an ugly name and a dreadful smell. All the same, I'm very fond of them. But what is rather sad is that they're going to die.

– But they're growing in a pot, they aren't cut flowers, said the Princess.

– No, the Duchesse answered with a smile, but it comes to the same thing, since they're all ladies. It's a species of plant where the ladies and the gentlemen don't grow on the same stalk. I'm like the people who keep a lady dog. I need a husband for my flowers. Otherwise I won't have any young ones!

– How very strange. Are you saying that in nature…?

– Yes, there are some insects who take it upon themselves to bring about the marriage, as with royalty, by proxy, without the partners concerned ever having set eyes on one another. And let me assure you, I always tell the servant to put the plant near the window as often as possible, on the courtyard side and the garden side in turn, in the hope that the right insect will arrive. The odds are almost impossible. Just think, that insect would have had to have just come from one of the same species and the opposite sex, and would then have had to take it into his head to come and leave his card at the house. He hasn't appeared so far; I think my plant still merits the status of virgin, but I must say that a little more loose behaviour would please me better. It's the same thing, you know, with that fine tree of ours in the courtyard, it will die childless because it belongs to a species that's very rare here. In its case, it's the wind that is responsible for bringing about the union, but the wall is rather too high.

– That's true, said M. de Bréauté, you ought to have knocked a few centimetres off the top, that would have done it. You need to know about these things. The vanilla flavouring of that excellent ice-cream you gave us this evening, Duchesse, comes from a plant of the same name. It produces flowers which are both male and female, but there is a kind of tough partition between them which means that they are shut off from each other. So no one could get any fruit from them until a young negro, a native of Réunion called Albius – rather a comic name for a black man, given his name means white – took it into his head to bring the separate organs into contact by using the point of a needle.

– Babal, you're divine, you know everything, cried the Duchesse.

– But you yourself, Oriane, have taught me things I knew nothing about, said the Princess.

– I am bound to explain to Your Highness that it is Swann who has always told me a great deal about botany. Sometimes when we thought it would be too tiresome to go off to some tea-party or an afternoon reception, we used to set off for the country and he would show me extraordinary marriages between flowers, far more amusing than marriages between people – and it all takes place without luncheon-parties and gatherings in the sacristy. We never had time to go very far. Now that there are motor-cars, it would be delightful. Unfortunately since then there has been the business of his own marriage, an even more astonishing affair, which makes everything rather difficult. Ah, Madame, life is a dreadful thing, we spend our entire time doing things that bore us, and then, when we chance to come across someone with whom we could go and look at something really interesting, he has to go and get involved in a marriage like Swann's. Faced with the alternatives of giving up my botanical excursions and having to frequent a person of disrepute, I have chosen the first of these two disasters. But in the end there's no need to go so far afield. It seems that even here, in my tiny piece of garden, more improper activities take place in broad daylight than at night time… in the Bois de Boulogne! It's simply that they attract no attention, because between flowers that sort of thing takes place very unobtrusively – you see a little orange shower, or else a very dusty fly coming to wipe its feet or take a bath before it penetrates a flower. And that's all there is to it!

– That's a splendid chest of drawers too that the plant is standing on; it's Empire, I think,' said the Princess, whose lack of familiarity with the works of Darwin and his flowers made it difficult for her to grasp the Duchesse's jokes.

'It's lovely, isn't it? I'm delighted that Your Highness likes it, replied the Duchesse. It's a very fine piece. I have to tell you that I've always adored Empire style, even when it wasn't in fashion. I remember that at Guermantes I got into terrible trouble with my mother-in-law for asking to have all the splendid furniture Basin had inherited from the Montesqious brought down from the attic, and using it to furnish the wing we lived in.'

M. de Guermantes smiled. Yet he must have remembered that things had happened very differently. But the witticisms of the Princesse des Laumes on the subject of her mother-in-law's bad taste had been traditional during the short period the Prince had been in love with his wife, and his love for the latter had been outlived by a certain amount of contempt for the intellectual inferiority of the former, a contempt which none the less went hand in hand with a great deal of attachment and respect for her.

'The Iénas have the same armchair with Wedgwood medallions. It's a fine chair, but I prefer mine,' said the Duchesse with the same impartial stance she would have had had she owned neither of these two pieces of furniture. 'I do admit, though, that they have some wonderful things which I don't.'

The Princess of Parma said nothing.

'But it's true. Your Highness hasn't seen their collection. Oh, you really ought to accompany me to their place one day. It's one of the most magnificent things in Paris. Like a museum come to life.'

And since this suggestion was one of the most 'Guermantes' of the Duchesse's audacious ploys (the Iénas ranking as mere usurpers in the eyes of the Princess of Parma, their son, like her own, bearing the title of Duc de Guastalla), in launching it thus Mme de Guermantes could not refrain (so much did her love of her own originality still prevail over the deference she owed to the Princess of Parma) from darting amused smiles at her other guests. They too forced themselves to smile in response, at once alarmed, amazed, and above all delighted to think that they were witnessing Oriane's 'latest' and would be able to retail it 'hot from the press'. They were only half-astounded, knowing as they did that the Duchesse was capable of throwing all the Courvoisier prejudices to the winds in favour of some more conspicuous and enjoyable achievement. Had she not, in the course of the last few years, brought together the Princesse Mathilde and the Duc d'Aumale, who had written that famous letter to the Princesse's own brother: 'In my family all the men are brave and all the women chaste'? Now since princes remain princely even at times when they appear to want to forget the fact, the Duc d'Aumale and the Princesse Mathilde had enjoyed themselves so much at Mme de Guermantes's that they had subsequently exchanged visits, with that same ability to forget the past which was shown by Louis XVIII when he appointed Fouché as minister, the very man who had voted for the death of his brother. Mme de Guermantes was now nursing a similar plan to effect a reconciliation between the Princesse Murat and the Queen of Naples. To return to the circumstances in hand, the Princess of Parma appeared to show the sort of embarrassment that might have been felt by the heirs-apparent to the thrones of the Netherlands and Belgium, the Prince d'Orange and the Duc de Brabant respectively, had anyone offered to present to them M. de Mailly-Nesle, Prince d'Orange, or M. de Charlus, Duc de Brabant. But before anything further could happen, the Duchesse, whom Swann and M. de Charlus between them (although the latter was utterly set on ignoring the Iénas' existence) had finally, and with great difficulty, persuaded to appreciate Empire style, broke forth with this:

'Honestly, Madame, I can't tell you how beautiful you'll find it! I have to admit that Empire style has always exerted a fascination for me. But, believe me, the Iénas' collection is almost hallucinatory. The sort of, what shall I call it?… backwash from the Egyptian Expedition, and then, too, the returning tide of Antiquity into our own times, all those things invading our houses, the Sphinxes couching at the foot of our armchairs, the snakes coiled around candelabras, a huge Muse holding out a little torch for you to play card games under, or who has quietly perched on your mantelpiece and is leaning against the clock; and then all the Pompeiian lamps, the little boat-shaped beds, looking as if they had been found floating on the Nile so that you expect to see Moses climb out of them, the Roman chariots galloping along the bedside tables…

– They're not very comfortable, those Empire chairs, ventured the Princess.

– True, the Duchesse agreed, but, she added with an insistent smile, I love being uncomfortable on those mahogany seats covered with dark red velvet or green silk. I love that discomfort of warriors who have only ever known the curule chair and cross-stack their fasces and pile up their laurels in the middle of the great room. I can assure you that at the Iénas' one doesn't for a moment stop to think about how comfortable one is when one sees that strapping minx of a Victory painted in fresco on the wall. My husband will say that I make a very poor royalist, but I think all the wrong things, you know; I can assure you that in those people's house one comes round to loving all the big *N*s, all those Napoleonic bees. Good lord, we haven't exactly wallowed in monarchist glory for a good many years, and those warriors who brought back so many crowns that they stuck them on the arms of chairs, well, I find it all rather stylish! Your Highness ought to come.

– Good gracious me, if you think so, said the Princess, but I don't think it will be easy.

– But Your Highness will find that it will all go very smoothly. They are kind people, and they're no fools. We took Mme de Chevreuse there, added the Duchesse, fully aware of the force of this example, and she was enchanted. The son is really rather pleasant… I shouldn't really say this, she went on, but he has a bedroom, and more particularly a bed, in which I should love to sleep – alone of course! More improper still is the fact that I went to see him once when he was ill and lying in this bed. At his side, along the bed-frame, there was a carved Siren, stretched out at length, a ravishing creature with a mother-of-pearl tail, holding some sort of lotus flowers. I do assure you,' continued Mme de Guermantes, slowing her pace to bring into even bolder relief the words she seemed to be modelling with her beautiful pouting lips, the tapering of her long expressive hands, and, as she spoke, fastening on to the Princess a gentle, intent, deep gaze, 'that with the palm leaves and the golden crown to one side, it was deeply moving, exactly the same lay-out as Gustave Moreau's Young man and Death.[87] Your Highness is of course acquainted with that masterpiece.'

The Princess of Parma, who had never even heard of Moreau, nodded in vigorous assent and smiled warmly in order to demonstrate her admiration for this painting. But the intensity of her charade did not manage to compensate for the light which fails to shine in our eyes when we do not know what it is that people are talking to us about.

'A good-looking boy, I believe? she asked.

– No, he looks just like a tapir. His eyes are rather like those of Queen Hortense[88] painted on a lamp-shade. But he probably decided that it would be rather ridiculous for a man to go on looking like that, and so the look fades into the cheeks, which have been scrubbed until they shine, and this makes him look rather Mameluke. You get the impression that the scrubber must come round every morning. It was Swann,' she continued, reverting to the young Duc's bed, 'who was struck by the resemblance between that Siren and Gustave Moreau's Death. But anyway,' she added, in a more rapid yet still serious tone, calculated to provoke a more humorous effect, 'there was nothing really to cause alarm; it was only a head cold, and the young man is now back in fine fettle.

– I'm told he's a snob?' opined M. de Bréauté with a malicious spurt of interest, expecting the same sort of precise reply he would have received from asking: 'I'm told he has only four fingers on his right hand; is that so?'

'G… ood hea… vens, n… no, replied Mme de Guermantes with a sweet smile of indulgence. He seems a tiny bit snobbish perhaps, because he's so very young, but I should be surprised to hear that was really the case, because he's intelligent,' she added, as though to her mind there were some utter incompatibility between snobbishness and intelligence. 'He has subtlety, and I've known him to be quite amusing,' she continued, smiling once again as one who had an expert appreciation and appetite for such things, as though judging someone to be amusing required a certain amount of gaiety from the speaker, or as though the Duc de Guastalla's witty thrusts were present in her mind as she spoke. 'Anyway, since he's never received anywhere, he can't have much opportunity for his snobbishness,' she went on to say, oblivious of the fact that none of this was doing very much to encourage the Princess of Parma.

'I cannot help wondering what the Prince de Guermantes will say if he hears I've been to see her. He calls her Mme Iéna.

– What! exclaimed the Duchesse with extraordinary promptitude. Don't you know that we were the ones who let Gilbert have a whole set of games-room furniture in the Empire style! (She now bitterly regretted relinquishing it.) It came to us from Quiou-Quiou. It's a prize collection! We didn't have room for it, though I think it looked better here than it does in his place. It's utterly beautiful, half Etruscan, half Egyptian…

– Egyptian? enquired the Princess, to whom Etruscan conveyed very little.

– Well, you know, a bit of both. It was Swann who told us; he explained it all to me, only you know what a poor ignorant creature I am. And then, Madame, what one has to bear in mind is that the Egypt of Empire style has nothing to do with the real Egypt, any more than its Romans with the real Romans, or its Etruscan…

– I see! said the Princess.

– No, it's like what they used to call a Louis XV costume during the Second Empire, when Anna de Mouchy and our dear Brigode's mother were girls. Basin was talking to you just now about Beethoven. We heard something of his played the other day which was really rather fine, though rather cold, with a Russian theme. It's somewhat pathetic that he thought it to be Russian. It's like those Chinese painters who thought they were copying Bellini. And even in the same country, whenever anyone looks at things in a slightly new way, ninety-nine people out of a hundred are utterly incapable of seeing what is put in front of them. It takes at least forty years before they manage to see it.

– Forty years! cried the Princess, alarmed at the thought.

– Why, yes,' the Duchesse went on, giving more and more weight to her words (practically my own in fact, for I had just come out with a similar idea within her earshot) by pronouncing them in a certain manner, the equivalent of the use of italics on the printed page, 'it's something like the first isolated individual of a species which does not yet exist but will multiply in time, an individual endowed with some kind of sense not available to the human species around him. I can hardly cite myself as an example because I, on the contrary, have always loved any interesting artistic development from the very start, however innovatory. But anyway, the other day I was with the Grand Duchess in the Louvre and we went past Manet's Olympia. Nowadays it shocks no one. It looks like something by Ingres! And yet, heaven knows how I had to go to war on behalf of that painting, which I don't altogether like, though it's unquestionably not just any old thing. Perhaps the Louvre isn't quite the place for it.

– The Grand Duchess is well?' inquired the Princess of Parma, to whom the Tsar's aunt was infinitely more familiar than Manet's model.

'Yes, indeed so. We talked about you. After all,' continued the Duchesse, holding to her theme, 'the truth of the matter is, as my brother-in-law Palamède is always telling us, that there is a strange language barrier between oneself and other people. Though I admit there's no one it's truer of than Gilbert. If you'd find it entertaining to go the Iénas', you have too much sense to let your actions be governed by what the poor fellow might think; he's a sweet, innocent creature, but he really does live in another world. I feel closer, more akin to my coachman, even to my horses, than to a man who keeps harking back to what people might have thought in the reign of Philip the Bold or Louis the Fat. Can you imagine, when he goes for a walk in the country, he waves the peasants out of his way with his stick, affably enough, and says things like: "Get along with you, you peasant rogues!" It really does amaze me when I find him addressing me as if he were one of those recumbent figures on an old Gothic tomb. This living gravestone may be my cousin, but he frightens me and the only thing I can think of is to let him stay in his medieval world. Having said that, I do admit that he's never assassinated anyone.

– It just so happens that I've been dining with him at Mme de Villeparisis's,' said the General, but without so much as a smile on his face or any sign that he endorsed the Duchesse's joking banter.

'Was M. de Norpois present?' asked Prince Von, whose mind was still bent on the Academy of Moral Sciences.

'He was, said the General. He was talking about your Emperor as it happens.

– It seems that the Kaiser Wilhelm is highly intelligent, but he doesn't like Elstir's work. I don't say that to disparage him, said the Duchesse, I happen to share his point of view. Although Elstir has done a fine portrait of me. You haven't seen it? It's not a good likeness, but it's intriguing. He's interesting to sit for. He's portrayed me like some old woman. It's modelled on Hals's The Women Regents of the Old Men's Alms House. I imagine you know those "sublimities", to borrow one of my nephew's favourite expressions,' she said, turning to me with a delicate flutter of her black feather fan. Rather than sitting erect on her chair, she threw her head nobly backwards, for while she was always the grande dame, she was somewhat given to acting the part as well. I told her that I had once been in Amsterdam and The Hague, but that since my time there was limited and I wanted to avoid muddling everything up, I had left out Haarlem.

'Ah, The Hague! What a gallery!' exclaimed M. de Guermantes. I remarked that he had doubtless admired Vermeer's View of Delft. But the Duc was less informed than arrogant. And so he made do with a self-complacent reply, as he did every time anyone spoke to him about a picture in a gallery, or in the Salon, of which he had no recollection: 'If it's to be seen, I've seen it!'

'What? You went all the way to Holland and you never visited Haarlem! exclaimed the Duchesse. Why, even if you had only a quarter of an hour in the place, they're an extraordinary thing to have seen, those Hals pictures. I'd go so far as to say that even catching a glimpse of them from the top of a moving tram, supposing they were on view in the street, would be an eye-opener.' I was taken aback by this remark as indicative of a misconception about the way in which artistic impressions are formed in our minds, and because it seemed to imply that our eye in this instance is simply a piece of recording apparatus which takes snapshots.

M. de Guermantes, delighted that she should be talking to me with such competence about things that interested me, stood gazing at the impressive posture his wife was famous for, listening to what she was saying about Frans Hals and thinking: 'She's an ornament of erudition on every subject. Our young guest can boast that he's stood in front of a great lady of the old school in every sense of the word, the like of whom couldn't be found today.' This is how I beheld the two of them, removed from the name Guermantes in which, back in the past, I had imagined them to be leading an unimaginable life, but today just like other men and other women, merely lagging a little behind their contemporaries, but unevenly so, like so many households of the Faubourg Saint-Germain where the wife has been clever enough to stop at the golden age of the past, the husband misfortunate enough to descend to its distasteful aspects, she remaining Louis XV while her husband is pompously Louis-Philippe. That Mme de Guermantes should be like other women had been a disappointment for me at first; I reacted to it now, with the help of so much fine wine, as something almost wondrous. A Don John of Austria, an Isabelle d'Este, catalogued for us in the world of names, have as little connection with the great moments of history as the Méséglise way had with the Guermantes one. Isabella d'Este, in real life, was no doubt a very minor princess, similar to those who under Louis XIV achieved no special rank at court. But because we feel her to be of a unique and thus incomparable essence, we are unable to conceive of her as being any less great than he, so that a supper-party with Louis XIV would appear to us as merely rather interesting, whereas with Isabella d'Este we should find ourselves miraculously transported into the presence of a heroine of romance. But, after studying Isabella d'Este and patiently transplanting her out of that magic world into the world of history, after ascertaining that her life, her thoughts, contained nothing of the mysterious strangeness suggested to us by her name, once we have recovered from our disappointment, we are eternally grateful to that princess for having had a knowledge of Mantegna's paintings almost equal to that of M. de Lafenestre,[89] hitherto despised by us as 'lower than dirt', to use one of Françoise's expressions. After scaling the inaccessible heights of the name Guermantes, as I descended the inner slope of the Duchesse's life and discovered the already familiar names of Victor Hugo, Frans Hals and, regrettably, Vibert, I felt the same astonishment that an explorer does, after he has taken into account, in order to visualize the singularity of the native customs in some wild valley of Central America or North Africa, its geographical remoteness, the strange names of its flora, and then discovers, once he has made his way through a screen of giant aloes or manchineels, inhabitants who (sometimes indeed among the ruins of a Roman theatre and beneath a column dedicated to Venus) are engaged in reading Mérope or Azire.[90] And in its remoteness and difference from, its superiority to the educated middle-class women I had known, the corresponding culture by which Mme de Guermantes had forced herself, with no ulterior motive, no ambitious aim, to descend to the level of women she would never know, had the praiseworthy merit, almost touching in its uselessness, of a knowledge of Phoenician antiquities in a politician or in a doctor. 'I might have been able to show you a very fine one, Mme de Guermantes said to me amiably, referring still to Hals, the finest one of all, according to some people, which was left to me by a German cousin. Unfortunately, it turned out to be "enfeoffed" in the castle – you don't know the expression? Neither do I,' she added with her fondness for witticisms (which, as she saw it, made her seem modern) about old customs to which she was none the less unconsciously and fiercely attached. 'I'm glad you've seen my Elstirs, but I have to say that I should have been a great deal gladder to have done you the honours of my Hals, my "enfeoffed" painting.

– I've seen that one, said Prince Von, it belongs to the Grand Duke of Hesse.

– Quite so; his brother married my sister, said M. de Guermantes, and it so happens that his mother and Oriane's were first cousins.

– But to return to M. Elstir, the Prince went on, I shall make so bold as to say, without having any opinion of his work, which is unknown to me, that the persistent hatred the Kaiser shows him ought not to be held against him in my view. The Kaiser is a wonderfully intelligent man.

– Yes, I've met him at dinner twice, once at my aunt Sagan's and then at my aunt Radziwill's, and I must say I found him somewhat unusual. I certainly didn't think he was simple! But there's something slightly funny about him, something forced (she emphasized the word) like a green carnation, I mean something that surprises me and makes me feel rather uncomfortable, a thing it's surprising that anyone should have been able to create but which would have been just as well left uncreated, it seems to me. I do hope I'm not offending you?

– The Kaiser is man of quite exceptional intelligence, Prince Von proceeded, he is passionately devoted to the arts; his sense of taste in works of art is all but infallible; he never makes an error of judgment; if something is good he recognizes it at once and takes a dislike to it. If he detests something, there can be no doubt about it, the thing is excellent.' Everyone smiled.

'How very reassuring, said the Duchesse.

– I'm rather inclined to compare the Kaiser,' continued the Prince, whose inability to pronounce the word archaeologist (that is, as though it were spelt with a k) did nothing to stop him taking every opportunity of using it, 'to an old archaeologist (which the Prince pronounced as 'arsheologist') we have in Berlin. If you set him in front of a genuine piece of Assyrian antiquity, this old arsheologist weeps. But if it is a modern fake, if it is something that is not really old, he fails to weep. And so, when they want to know whether an arsheological piece is really old, they take it to the old arsheologist. If he weeps, they buy the piece for the museum. If there are no tears, they send it back to the dealer and prosecute him for fraud. Well, every time I dine at Potsdam, if the Kaiser says to me of a play: "Prince, you must see it, it's a work of genius," I remind myself not to go to it, and when I hear him railing against an exhibition, I rush to see it at the earliest opportunity.

– Isn't it true that Norpois is in favour of an Anglo-French understanding? said M. de Guermantes.

– What good would that do you?' asked Prince Von, who could not endure the English, in a manner that was at once irritated and wily. 'The English are so schtubid. I realize they would not be of use to you as soldiers. But one can none the less judge them on the schtubidity of their generals. A friend of mine was talking to Botha the other day, you know, the Boer leader. This leader told him: "It's terrible, an army like that. I'm rather fond of the English, as it happens, but just imagine that I, a mere peassant, have thrashed them in every battle. And in the last one, when I was overpowered by a force twenty times the strength of my own, even when I was surrendering because I had to, I still managed to take two thousand prisoners! That was all right because I was only a leader of an army of peassants, but if those poor fools ever have to stand up to a real European army, one trembles to think what might happen to them!" Besides, you have only to see how their king, whom you know as well as I do, passes for a great man in England.'

I scarcely listened to those anecdotes, rather like the ones M. de Norpois used to tell my father; they afforded no food for my preferred patterns of thought; and besides, even had they possessed the elements they lacked, they would have needed to be of a highly exciting nature for my inner life to be aroused during those hours spent in society when I lived on the surface, my hair well groomed, my shirt-front starched, that is to say hours in which I could feel nothing of what I personally regarded as pleasure.

'Oh, I don't agree with you there,' said Mme de Guermantes, who felt that the German prince was wanting in tact, 'I find King Edward a charming man, so simple, and much shrewder than people think. And the Queen is, even now, the most beautiful thing I've ever seen.

– But, Matame la Duchesse, said the Prince, who was losing his temper and unable to see that he was causing offence, the fact remains that if the Prince of Wales had been an ordinary person there isn't a club that wouldn't have blackballed him, and nobody would have been willing to shake hands with him. The Queen is delightful, excessively sweet and of limited intelligence. But still, there's something shocking about a royal couple who are literally kept by their subjects, who get the big Jewish financiers to pay all the bills they ought to pay themselves, and make them Baronets in exchange. It's like the Prince of Bulgaria…

– He's our cousin, said the Duchesse, a man of wit.

– He's mine too, said the Prince, but that is no reason for us to have a high opinion of him. No, it's us you ought to make friends with, it's the Kaiser's dearest wish, but he wants it to come from the heart. He puts it this way: "What I want to see is a hand clasped in my own, not someone touching their hat to me!" With that you would be invincible. It would be a more practical solution than the Anglo-French rapprochement preached by M. de Norpois. – You know him, of course,' said the Duchesse, turning to me so as not to leave me out of the conversation. Remembering that M. de Norpois had had occasion to remark that I had looked as though I had wanted to kiss his hand, thinking that he had almost certainly repeated this story to Mme de Guermantes and could, in any event, only have spoken of me to her with malice, since in spite of his friendship with my father he had had no qualms about making me appear so ridiculous, I did not respond to this as a man of the world would have done. Such a man would have said that he detested M. de Norpois and had made it quite clear to him; he would have said this to give the impression that he was the deliberate cause of the Ambassador's slanders, which would then have been seen as no more than lying, calculated instances of retaliation. But instead I answered that, to my deep regret, I was afraid that M. de Norpois did not like me. 'You're quite wrong, replied Mme de Guermantes, he likes you very much indeed. You can ask Basin. If I have a reputation for telling people only what they want to hear, Basin certainly doesn't. He'll tell you that we've never heard Norpois speak about anyone so kindly as he speaks about you. And only the other day he was talking about creating a fine post for you at the ministry. Since he knew that you weren't in the best of health and would not be able to accept it, he had the delicacy not to mention a word about this kind thought to your father, for whom he has unbounded respect.' M. de Norpois was the very last person I should have expected to do me a service. The truth was that, since his was a mocking and even somewhat malicious nature, those who, like me, had let themselves be taken in by his outward appearance of a Saint Louis dispensing justice under an oak tree, by the glib tones of commiseration that emerged from his slightly too harmonious way of speaking, suspected real treachery when they learned of some slander directed towards them by a man whose words had always seemed so heartfelt. These slanders were a frequent enough occurrence. But they did not prevent him from taking a liking to people, from praising those he liked and taking pleasure in showing willingness to help them.

'Not that I'm at all surprised at his appreciating you, said Mme de Guermantes, he's an intelligent man. And I can quite understand,' she added for the benefit of those present, alluding to a plan of marriage of which I knew nothing, 'that my aunt, who has long ceased to amuse him as an old mistress, may not seem of very much use to him as a new wife. Especially since I understand that even as a mistress she hasn't performed for years now. Her only relations, if I can put it like that, are with the Good Lord above. You can't believe how churchy she is, and Boaz-Norpois could well take Victor Hugo's lines to heart:

> Voilà longtemps que celle avec qui j'ai dormi,
> Ô Seigneur, a quitté ma couche pour la vôtre![91]

Really, my poor aunt is like those avant-garde artists who have ranted against the Academy all their lives and end up starting a little academy of their own, or those unfrocked priests who then fabricate a religion of their own. They might as well stick to the cloth or not hang around in a group. But who knows, the Duchesse continued meditatively, it may be in anticipation of widowhood. There's nothing sadder than weeds one's not entitled to wear.

– Ah! If Mme de Villeparisis were to become Mme de Norpois, I think our cousin Gilbert would have a fit, said Général de Saint-Joseph.

– The Prince de Guermantes is a charming man, but he really is a stickler for matters of birth and etiquette, said the Princess of Parma. I went to spend a couple of days with him in the country, when the Princesse had the misfortune to be ill in bed. I went there with Petite. (This was a nickname given to Mme d'Hunolstein because she was an enormous woman.) The Prince came to meet me at the foot of the steps, offered me his arm and pretended not to see Petite. We went up to the reception rooms, and it was only then, as he stepped back to let me pass, that he brought himself to say: "Oh, good day to you, Mme d'Hunolstein" (he always calls her that now, since her separation), pretending that he had only just noticed Petite, in order to indicate that he had had no reason to come down to receive her at the foot of the steps.

– That doesn't surprise me in the least. I don't need to point out,' said the Duc, who regarded himself as extremely up-to-date, more contemptuous than anyone in the world of matters of birth, and even Republican in spirit, 'that I don't have a lot in common with my cousin. As Your Highness can imagine, our opinions on most subjects are about as distinct as day and night. But I must say that if my aunt were to marry Norpois, for once I should share Gilbert's view of the matter. To be the daughter of Florimont de Guise and to make such a marriage would be enough to send the cat into stitches, as they say, how else can I put it?' This last phrase, which the Duc usually used in the middle of a sentence, was utterly superfluous in the context. But he felt a constant need to utter it, which made him shift it to the end of a sentence if he could not get it in elsewhere. It functioned for him, among other things, as an element of prosody. 'Mind you, he added, the Norpois are excellent folk, they hail from a fine place, from good stock.

– Look here, Basin, it's no good you poking fun at Gilbert if you're going to speak the same language he does,' said Mme de Guermantes, for whom, like the Prince and the Duc de Guermantes, the 'goodness' of a family, no less than that of a wine, consisted precisely in its age. But, less outspoken than her cousin and more subtle than her husband, she made a point of never letting her words play false to the Guermantes spirit, and despised rank in what she said while she was ready to honour it in the way she behaved.

'But isn't there some sort of cousinly connection between you? asked the Général de Saint-Joseph. I have an idea that Norpois married a La Rochefoucauld.

– But not at all in the way you are thinking. She belonged to the branch of the Duc de la Rochefoucauld, and my grandmother comes from the Ducs de Doudeauville. She was the actual grandmother of Edouard Coco, the wisest man in the family, replied the Duc, whose conception of wisdom was rather superficial. The two branches of the family haven't intermarried since Louis XIV's time. The connection would be rather remote.

– Really, how interesting. I never knew that, said the General.

– And if I'm right, the Duc went on, his mother was the sister of the Duc de Montmorency and had originally been married to a La Tour d'Auvergne. But since those Montmorencys are barely Montmorencys, and those Tour d' Auvergnes aren't Tour d'Auvergnes at all, I can't see that it gives him any great station. He says – and this is more to the point – that he's descended from Saintrailles, and since we ourselves are in a direct line of descent…'

There was in Combray a rue de Saintrailles to which I had never given a second thought. It led from the rue de la Bretonnerie to the rue de l'Oiseau. And since Saintrailles, the companion of Joan of Arc, had married a Guermantes and brought into that family the county of Combray, his arms were quartered with those of the Guermantes at the base of one of the windows in Saint-Hilaire. I recalled the darkish sandstone steps, while a modulation of sound brought back that name Guermantes in the forgotten tone in which I used once to hear it, so different from the tone in which it merely indicated the genial hosts with whom I was dining that evening. If the name Duchesse de Guermantes was a collective noun to my mind, it was not so merely in history, as the accumulation of all the women who had borne it in turn, but also in the course of my own short early life, which had already seen, in this single Duchesse de Guermantes, so many women superimpose themselves, each one vanishing as soon as the next had sufficiently materialized. Words do not change their meaning over the centuries as much as names do for us in the space of a few years. Our memories and our hearts are not large enough to remain faithful. We have not room enough, in our present mental space, to keep the dead alongside the living. We are obliged to build on top of what has gone before and is unearthed only by a chance excavation, like the one just opened up by the name Saintrailles. I felt it would be pointless to explain all this, and a little earlier in the evening I had even implicitly lied by not replying to M. de Guermantes's question: 'You don't know our little patch of the woods?' Perhaps he was quite well aware of the fact that I did know it and had refused to press his question only out of good breeding. Mme de Guermantes drew me out of my day-dream.

'Personally I find all this sort of thing makes me die of boredom. It's really not always as boring as this in this house. I do hope you'll dine with us again soon as a compensation, and with no pedigrees next time,' the Duchesse said to me in an undertone, unable to appreciate the charm I might find in her house and without the humility to be content to let it appeal to me simply as a herbarium filled with outmoded specimens.

What Mme de Guermantes believed to be disappointing my expectations was on the contrary what in the end – for the Duc and the General went on relentlessly with their discussion of pedigree – saved my evening from being a complete disappointment. How could I have felt other than disappointed until now? Each of the dinner guests, cloaking the mysterious name under which I had merely known and imagined them at a distance in a body and mind similar or inferior to those of everyone else I knew, had given me the impression of a commonplace dullness which the initial view of the Danish port of Elsinore would give to any passionate admirer of Hamlet. No doubt these geographical regions and the historic past which injected forest glades and Gothic steeples into their names had to a certain extent shaped their faces, their minds and their prejudices, but had survived in them only as does the cause in the effect, that is as something which can be unearthed by the intelligence but in no way perceived by the imagination.

And these prejudices from the historical past instantly restored to the friends of M. and Mme de Guermantes their lost poetry. It is true that the notions possessed by the nobility which make them the scholars, the etymologists of the language not of words but of names (and even then only in comparison with the ignorant majority of the middle classes, for if, on the same level of mediocrity, a devout Catholic would be better able to answer questions on the liturgy than a free-thinker, by contrast, an anti-clerical archaeologist can often teach his parish priest a thing or two about everything connected even with that priest's own church), those notions, if we are to stick to the truth, that is to say to the spirit, had none of the charm for these noblemen that they had for a middle-class person. Possibly they knew better than I did that the Duchesse de Guise was Princess of Cleves, of Orléans, of Porcien, and so forth, but long before they knew all these names, they had known the Duchesse de Guise's face, which was subsequently what this name reflected back to them. I had begun with the fairy, even if she was soon fated to perish; they had begun with the woman herself.

In middle-class families you sometimes see jealousies starting up when the younger sister marries before the elder. Similarly the aristocratic world (the Courvoisiers in particular, but the Guermantes too) reduced its nobiliary greatness to mere levels of domestic superiority out of a childishness I had originally come across in books (the only place I found any charm in it). Does not Tallemant des Réaux[92] seem to be speaking about the Guermantes, as opposed to the Rohans, when he relates with evident satisfaction that M. de Guéménée shouted to his brother: 'You can step inside! This is not the Louvre!' and said of the Chevalier de Rohan himself (because he was the natural son of the Duc de Clermont): 'At least he's a prince!' The only thing that distressed me during the evening's conversation was to discover that the absurd gossip about the charming adopted Grand Duke of Luxembourg found as much credence in this salon as it did among Saint-Loup's friends. It was plainly an epidemic that would last perhaps for no longer than a year or so, but it had infected everyone. People repeated the same false gossip, or created more. I gathered that the Princess of Luxembourg herself, while ostensibly defending her nephew, was supplying weapons to attack him with. 'You are wrong to stand up for him,' M. de Guermantes told me, just as Saint-Loup had done. 'Look, even leaving aside the views of our family, which are unanimous on the subject, you have only to talk to his servants, and they, after all, are the people who know us best. Mme de Luxembourg gave her little negro page to her nephew. The page came back in tears: "Grand Duke beat me, me no bad boy, Grand Duke bad man, real bad." And I have this on good authority, from Oriane's cousin.'

I cannot say, now I come to think about it, how many times I heard the word 'cousin' used in the course of the evening. On the one hand, M. de Guermantes, at almost every name mentioned, would exclaim: 'But he's Oriane's cousin!' with the same delight as a man lost in a forest, who sees a signpost with two arrows pointing in opposite directions, each followed by a very low number of kilometres, reads the words 'Belvédère Casimir-Perier' and 'Croix du Grand-Veneur', and recognizes from them that he is on the right road. On the other hand, the word cousin was being used for a wholly different purpose (an exception to the rule prevailing at this gathering) by the Turkish Ambassadress, who had joined the party after dinner. Devoured by social ambition and endowed with a real gift for assimilating knowledge, she would ingest with equal facility Xenophon's account of the Ten Thousand[93] or the details of sexual perversion among birds. It would have been impossible to fault her on any of the most recent German publications, whether they dealt with political economy, mental illness, the various forms of onanism, or the philosophy of Epicurus. She was a dangerous woman to listen to into the bargain, since she was perpetually getting things wrong and would point out ladies of irreproachable virtue as women of the loosest morals, would put you on your guard against a man of the most honourable intentions, and tell you anecdotes that seemed to come out of a book, not because they were serious, but because they were utterly improbable.

Very few people opened their doors to her at this period. For a few weeks she would frequent socially brilliant women like the Duchesse de Guermantes, but as far as the noblest families were concerned, she had mostly confined herself, of necessity, to obscure branches of the family the Guermantes no longer frequented. She attempted to persuade people of her social standing by quoting the most distinguished names of little-known people who were her friends. The immediate reaction to this on the part of M. de Guermantes, who thought that she was referring to people with whom he frequently dined, was to quiver with delight at finding himself in familiar territory and to utter the rallying-cry: 'But he's Oriane's cousin! I know him like the back of my hand. He lives in the rue Vaneau. His mother was Mlle d'Uzès.'

The Ambassadress was forced to admit that her specimen had been drawn from a smaller stable. She tried to connect her friends with those of M. de Guermantes by means of a detour: 'I know very well who you mean. No, it's not them, it's their cousins.' But these words of partial withdrawal launched by the unfortunate Ambassadress soon lost any momentum they had. For M. de Guermantes, losing interest, answered: 'Oh, then I don't know who you're talking about.' The Ambassadress made no reply, for if she never knew anyone other than 'the cousins' of the people she ought to have known, very often these 'cousins' bore no relation to them at all. Then M. de Guermantes would offer a fresh wave of 'But she's Oriane's cousin,' words which seemed, in his eyes, to have the same practical value in each of his sentences as certain adjectives the Roman poets found convenient because they provided them with dactyls or spondees for their hexameters. At any event, the explosion 'But she's Oriane's cousin!' seemed to me quite natural applied to the Princesse de Guermantes, who was indeed very closely related to the Duchesse. The Ambassadress did not appear to care for the Princesse. She said in an undertone: 'The woman is stupid. And no, she's not that beautiful. That reputation is usurped. Anyway, she added with a look that was at once studied, dismissive and conclusive, I find her deeply antipathetic.' But often the question of tenuous relationships extended a great deal further, Mme de Guermantes making it a point of honour to address as 'Aunt' ladies with whom it would have been difficult to find a common ancestress without going back at least to Louis XV, just as, whenever 'hard times' brought it about that a multi-millionairess married a prince whose great-great-grandfather had married, like Oriane's, a daughter of Louvois, one of the joys of the rich American lady, after a first visit to the Hôtel de Guermantes, where she was, incidentally, rather coolly received and more or less gone over with a fine tooth-comb, was to be able to use the term 'Aunt' to Mme de Guermantes, who allowed her to do so with a maternal smile. But I little cared what 'birth' meant for M. de Guermantes and M. de Monserfeuil; in the conversations they held on the subject, the only pleasure I sought was a poetic one. Without being conscious of it themselves, they procured me this pleasure in the same way that farmers or seamen would have done talking about the soil or the tides, realities too ingrained in their lives for them to be able to enjoy the beauty which I myself undertook to extract from them.

Sometimes a name would remind me not so much of a pedigree as of a particular fact or date. As I heard M. de Guermantes recall that M. de Bréauté's mother had been a Choiseul and his grandmother a Lucinge, I would imagine that beneath the ordinary shirt-front with its plain pearl studs I could see bleeding in two crystal globes those august relics: the hearts of Mme de Praslin and of the Duc de Berry.[94] Other associations were more voluptuous: the fine and abundant hair of Mme Tallien or Mme de Sabran.[95]

Occasionally I saw more than a simple relic. Better informed than his wife about the nature of their ancestors, M. de Guermantes had a command of memories which gave his conversation the fine feel of an ancient mansion, lacking in real masterpieces but still full of authentic pictures, of middling interest and imposing, giving an overall impression of grandeur. When the Prince d'Agrigente enquired why Prince Von had referred to the Duc d'Aumale as 'my uncle', M. de Guermantes replied: 'Because his mother's brother, the Duke of Wurttemberg, married one of Louis Philippe's daughters.' I was immediately deep in contemplation of a reliquary, similar to those painted by Carpaccio or Memling, from its first panel, in which the princess was figured, at the wedding festivities of her brother the Duc d'Orléans, wearing a simple garden dress as a sign of her ill-humour at seeing her ambassadors return empty-handed after being sent to sue on her behalf for the hand of the Prince of Syracuse, to the last panel, in which she has just given birth to a son, the Duke of Wurttenberg (the very uncle of the prince with whom I had just dined), in the castle known as Fantaisie, one of those places which are themselves as aristocratic as certain families. For such places too, outlasting a single generation, become associated with more than one historical personage; this one in particular contains alongside one another the memories of the Margravine of Bayreuth, of that other rather unpredictable princess (the sister of the Duc d'Orléans) who was said to have found a certain appeal in the name of her husband's castle, of the King of Bavaria, and finally of Prince Von, who was the present inhabitant and who had just asked the Duc de Guermantes to write to him there, since he had succeeded to it and let it only during the Wagner festival performances to the Prince de Polignac, another delightful 'fantasis'. When M. de Guermantes, to explain how he was connected to Mme d'Arpajon, was obliged to go back, so far and so simply, along the chain of linked hands formed by three or five ancestresses, to Marie-Louise or to Colbert, the same thing happened again: in each of these cases, an important historical event appeared only in passing, masked, distorted, curtailed, in the name of a property, in the first names of a woman, chosen for her because she was the granddaughter of Louis-Philippe and Marie-Amélie, considered no longer as King and Queen of France, but only in their capacity as grandparents for bequeathing a heritage. (For different reasons, in a glossary to the works of Balzac, where the most illustrious names figure only in terms of their connection with La Comédie humaine, you can find Napoleon occupying far less space than Rastignac, and occupying it only because he once spoke to the Saint-Cygne ladies.) Thus does the heavy structure of the aristocracy, with its rare windows, admitting a scant amount of daylight, showing the same incapacity to soar, but also the same massive, blind force as Romanesque architecture, enclose all our history within its sullen walls.

Thus did the blank spaces of my memory gradually fill with names which, as they arranged and composed themselves in relation to each other, and as the connections between them became more and more numerous, resembled those perfected works of art in which there is not a single brush-stroke that does not contribute to the whole, and in which every element in turn receives from the rest a justification it confers on them in its turn.

After M. de Luxembourg's name had been brought up again, the Turkish Ambassadress told us how, when the young bride's grandfather (the man who had made a vast amount of money out of flour and pasta) had invited M. de Luxembourg to lunch, the latter had written to decline and addressed the envelope to: 'M. de , miller'; the grandfather had written back: 'I am all the more disappointed that you were unable to come, my dear friend, in that I should have been able to enjoy your company in privacy, for we were only a small party and there would have only been the miller, his son, and yourself.' This anecdote was not only utterly distasteful to me, but inconceivable as I knew it to be morally impossible that my dear M. de Nassau should write to his wife's grandfather (and a man whose fortune he was likely to inherit) addressing him as 'miller'; but there was the further point that its stupidity was glaringly apparent from the start, the word 'miller' having been so obviously dragged in only to lead up to the title of the La Fontaine fable.[96] But there is a kind of silliness in the Faubourg Saint-Germain, especially when it is aggravated by malice, which led everyone to applaud the words of this anecdote as 'inspired' and to see the grandfather, whom they all suddenly confidently declared to be a remarkable man, as a wittier one than his grandson-in-law. The Duc de Châtellerault wanted to take advantage of this story to recount one I had already heard in the café: 'Everyone was made to lie down!' – but no sooner had he begun with an account of M. de Luxembourg's claim that M. de Guermantes ought to stand up in his wife's presence than the Duchesse stopped him and protested: 'No, he's absurd to a degree, but he certainly wouldn't go that far.' My private conviction was that all this gossip at M. de Luxembourg's expense was equally untrue, and that whenever I found myself face to face with one of the participants or onlookers in the story I should hear the same denial. The only thing I wondered about was whether the denial I had just heard from Mme de Guermantes had arisen from a concern with the truth or from pride. In any event pride succumbed to malice, for she went on to say with a laugh: 'Not that I haven't had my little snub too. He invited me to tea to introduce me to the Grand Duchess of Luxembourg, which is how he has the good taste to describe his wife when he's writing to his aunt. I wrote back to say I was sorry I couldn't come and I added: "Do tell the 'Grand Duchess of Luxembourg' (in inverted commas) that if she wants to come and see me I'm at home every Thursday after five." I was even snubbed twice. I happened to be in Luxembourg and telephoned to ask to speak to him. His Highness was going to luncheon, had just finished luncheon, two hours went by and there was no reply. So I employed another method: "Would you tell the Comte de Nassau to come to the phone?" Cut to the quick, he was there at once.' Everyone laughed at the Duchesse's story and at further stories in the same vein, that is to say untrue ones (I am convinced of it), for a kinder, more intelligent, more refined, in a word more exquisite man than this Luxembourg-Nassau I had never met. The sequel will show that it was I who was right. Yet I must admit that among the spate of her nasty remarks Mme de Guermantes did have a kind word to say about him.

'He wasn't always like that, she remarked. Before he went off his head, like the man in the story-book who thinks he's become king, he was far from stupid, and indeed, in the early days of his engagement, he used to speak of it in a rather charming way, as an undreamed-of happiness: "It's just like a fairy-tale; I shall have to make my entry into Luxembourg in a fairy coach," he told his uncle d'Ornesson, who said in turn – for you know that Luxembourg is not a very big place: "A fairy coach, eh? I'm afraid you'd never get in with that. I'd suggest a goat-cart myself." Not only did this not annoy Nassau, but he was the first to tell us the story, and to laugh at it.

– Ornesson is full of witticisms, he has every reason to be: his mother was a Montjeu. He's in a bad way these days, is poor Ornesson.'

This name had the merit of interrupting the stale malicious gossip that would otherwise have gone on for ever. For M. Guermantes went on to explain that the M. d'Ornesson's great-grandmother had been the sister of Marie de Castille Montjeu, the wife of Timoléon de Lorraine, and therefore Oriane's aunt. This meant that the conversation reverted to genealogies, and I had the imbecile Turkish Ambassadress murmuring in my ear: 'You appear to be very much in the Duc de Guermantes's good books. Be careful.' And when I asked for an explanation: 'I mean – and I think you'll understand what I mean – that he's a man to whom one could safely entrust one's daughter, but not one's son.' Now if ever, on the contrary, there was a man who was a passionate and exclusive lover of women, that man was the Duc de Guermantes. But error, gullibly credited untruth, were for the Ambassadress like a life-sustaining element without which she could not function. 'His brother Mémé, who, for other reasons, I happen to deeply dislike (the fact was that he refused to acknowledge her), is genuinely distressed at the Duc's morals. So is their aunt Villeparisis. Ah, how I adore that woman. She's a real saint, a perfect example of the way great ladies used to be. She's not only a living image of virtue, but of reserve as well. She still addresses Ambassador Norpois as "Monsieur" even though she sees him every day. And he, by the way, made an excellent impression in Turkey.'

I did not even bother to reply to the Ambassadress because I was anxious to listen to the genealogies. Not all of them were important. It so happened that one of the unexpected alliances about which I learned from M. de Guermantes in the course of the conversation was a misalliance, but not without its charm since it united, under the July Monarchy, the Duc de Guermantes and the Duc de Fezanzac with two beauties, the daughters of a famous navigator, and graced these two duchesses with the unexpected piquancy of a bourgeois exoticism, an element of India à la Louis Philippe. Otherwise, under Louis XIV, there was a Norpois who had married a daughter of the Duc de Mortemart, whose illustrious title, in those far-off times, struck the name Norpois, which to me sounded humdrum and of possibly recent origin, and engraved it deeply with the beauty of an old medal. And again in these cases, it was not solely the less well-known name that benefited by the association: the other, turned into a cliché by its glitter, struck me more forcibly in its novel, less illustrious form, just as among the portraits painted by a brilliant colourist the most striking is sometimes the one that is all in black. The fresh mobility which seemed to me to animate all these names, as they came to join others from which I should have supposed them to be remote, was not due to my ignorance alone; the to-ings and fro-ings they were performing in my mind had been performed no less freely in those periods when a title, always attached to a given territory, would always follow it from one family to another, to the point, for example, where I could successively discern, in the fine feudal structure constituted by the title Duc de Nemours or Duc de Chevreuse, nestling as in the hospitable abode of a hermit-crab, a Guise, a Prince of Savoy, an Orléans, a Luynes. In some instances several remained in competition for a single shell: for the Principality of Orange, the royal house of the Netherlands and MM. de Mailly-Nesle: for the Duchy of Brabant, the Baron de Charlus and the royal house of Belgium; various others for the titles of Prince of Naples, Duke of Parma, Duke of Reggio. In others it was the other way round: the shell had been so long uninhabited by proprietors long since dead that it had never occurred to me that this or that name of a castle could have been, at a period which was after all comparatively recent, the name of a family. And so, when M. de Guermantes replied to a question put to him by M. de Monserfeuil: 'No, my cousin was a fanatical royalist. She was the daughter of the Marquis de Féterne, who had some part in the Chouan uprising,' when I saw this name Féterne, which to me, ever since my stay in Balbec, had been the name of a castle, become something I had never dreamed it could possibly be, the name of a family, I felt the same sense of astonishment I would have done reading a fairy-tale in which turrets and flights of steps come to life and turn into people. In this sense, it could be said that history, even mere family history, restores old stones to life. There have been men in Parisian society who played as considerable a part in it, who were more sought after for their distinction or their wit, who were just as well-born as the Duc de Guermantes or the Duc de La Trémoïlle. Today they have fallen into oblivion because, since they left no descendants, their name, which is no longer heard, echoes with an unfamiliar ring; at the very most, like the name of a thing in which we never expect to discover the name of a person, it survives in some castle, in some remote village. There will soon be a day when the traveller who stops in the heart of Burgundy in the tiny village of Charlus to look at its church, if he is not studious enough or in too much of a hurry to examine its tombstones, will go away ignorant of the fact that the name Charlus was the name of a man who ranked with the greatest. This thought reminded me that it was time for me to leave, and that while I was standing there listening to M. de Guermantes talking genealogy, the time I had promised to call on his brother was fast approaching. Who knows, I went on thinking, whether one day Guermantes itself may survive as anything other than a place name, except to archaeologists who stop briefly in Combray, stand before the window of Gilbert the Bad, and have the patience to hear out the account given them by Théodore's successor or to read the curé's guide? But as long as a great name is not extinct, it keeps the men and women who bore it in the limelight; and no doubt part of the interest which the illustriousness of these families assumed for me lay in the fact that it is possible, starting from the present, to follow them back step by step to well before the fourteenth century, and to find the memoirs and correspondence of all the forebears of M. de Charlus, of the Prince d'Agrigente, of the Princess of Parma, in a past which would shroud the origins of a middle-class family in impenetrable darkness, documents in which we can ascertain, in the luminous backward projection of a name, the origin and persistence of various nervous characteristics, vices and disorders of one or another of the Guermantes. Almost pathologically identical with their namesakes of the present day, from century to century they arouse the startled interest of their correspondents, whether these predate the Princess Palatine and Mme de Motteville, or follow on from the Prince de Ligne.

Yet my historical curiosity paled before my aesthetic pleasure. The names I had heard uttered had a disembodying effect on the Duchesse's guests – in spite of the fact that they might be called the Prince d'Agrigente or the Prince de Cystria – whose masks of flesh and absent or vulgar intelligence had transformed them into rather ordinary specimens, to the point that I ended up feeling that I had landed on the Guermantes door-mat not as upon the supposed threshold but at the terminus of the magic world of names. The Prince d'Agrigente himself, the moment I heard that his mother had been a Damas, a granddaughter of the Duke of Modena, was set free, as from an unstable chemical alloy, from the face and speech that prevented one from recognizing him, and joined up with Damas and Modena, themselves mere titles, to form an infinitely more seductive combination. Each name displaced by the attraction of another, with which I had never suspected it of having any affinity, left the static position it had occupied in my brain where familiarity had dulled it, and, going off to join the Mortemarts, the Stuarts and the Bourbons, linked up with them to form branches of the most graceful pattern and changing colour. The name Guermantes received from all those fine names, extinct and so all the more glowingly rekindled, with which I learned only now that it was connected, a new and purely poetic sense. At the very most, on the tip of each spray that burgeoned forth from the proud stem, I could see it flower into the face of some wise monarch or illustrious princess, like the father of Henri IV or the Duchesse de Longueville. But since these faces, different in this respect from those of the guests in the room, were in no way overlaid by the residue of physical experience or social mediocrity, they remained, in their handsome outlines and shifting reflections, homogeneous with the names which, at regular intervals, each with its own colouring, detached themselves from the Guermantes genealogical tree, and disturbed with no foreign or opaque matter the translucent, alternating, multi-coloured buds which, like the ancestors of Jesus in windows figuring the tree of Jesse, blossomed on either side of the glass tree.

I had already made several attempts to take my leave for various reasons, but principally because of the insignificance that my presence was imposing on the party, although it was one of those I had long imagined as being so glamorous, as it doubtless would have been had there been no awkward witness present. At least my departure would allow the guests, once the trespasser had disappeared, to form them selves into a closed circle. They would be free to celebrate the mysteries for which they had gathered there, and they had certainly not gathered to discuss Frans Hals or miserliness, and to discuss such matters in the same way as people do in bourgeois society. The talk was trivial, no doubt because I was present, and seeing all these pretty women kept apart, it pained me to think that my presence was preventing them from proceeding, in the most precious of its salons, with the mysterious life of the Faubourg Saint-Germain. But every attempt I made to leave was being foiled by M. and Mme de Guermantes, who carried the spirit of self-sacrifice to the point of constantly detaining me. More curious still, several of the ladies who had come running with delight, in all their finery, glittering with jewels, only to attend a party which, because of me, differed from parties given elsewhere than in the Faubourg Saint-Germain really no more than one feels oneself, in Balbec, to be in a town that differs from what one usually sees – several of these ladies took their leave, not in a state of disappointment, as they had every reason to be, but thanking Mme de Guermantes effusively for the delightful evening they had spent, as though on other days, the days on which I was not present, nothing different happened.

Was it really for dinner-parties like the present one that all these people dressed up and refused middle-class women admittance to their exclusive drawing-rooms? For dinner-parties like this, which would have been no different even in my absence? For a second I suspected as much, but the suspicion was too absurd. Plain common sense enabled me to brush it aside. And had I embraced it, what would have been left of the name Guermantes, already so demoted since the Combray days?

Besides, these flower-maidens were, to a strange extent, easily pleased with another person, or anxious to please that person, for more than one of them, with whom I had exchanged, in the course of the entire evening, no more than a handful of casual remarks the stupidity of which had left me blushing, made a point, before she left the drawing-room, of coming to tell me, as she held me in a fond look from her lovely eyes and straightened as she spoke the spray of orchids that followed the curves of her bosom, what a deep pleasure it had been to make my acquaintance, and to speak to me – a veiled allusion to a dinner invitation – of her desire to 'arrange something' after she had 'fixed a day' with Mme de Guermantes. None of these flower ladies left the room before the Princess of Parma. The presence of the latter – one must never leave before royalty – was one of the two reasons, neither of which I had suspected, why the Duchesse had been so insistent on my remaining. The minute Mme de Parme rose to her feet, there was the feeling that everyone had been set free. Each of the ladies, after making a genuflexion before the Princess, received from her in a kiss, and like a benediction they had begged for on their knees, permission to ask for their cloaks and their attendants. With the result that, at the main door, there was something like a vociferous recital of great names from the history of France. The Princess of Parma had forbidden Mme de Guermantes to accompany her down to the hall for fear of her catching cold, and the Duc had added: 'Come now, Oriane, since Madame gives you leave to stay here, remember what the doctor told you.'

'I think that the Princess of Parma was very pleased to dine with you.' I knew the formula. The Duc had come from the other end of the drawing-room to utter it to me, in an obliging, fulsome manner, as though he were awarding me a diploma or offering me a plate of petits fours. The pleasure he appeared to be feeling at that moment, and which brought such a gentle expression to his face for that instant, led me to sense that the order of attentiveness to which his gesture belonged was of the kind that would be with him until the very end of his life, like those honorific sinecures that are retained even by the senile.

Just as I was about to leave, the Princess's lady-in-waiting reappeared in the drawing-room, in search of some flowers she had forgotten, marvellous pinks, from the Guermantes estate, which the Duchesse had offered Mme de Parme. This lady-in-waiting was rather flushed, and one felt that she had just been put roundly in her place, for the Princess, so kind towards everyone else, could not conceal her impatience at the stupidity of her attendant. And so the latter picked up the bunch of pinks and moved off in a hurry, but to preserve some element of unflustered behaviour and wilful independence, she blurted out to me as she passed: 'The Princess tells me I'm keeping her waiting; she is impatient to be gone and she wants take the pinks. Heavens! I'm not some little bird, I can't be all over the place at once.'

Alas! the rule about not leaving before royalty was not the only thing that detained me. I was unable to leave immediately for another reason: this was that the lavishness (unknown to the Courvoisiers) for which the Guermantes, whether opulent or practically ruined, were famous when they entertained their friends, was not only lavishness in material terms but also, as I had often experienced with Robert de Saint-Loup, a lavishness of charming words, courteous gestures, a whole gamut of verbal elegance nourished by real intensity of feeling. But as this last, in the idleness of fashionable existence, finds no outlet, it poured forth at times, seeking some channel of expression in a kind of fleeting effusiveness, which was all the more anxiously solicitous, and which might, on the part of Mme de Guermantes, have been mistaken for affection. She did in fact feel it at the moment she let it overflow, for she discovered then, in the company of the friend, man or woman, she was with at the time, a sense of intoxication, in no way sensual, similar to that which music induces in certain people; she would find herself picking a flower from her bodice, or a medallion, and giving it to someone with whom she would have liked to prolong the evening, yet with the melancholy feeling that to prolong it would have led to nothing but idle chatter, which would have absorbed nothing of the nervous pleasure, the fleeting emotion of the experience, and which would have been reminiscent in this respect of the impression of lassitude and regret that follow the first warm days of spring. And as far as the friend was concerned, it was important that he was not too taken in by the promises, more thrilling than any he had ever heard, proffered by these women, who, because they are particularly susceptible to the sweetness of a moment, turn it, with a delicacy, a nobility not granted to ordinary creatures, into a masterpiece of endearment and kindness, and no longer have anything of themselves left to give in the moment that follows. Their affection does not outlive the moment of elation that dictated it; and the subtlety of mind which had led them at that point to intuit all the things that you wished to hear, and to say them to you, will enable them, a few days later, to pinpoint your foibles and use them to entertain another of their guests with whom they will in turn be enjoying one of these moments musicaux which are so short-lived.

In the hall, I asked a footman for my snowboots, which I had brought as a precaution against the snow (a few flakes had fallen and already turned to slush), and not realizing how unfashionable they were, I started to feel, because of the contemptuous smiles I was getting, a sense of shame which reached its peak when I realized that Mme de Parme had not in fact left and was watching me put on my American rubbers. The Princess came across to me. 'Oh! what a good idea! she exclaimed, it's so practical! What a very sensible man. Madame, we shall have to buy some of those,' she said to her lady-in-waiting, as the ironic reception of the footmen turned to respect and the other guests crowded around to ask where I had managed to find these wonderful things. 'With those on your feet, you'll have nothing to fear, even if it snows again and you've far to go. You're not at the mercy of the weather, the Princess said to me.

– Oh! as far as the weather's concerned Your Royal Highness can set her mind at rest, broke in the lady-in-waiting knowingly, it won't snow again.

– And how could you possibly know that?' questioned the peerless Princess of Parma in a withering tone provoked by the one thing that could manage to ruffle her, the stupidity of her lady-in-waiting.

'I can assure Your Royal Highness that it can't snow again. It's a physical impossibility.

– But why?

– It can't snow again because they've taken the necessary steps to prevent it. They've put salt on the roads!'

The simple-minded lady did not notice the Princess's anger nor other people's mirth, for instead of remaining silent she said to me with a bland smile, disregarding utterly the denials I had made of any connection with Admiral Jurien de la Gravière: 'Not that it matters, in any case. Monsieur must have strong sea legs. It runs in the family!'

After escorting the Princess of Parma to her carriage, M. de Guermantes picked up my greatcoat with the words: 'Let me help you into your skin.' And he no longer used this expression with an apologetic smile, for given the way the Guermantes affected simplicity, the most low-class expressions, just because they were low-class, had become aristocratic.

An exhilaration which, because it was artificial, tailed off into melancholy was what I also felt, though quite differently from Mme de Guermantes, once I finally left her house in the carriage that was to take me to M. de Charlus. We are free to abandon ourselves to one or other of two forces, one arising in ourselves, emanating from our deepest impressions, the other affecting us from without. The natural accompaniment of the first is a joy, the joy that springs from the life of creative people. The other current, the one which aims to introduce into us the impulses by which people external to ourselves are stirred, is not accompanied by pleasurable feeling; but we can add pleasure to it through a vicarious reaction, adopting an intoxication so artificial that it quickly turns into melancholy, into boredom; whence the gloomy faces of so many society people and their pronounced tendency towards nervous conditions which may even lead to suicide. Now, in the carriage that was taking me to M. de Charlus, I was prey to this second sort of exhilaration, very different from that afforded by a personal impression, like those I had received in other carriages: once in Combray, in Dr Percepied's gig, from which I had seen the Martinville steeples against the setting sun; another day in Balbec, in Mme de Villeparisis's barouche, when I tried hard to work out what it was I was reminded of by an avenue of trees. But in this third carriage, what I had before my mind's eye were those conversations that had seemed so tedious at Mme de Guermantes's dinner-party, for example Prince Von's stories about the Kaiser, General Botha and the British Army. I had just slid these into the inner stereoscope we use, as soon as we are no longer ourselves, as soon as we adopt a society spirit and wish to receive our life only from others, to bring into solid relief what they have said and done. Like a man who has had too much to drink and feels full of kindness and consideration for the waiter who has been serving him, I marvelled at my good fortune – something I had not felt, for sure, at the actual moment – in having dined with someone who knew Wilhelm II so well and had told stories about him that were, upon my word, extremely witty. And as I recalled, together with the Prince's German accent, his story about General Botha, I laughed out loud, as if my laughter, like certain kinds of applause which bolster one's inner admiration, was a necessary corroboration of the story's comic qualities. Through the magnifying lenses, even those of Mme de Guermantes's pronouncements which had struck me as stupid (such as her remarks about seeing Frans Hals paintings from a tram-car) assumed an extraordinary life and depth. And I have to say that, even if this sense of elation was quick to subside, it was not completely nonsensical. Just as there may come a day when we are happy to know the person whom we despise most because he happens to be connected with a girl with whom we are in love, to whom he can introduce us, and thus becomes useful and agreeable, something we would never have dreamed he could be, so there is no conversation, any more than there are personal relations, from which we can be certain that we shall not one day derive some benefit. What Mme de Guermantes had said to me about paintings it would be interesting to see, even from a tram-car, was untrue, but it contained a grain of truth which was valuable to me at a later stage.

Similarly the lines from Victor Hugo she had quoted in my presence were admittedly from an earlier period of his work than the one in which he became something more than a new man, in which he evolved a literary species that was previously unknown, endowed with more complex organs. In these early poems, Victor Hugo is still a thinker, rather than a natural force content with providing food for thought. His 'thoughts' he expressed at this period in the most direct form, almost in the sense in which the Duc understood the word when he found it old-fangled and cumbersome of his guests at big parties at Guermantes to append to their signatures in the visitors' book some philosophic-poetical reflection, and would warn new-comers in a pleading voice: 'Your name, my dear chap, but no "thoughts", I beg you!' Now, it was these 'thoughts' of Victor Hugo (almost as absent from La Légende des siècles as 'tunes' and 'melodies' are from Wagner's later manner) that Mme de Guermantes was so fond of in his early work. Nor was she altogether wrong here. They were moving, and already around them, before their form had yet achieved the depth it was to acquire only later on, the flooding tide of words and richly articulated rhymes made them very different from the lines you find in Corneille, for example, in which Romantic feeling, sporadic and restrained, and therefore all the more moving, has nevertheless not managed to penetrate to the physical sources of life, or modified the unconscious and generalizable organism in which the idea is implicit. And so I had been wrong to confine myself up to this point to Hugo's later collections. It is true that Mme de Guermantes had used only a fractional part of the earlier ones to embellish her conversation. But the point is that, by quoting an isolated line in this way, you increase its power of attraction tenfold. The lines that had entered or returned to my mind in the course of this dinner-party acted as magnets in their turn, powerfully called up the poems within which they were normally embedded, so that my magnetized hands were unable to put up more than forty-eight hours' resistance to the force that drew them towards the volume in which Les Orientales or Les chants du crépuscule were bound. I cursed Françoise's footman for having made a gift of my copy of the Feuilles d'automne to his native village, and lost no time sending him out to buy me another. I reread these volumes from cover to cover and found respite only when I suddenly stumbled, waiting there for me in the light in which she had bathed them, on the lines which Mme de Guermantes had quoted. For all these reasons, talk with the Duchesse was like the discoveries we make in the library of a country house, outdated, incomplete, incapable of forming a mind, devoid of almost everything we value, but occasionally offering us some curious piece of information, or even a quotation from a fine passage that was unknown to us and which subsequently we are happy to remember as something we were introduced to because of a stay in a splendid stately home. And because we have discovered Balzac's preface to the Chartreuse or some unpublished letters of Joubert, we are then tempted to exaggerate the value of our stay there, the barren frivolity of which we forget in the light of a single evening's happy discovery.

From this point of view, if this social world had been unable to respond initially to what my imagination expected, and was consequently to strike me first of all by what it had in common with every other world rather than the ways it differed from them, it none the less revealed itself to me as something quite distinct. Noblemen are almost the only people who can teach you as much as peasants; their conversation is adorned with everything that concerns the land, dwellings as people used to live in them in the past, old customs, everything about which the moneyed world is profoundly ignorant. Even supposing that an aristocrat of the most moderate aspirations has finally caught up with the times in which he lives, his mother, his uncles, his great-aunts keep him in touch, when he recalls his childhood, with a style of life that is almost unknown today. In the death-chamber of a deceased contemporary, Mme de Guermantes would not have pointed out, but would have been the first to notice all the lapses from traditional practice. It shocked her to see women mingling with the men at a funeral, when there was a special ceremony which ought to be celebrated for the women themselves. As for the pall, which Bloch would have doubtless seen as reserved for funerals, on account of the pall-bearers mentioned in reports of funeral ceremonies, M. de Guermantes could remember the time when, still a child, he had seen it borne at the wedding of M. de Mailly-Nesle. While Saint-Loup had sold his priceless 'genealogical tree', together with old portraits of the Bouillons and letters of Louis XIII, in order to buy Carrière paintings[97] and Art Nouveau furniture, M. and Mme de Guermantes, inspired by a sentiment in which a fervent love of art may have played less part and made them appear more commonplace, had kept their marvellous Boulle[98] furniture, which presented a quite different overall appeal to an artistic mind. A literary mind would similarly have been enchanted by the conversation, which for him – for a hungry man has no need of another to keep him company – would have been a living dictionary of all those expressions which are passing out of the language by the day (Saint-Joseph neckties, children pledged to wear blue, and so on), and which survive today only among people who have taken it upon themselves to act as the obliging and benevolent custodians of the past. The pleasure that a writer experiences in their company, far more than in that of other writers, is not without its risks, for he is in danger of believing that the things of the past have a charm in themselves, of transporting them raw into his work, which, if he does, becomes still-born and smacks of staleness, for which he consoles himself with the thought: 'It's appealing because it's authentic, that's how people talk.' These aristocratic conversations had the further charm, in Mme de Guermantes's case, of being conducted in excellent French. For this reason, they made it permissible for the Duchesse to react hilariously to the words 'vatic', 'cosmic', 'pythian', 'supereminent' that formed part of Saint-Loup's vocabulary – in the same way as she did to his Bing furniture.[99]

But in the end, the stories I had heard at the Duchesse's house, very different in this respect from the feelings aroused in me by the hawthorns or the taste of a madeleine, left me cold. Entering me for a moment and possessing me only physically, it was as though, being of a social, not an individual, nature, they were anxious to escape. I writhed as I sat in the carriage like a prophetess in a trance. I envisaged another dinner-party at which I might myself become a sort of Prince X, or a Mme de Guermantes, and tell the same sort of stories. In the meantime I stammered them out through my trembling lips and tried in vain to restore order to a mind that was carried away by a centrifugal force. And so it was with a feverish impatience not to have to bear the weight of all this any longer on my own in a carriage where I made up for the lack of conversation by talking aloud to myself, that I rang at M. de Charlus's door, and it was in long monologues with myself, in which I rehearsed everything I was going to tell him with scarcely a thought of what he might have to say to me, that I spent the whole of the time awaiting him in a drawing-room into which I had been shown by a footman, and which I was too wound up to take in. I was so anxious for M. de Charlus to listen to the stories I was dying to tell him that I was bitterly disappointed to think that the master of the house had perhaps gone to bed and that I should have to go back home to work off my verbal intoxication. I had just noticed in fact that I had spent twenty-five minutes, that they had perhaps forgotten about me, in this room about which, despite the long wait, the most I could have said was that it was huge, greenish in colour, and contained a handful of portraits. The need to talk prevents one not only from listening, but from noticing anything, and in this case the absence of any description of external surroundings is description enough of an internal state. I was on the point of leaving the room to try to summon someone and, if I found no one, to make my way back to the entrance lobby and have myself let out, when, just as I had risen and taken a few steps across the mosaic parquet, a footman came in and said with a worried expression on his face: 'M. le Baron has been engaged all evening. There are still several people waiting to see him. I shall do my utmost to get him to receive Monsieur. I've already telephoned twice to his secretary.

– No, please don't trouble yourself further. I did have an appointment with M. le Baron, but it's now very late, and if he's busy this evening I can come back another day.

– Oh no, Monsieur, you mustn't leave, exclaimed the footman. M. le Baron might be put out. I'll try again.'

I recalled what I had heard about M. de Charlus's servants and their devotion to their master. It could not quite be said of him, as it could of the Prince de Conti, that he sought to please a valet as much as a minister, but he had been so skilful in presenting the least thing he demanded of them like a sort of favour that at night, when his personal valets were assembled around him at a respectful distance, and after running his eye over them, he would say: 'Coignet, the candlestick!' or 'Ducret, my nightshirt!' it was with an envious grumble that the others withdrew, jealous of the servant who had been singled out by the master. Two of them, in fact, who loathed each other, would each try to snatch the favour from the other by using the flimsiest of pretexts to take some message to the Baron, if he had gone upstairs earlier than usual, in the hope of being entrusted that evening with the duty of candlestick or nightshirt. If he spoke to one or other of them directly about something outside their duties, or even more, if in winter, in the garden, knowing that one of his coachmen had caught cold, he said to him after ten minutes: 'Wrap yourself up properly,' the others would not speak to the man with a cold for a fortnight, out of jealousy for the favour conferred on him.

I waited ten minutes more, then, after requesting me not to stay too long because M. le Baron was tired and had had to send away several most important people who had made appointments with him many days ago, I was ushered into his presence. This theatrical to-ing and fro-ing around M. de Charlus was beginning to strike me as a great deal less impressive than the down-to-earthness of his brother Guermantes, but already the door stood open to reveal a glimpse of the Baron in a Chinese dressing-gown, with his throat bare, stretched out on a sofa. My eye was arrested in the same instant by the mirror-like nap of a top hat, abandoned on a chair with a cape, suggesting that the Baron had only just arrived back home. The footman withdrew. I imagined that M. de Charlus would come over to greet me. Without stirring an inch he fixed me with the harshest of looks. I went over to him and said good evening. He did not hold out his hand, made no reply to my greeting, did not ask me to take a chair. After a moment's pause I asked him, as one would ask an ill-mannered doctor, whether I needed to remain standing. There was nothing nasty about the way I said this, but the cold fury on M. de Charlus's face seemed to intensify. Nor was I aware that at home, in the country, at the Château de Charlus, he was in the habit – so much did he love to play the king – of sprawling in an armchair in the smoking-room, leaving his guests to stand around him. He would ask one of them for a light, offer another a cigar, before saying, after a few moments had elapsed: 'But Argencourt, why don't you sit down? Take a chair, my dear man,' or something of the sort, having made a point of keeping them standing simply to remind them that permission to be seated came from him. 'Sit in the Louis XIV chair,' he answered me imperiously, as though he were forcing me to keep my distance rather than inviting me to sit down. I occupied an armchair that was fairly close. 'Ah! so that is what you call a Louis XIV chair! I can see that you're a well-educated young man,' he broke out in derision. I was so astonished that I stayed in my seat, neither getting up to leave as I ought to have done, nor moving to another chair as he wished me to do. 'Monsieur,' he said, weighing each of his words in turn and prefixing the more insolent of them with a double consonant, 'the interview I have condescended to grant you, at the behest of a person who desires to remain nameless, will put a full stop to our relations. I will make no secret of the fact that I had hoped for better things. I should perhaps be putting too great a strain on the meaning of the words, which one ought not to do, even with people who are ignorant of their value, simply out of respect for oneself, were I to tell you that I had felt a certain liking for you. But I think that the word benevolence, in its most effectively tutelary sense, would exceed neither what I felt nor what I was proposing to offer. I had given you to understand, as soon as I returned to Paris, while you were still at Balbec, that you could count upon me.' Remembering the unexpected outburst with which M. de Charlus had parted from me in Balbec, I made a vague gesture of denial. 'What! he burst out angrily (and indeed his white, convulsed face differed so much from his ordinary face as the sea on a stormy morning, when instead of its usual smiling surface you see a seething mass of snake-like spray and foam), are you suggesting that you did not not receive my message – almost a declaration – that you were to remember me? How was the cover of the book I sent you decorated?

– With some very pretty intertwined figures, I told him.

– Ah! came the scornful reply, young Frenchmen know little of the treasures of our land. What would you have to say about a young Berliner who was ignorant of the Walküre? In fact you must have eyes that are blind since you yourself told me that you spent two hours in front of that particular treasure. I can see that you know no more about flowers than you do about styles. Don't start protesting about styles, he exploded in a shrill scream of rage, you don't even know what you're sitting on. You present your backside with a Directory fireside chair and tell it it's sitting on a Louis XIV wing chair. One of these days you'll mistake Mme de Villeparisis's lap for the toilet seat, and one begins to wonder what you'd leave in it. It's just like your not even noticing the lintel of myosotis over the Balbec church door on the binding of that book by Bergotte. Could there have been a more obvious way of saying to you: "Forget me not"?'

My eyes were upon M. de Charlus. It was true that his magnificent head, repugnant though it was, far surpassed the heads of all his relatives; he was like an ageing Apollo; but it was as if an olive-greenish, bilious juice was about to seep out of his malevolent mouth. Intellectually, there was no denying that the vast compass of his mind embraced a great many things which would forever remain unknown to the Duc de Guermantes. But however fine the language in which he cloaked all his hatreds, you had the feeling that, even if his words were motivated by hurt pride or disappointment in love, by rancour, sadism, a need to tease or obsession, this man was capable of murder, and of proving by dint of logic and eloquence that he had been right to commit murder and was still head and shoulders above his brother, his sister-in-law, and all the rest of them.

'As in Velasquez's Surrender of Breda,' he continued, 'the victor advances towards the man who is humblest in rank, and as is the duty of every noble soul, since I was everything and you were nothing, it was I who took the first steps towards you. You have responded stupidly to what it is not for me to describe as an act of grandeur. But I refused to be discouraged. Our religion exhorts us to be patient. The patience I have shown towards you will be counted, I hope, to my credit, as will the mere smile brought to my lips by what might be decried as impertinence, were it within your power to be impertinent to one who is head and shoulders above you. But all that, Monsieur, is now neither here nor there. I have submitted you to the test which the one eminent man among us has appositely called the test of too much kindness, which he rightly declares to be the most terrible test of all, the only one that can separate the wheat from the chaff. I can scarcely reproach you for your lack of success in it, for those who emerge triumphant are very few. But, and this is the conclusion I feel myself entitled to draw from these last words we shall exchange on earth, at least I mean to protect myself from your slanderous attempts upon me.'

Thus far, it had never occurred to me that M. de Charlus's rage could have been caused by an unflattering remark that someone had repeated to him; I racked my brains; I had not spoken about him to anyone. Some malicious person had invented the whole thing. I protested to M. de Charlus that I had said absolutely nothing about him. 'I don't think I can have offended you by mentioning to Mme de Guermantes that we were on friendly terms with each other.' He smiled disdainfully, raised his voice to its highest pitch, then, softly attacking the shrillest and most injurious note:

'Oh! Monsieur,' he said, as he reverted extremely slowly to a natural intonation, seeming to revel as he went in the oddities of this descending scale, 'I think you do yourself an injustice to accuse yourself of having said that we were friends. I don't expect much verbal accuracy from someone who can barely tell the difference between a piece of Chippendale furniture and a rococo chair, but I really can't believe,' he went on, in a series of vocal caresses that became increasingly sardonic to the point of causing a charming smile to play across his lips, 'I really can't believe that you can ever have said, or thought for that matter, that we were friends. Had you boasted of being presented to me, of having talked to me, of knowing me slightly, of having been offered, almost unasked, the possibility of becoming an eventual protégé of mine, that I would have found, on the contrary, quite natural and intelligent on your part. The extreme difference in age between us makes it possible for me to recognize without absurdity that such a presentation, such talks, the vague glimmer of any relationship between us would have been for you, it is not for me to say an honour, but still, all things considered, an advantage in regard to which, it seems to me, you were silly enough not to divulge it, but to have had no idea how to hold on to it. I will even go as far as to say,' he added, switching abruptly for a second from haughty anger to a gentleness so tinged with regret that I thought he was going to burst into tears, 'that when you failed to reply to the proposal I made to you from Paris, it seemed to me so utterly unlikely on your part, since you had struck me as well brought up and from a good middle-class family (it was only on this adjective that his voice gave a slight hiss of impertinence), that I was foolhardy enough to credit all the false excuses people make, letters gone astray, wrong addresses. I realize that it was very gullible of me, but St Bonaventure chose to believe that oxen could fly rather than that his brother monk was capable of lying. But all that is over. The idea didn't appeal to you, and that's that. Only it seems to me that you might have taken the trouble (and here there were genuine tears in his voice), were it only out of consideration for my age, to write to me. I had planned some infinitely attractive possibilities for you, though I had taken good care not to let you know what they were. You chose to refuse before you knew. That was up to you. But, as I say, one can always write. In your position, indeed even in my own, I should have done so. That is why I prefer mine to yours – I say this because I believe all our positions are equal, and I am more sympathetically disposed towards an intelligent labourer than I am towards a great many dukes. But I can say that I prefer to be in my position, because in the whole course of my life, which is beginning to be a pretty long one, I know that I have never done what you did. (He had his head turned away from the light, and I could not see if tears were falling from his eyes as his voice led me to suppose.) I said I had come well out of my way to meet you. The effect of that was to make you withdraw twice as far. Now it is my turn to withdraw, and we shall know one another no longer. I shall put your name from my mind but not your behaviour, so that on occasions when I might be tempted to believe that men have feelings, good manners, or merely the intelligence not to let slip an unrivalled opportunity, I can remind myself that that is to ask too much of them. No, that you should have said you knew me when such a thing was true – and from now on it will no longer be the case – I see that as only natural and take it as an act of homage, I mean as something agreeable. Unhappily, in other places and circumstances, you have made remarks of a very different kind.

– Believe me, Monsieur, I have said nothing that could offend you.

– And who says that I'm offended?' he broke out furiously, starting up with a jerk on the sofa on which he had so far been reclining motionless, while, as the pallid, frothing snakes in his face stiffened tensely, his voice became alternately shrill or deep like the deafening uproar unleashed by a storm. (His normally forceful voice, which tended to make people turn in the street, was a hundred times more forceful, as a forte is when played by an orchestra rather than on the piano, and changed to a fortissimo at the same time. M. de Charlus roared.) 'Do you imagine you have the power to offend me? Have you no idea to whom you are speaking? Do you imagine that the poisonous spittle of five hundred little men of your sort, hoisted on to each other's shoulders, could even drool down on to the tips of my august toes?'

For the last few minutes, my desire to persuade M. de Charlus that I had never spoken or heard anyone speak ill of him had given way to a wild rage, provoked by the words which, to my mind, were dictated to him solely by his colossal pride. And perhaps they stemmed, in part at least, from this pride. Almost everything else was the result of a feeling that was as yet unknown to me, and for which I could not therefore be blamed for underestimating. In the absence of my familiarity with this feeling, I could at least, had I remembered Mme de Guermantes's words, assumed an element of madness in this pride of his. But at the time, the idea of madness did not cross my mind. As I saw it, he was filled merely with pride, I merely with fury. This fury (at the point when M. de Charlus ceased to shout, in reference to his august toes, with an irked majesty, a vomit of disgust at his unnamed blasphemers) was no longer able to contain itself. I was seized with a compulsion to hit something, and, with the little discernment I had left, not wanting to show bodily disrespect to a man so much older than myself nor even, in view of their artistic worth, to the pieces of German porcelain surrounding him, I grabbed hold of the Baron's new top hat, threw it to the ground, trampled on it, and, bent on pulling it to pieces, I ripped out the lining, tore the crown in two, heedless of the continuing vociferations of M. de Charlus, then, crossing the room to make my exit, I opened the door. I was dumbfounded to discover two footmen standing on either side of it, slowly moving away in an attempt to create the impression that they had only been casually passing in the course of their duty. (I subsequently learned their names: one was called Burnier, the other Charmel.) I was not taken in for a moment by the explanation which their leisurely movement seemed to offer. It was utterly unconvincing: three other explanations seemed more likely: one was that the Baron occasionally received guests against whom, if he happened to need assistance (but why?), he found it necessary to have reinforcements to hand; a second was that, drawn by curiosity, they had been listening at the keyhole, not expecting me to come out so quickly; the third, that the whole drama M. de Charlus had performed in front of me had been rehearsed in advance and that he himself had instructed them to listen, out of a love for spectacle combined, perhaps, with a nunc erudimini[100] from which each one of them would learn a lesson.

My anger had done nothing to calm the Baron's own and my departure from the room seemed to be causing him sharp distress; he called me back, had his servants call me back, and finally, forgetting that a moment ago, when he had mentioned his 'august toes', he had imagined he was making me a witness to his own deification, he came running after me at top speed, caught up with me in the hall and stood barring the door. 'Come, now, he said, don't be childish, come back for a minute; he that loveth well chasteneth well, and if I have chastened you well it is because I love you well.' My anger had abated. I chose to ignore the word ‘chasten’ and followed the Baron, who called a footman and, as if nothing had happened, had him remove the remains of the ruined hat, which was replaced by another.

‘If you will be good enough to tell me who it is has treacherously maligned me, I said to M. de Charlus, I will stay here to hear his name and to confute the impostor.

– Who? You mean you don’t know? Do you retain no memory of the things you say? Do you imagine that the people who are good enough to tell me about such things do not swear me to secrecy in the first place? And do you think I am going to break such a promise?

– Monsieur, is it really impossible for you to tell me?’ I asked, unsuccessfully racking my brains in one last effort to discover to whom I could have spoken about M. de Charlus.

‘Have I not made it clear that I have promised my informant to keep his name secret? he said in a categorical tone. I see that your taste for abject remarks is matched only by your taste for futile persistence. You ought at least to have the intelligence to benefit from this last encounter with me, and to use your words to better effect than to talk nonsense.

– Monsieur, I replied, as I made a move to leave, you are insulting me. I am defenceless, because you are far older than me, and we are not equally matched. Moreover, I am unable to convince you. I have already sworn to you that I have said nothing.

– So you’re calling me a liar!’ he shouted in a terrible voice, leaping forward to within a foot or so of me.

‘You have been misinformed.’

At which, in a gentle, affectionate, melancholy tone, as in those symphonies which are performed without any break between the various movements, and in which a graceful scherzo, pleasing and idyllic, follows the thunder-claps of the opening movement, he said, ‘That is very possible. As a rule, a remark repeated at second hand is rarely true. You have only yourself to blame if you have failed to benefit from the opportunities for seeing me I offered you and so not furnished me, through the confidence which frank exchange of daily conversation promotes, with the unique and sovereign antidote against a remark which branded you as a traitor. In any event, true or false, the remark has had its effect. I can never erase the impression it made upon me. I cannot even say that he who loveth well chasteneth well, for I have certainly chastened you but I no longer love you.’ In the course of these remarks he had forced me to sit down once more and had rung the bell. A different footman came into the room. ‘Bring something to drink and order the brougham.’ I said I was not thirsty and that I had my own carriage. ‘They have probably paid the driver and sent him away, he said, you needn’t worry about that. I’m ordering a carriage to take you home… If you’re anxious about the lateness of the hour… I could have given you a room here…’ I told him that my mother would be worried. ‘Ah! of course. Well, true or false, the remark has had its effect. My liking for you was rather premature, and it had flowered too soon. Like those apple trees of which you spoke so poetically in Balbec, it has been unable to resist the first frost’ If M. de Charlus’s liking for me had been destroyed, his behaviour could not have been more at variance with the fact, since, while assuring me that we had fallen out, he was making me stay and drink, offering to put me up for the night, and now arranging for me to be sent home. He looked as if he were dreading the moment he must leave me and find himself on his own again, the same sort of slightly anxious fear his sister-in-law and cousin Guermantes had seemed to me to be feeling an hour ago when she had tried to force me to stay a little longer, with something of the same momentary fondness for me, of the same effort to prolong the minute.

‘Unfortunately, he continued, the gift of making something which has been destroyed re-blossom is not one I have. My affection for you is quite dead. Nothing can revive it. I don’t think it would be unworthy of me to confess that I regret it. I always feel myself to be rather like Victor Hugo’s Boaz: Je suis veuf je suis seul, et sur moi le soir tombe.’[101]

I walked back through the big greenish drawing-room with him. I let drop a chance remark about how beautiful I thought it was. ‘Isn’t it?’ he replied. ‘One needs to have something to love. The panelling is by Bagard.[102] The rather charming thing about it, you know, is that it was made to go with the Beauvais chairs and the consoles. Notice that it takes up the same decorative design. There used to be only two places where you could see this, the Louvre and M. d’Hinnisdal’s house. But naturally, as soon as I decided to come and live in this street, an old family house of the Chimays came on the market which no one had ever seen before because it was destined just for me. On the whole, it’s really rather good. It might be better, but really it’s not bad. Some pretty things, are there not? Mignard’s portrait of my uncles, the King of Poland and the King of England, for example. But why am I telling you all this? You know it as well as I do, since you were waiting in this room. No? Ah, then they must have shown you into the blue drawing-room,’ he said with what could have been taken for rudeness directed at my lack of curiosity, or personal superiority and lack of interest in where I had been kept waiting. ‘Have you seen what’s in this cabinet? These are all the hats worn by Madame Elisabeth, the Princess de Lamballe and Marie-Antoinette. You’re not interested, are you? You appear not to see them. Perhaps there’s something wrong with your optic nerve. If this sort of beauty appeals to you more, here is a rainbow by Turner beginning to shine out between these two Rembrandts, as a sign of our reconciliation. Can you hear? Beethoven has come to join him.’ And indeed the first chords of the third movement of the Pastoral Symphony, ‘Joy after the Storm’, could be heard, performed somewhere close by, on the first floor perhaps, by a group of musicians. ‘There you are, one never knows. One really never knows. Invisible music. It’s pretty, is it not?’ he said to me in a slightly impudent tone, somehow reminiscent of Swann’s influence and accent. ‘But you don’t care two hoots about it. You want to go home, even if it means showing disrespect for Beethoven and for me. You’re carrying out your own sentence,’ he added with affectionate regret when the moment had come for me to leave. ‘You’ll forgive me for forgetting my good manners and not accompanying you home, he said. Since I have no desire to see you again, there would be very little point in spending five more minutes in your company. But I’m tired, and I have a great deal to do.’ Then, noticing it was a fine night, he changed tack: ‘Ah, well, perhaps I will come in the carriage after all. There’s a superb moon, which I’ll go and inspect in the Bois after I’ve taken you back. I say, you don’t know how to shave! Even on a night you’ve been out to dinner, there are still a few hairs left on your face,’ he said, taking my chin between two fingers, drawn there, it seemed, as if by a magnet, and after a moment’s resistance, running up to my ears like the fingers of a barber. ‘Ah! how pleasant it would be to look at “the blue moonlight” in the Bois with someone like yourself,’ he said with sudden and almost involuntary gentleness, then added sadly: ‘For you’re nice, really. You could be nicer than anyone, he added, laying his hand paternally on my shoulder. I have to say that at first I hardly thought you were worth noticing.’ I ought to have reflected that this was still the case. I had only to remind myself of the rage with which he had spoken to me barely half an hour previously. In spite of this, I had the impression that he was, for the moment, sincere, that his kindness of heart was getting the better of what I regarded as an almost delirious condition of touchiness and pride. The carriage was there waiting for us, and still he prolonged the conversation. ‘Come, he said abruptly, get in. You’ll be home in five minutes, and I shall then bid you a good night that will sever our relations for all time. It is better, since we must part for ever, that we should do so, as in music, on a tonic chord.’ Despite these solemn affirmations that we should never meet again, I could have sworn that M. de Charlus, irked at his loss of temper earlier and afraid that he had hurt my feelings, would not have been averse to seeing me once more. Nor was I mistaken, for a moment later he said: ‘There, now, I’ve actually forgotten the most important thing. In memory of your grandmother, I have had a rare edition of Mme de Sévigné bound for you. Which means that this will not be our last meeting. One must console oneself with the thought that complicated affairs are rarely settled in a day. Just look how long it took to negotiate the Congress of Vienna.

– But I could send someone round for it without disturbing you, I said to oblige him.

– Will you learn to hold your tongue, you little fool, he replied angrily, and not push your grotesque behaviour to the point of assuming that the likelihood of being received by me (I don’t say the certainty, for perhaps one of my servants will hand you the volumes) is some trifling honour.’ He regained control of himself: ‘I do not wish to part from you on these words. No dissonance; before the eternal silence, a chord on the dominant!’ It was for his own nerves that he seemed to dread a return home immediately after harsh words of discord. 'You would not like to come to the Bois,' he said in a tone that was not interrogative but affirmative, not, it seemed to me, that he did not want to make the offer, but because he was afraid that his pride would be injured by a refusal. 'Well, there we are,' he continued, still marking time, 'it is the hour, as Whistler says, when the bourgeois go to bed (perhaps he wished now to exploit my own sense of pride), the moment to start taking a look at the world. But you don't even know who Whistler is.'[103] I changed the subject and asked him whether the Princess d'Iéna was an intelligent woman. M. de Charlus stopped me and replied, in the most contemptuous tone I had yet heard him adopt:

'Ah! there, Monsieur, you are alluding to an order of nomenclature which means nothing to me. There is perhaps an aristocracy among the Tahitians, but I have to confess I know nothing about it. But strangely enough, the name you have just pronounced did ring in my ears a few days ago. I was asked if I'd be willing for the young Duc de Guastalla to be presented to me. The request astonished me, for the Duc de Guastalla has no need of an introduction to me, for the simple reason that he is my cousin and has known me all his life; he's the son of the Princess of Parma, and, like a dutiful young relative, he never fails to come and pay his respects to me on New Year's Day. But, after informing myself, I discovered that the person in question was not a relative of mine but the son of the person you are interested in. Since there is no princess with that name, I imagined that the person concerned must be some poor creature sleeping under the Pont d'Iéna, who had assumed the picturesque title of Princesse d'Iéna, in the same way that people talk of the Panther of the Batignolles[104] or the Steel King.[105] But no, it was the name of a rich person whose handsome furniture I had admired at an exhibition, and, unlike the owner's title, the furniture had the merit of being genuine. As for this alleged Duc de Guastalla, I thought he must be my secretary's stockbroker, given that you can buy almost anything with money. But no. It was the Emperor, it appears, who amused himself by conferring on these people a title which was simply not his to confer. I don't know whether he did it as a sign of power, out of ignorance or malice, but to me it was a very nasty trick to play on these unwitting usurpers. But I can't really enlighten you much on the matter, I'm competent only to discuss the Faubourg Saint-Germain, and there, if you can manage to secure an introduction, you'll find plenty of old harpies to amuse you, straight out of Balzac. All that is of course a far cry from the prestige of the Princesse de Guermantes, but without me and my "open Sesame" access to her is impossible.

– The Princesse de Guermantes has a very fine house, Monsieur.

– Oh, it's not just very fine. It's the finest thing in the world. After the Princesse herself, that is.

– Is the Princesse de Guermantes superior to the Duchesse de Guermantes?

– Oh, there's no comparison. (It should be observed that, whenever people in society have the least spark of imagination, they will crown or dethrone, as their likings and quarrels dictate, the people whose position seemed most solid and entrenched.) The Duchesse de Guermantes' (by not referring to her as 'Oriane' he was perhaps emphasizing the distance between her and myself) is delightful, far superior to anything you can have imagined. But there is really no comparison between her and her cousin. The Princesse is exactly what people in the market-place might imagine Princess Metternich to have been. But La Metternich was a woman who thought she had launched Wagner because she knew Victor Maurel.[106] The Princesse de Guermantes, or rather her mother, actually knew Wagner. That is something prestigious in itself, not to mention the woman's extraordinary beauty. And those Esther gardens!

– Is it possible to visit them?

– No, not unless you are invited, but they never invite anyone unless I ask them to.' But having enticed me with the bait of this offer, he immediately withdrew it and held out his hand, for we had arrived at my door. 'My role is over, Monsieur. I will simply add these few words. Another will perhaps offer you his affection one day as I have done. May you learn something from this present instance. Remember it well. Affection is always precious. What we cannot do alone in life, because there are things which we cannot ask, or do, or wish, or learn by ourselves, we can do together, without there needing to be thirteen of us as in the Balzac novel,[107] or four, as in The Three Musketeers. I bid you farewell.'

He must have been feeling tired and have abandoned the idea of going to look at the moonlight, for he asked me to tell the coachman to drive home. But then he made a brusque movement as if he was about to change his mind. But I had already given the instruction, and, so as not to lose any more time, I went and rang at my door-bell, oblivious now of the fact that I had been dying to tell M. de Charlus the stories about the Kaiser and General Botha, which had obsessed me a while earlier but which his unexpectedly thunderous reception had chased far from my mind.

When I got in, I saw on my desk a letter which Françoise's young footman had written to one of his friends and had left lying there. Ever since my mother had been away, there was no liberty he shrank from taking; I was even more at fault for taking the liberty of reading the letter lying there without an envelope for all to see and – this was my sole excuse – almost asking to be read.

Dear Friend and Cousin,

I hope this finds you in good health and the same with all the young family particularly my young godson Joseph what I have not yet had the pleasure of meeting but prefer to you all as being my godson, these relics of the heart has also their dust, upon their blest remains let us not lay our hands. Besides dear friend and cousin who is to say that tomorrow you and your dear wife my cousin Marie, will not be both hurled headlong to the bottom of the sea like the sailor clinging to the mast on high, for this life is but a dark valley. Dear friend I must tell you that my principal occupation to your astonishment I feel sure, is now poetry which enraptures me, for we must do something. And so dear friend do not be too surprised that your last letter is unresponded, for lack of pardon let oblivion come. As you know, Madame's mother has passed away amid unspeakable sufferings which fairly exhausted her for she saw as many as three doctors. The day of her funeral was a big day for all Monsieur's relations came in crowds as well as several Ministers. It took them more than two hours to get to the cemetery which will make you all open your eyes wide in your village for they certainly wont do as much for Mère Michu. So all my life will be but one long sob. I am greatly enjoying the motorcycle what I recently learned. What would you say my dear friends if I arrived suddenly like that at full speed at Les Ecorres. But on that score I shall no longer keep silence for I feel that the frenzy of grief sweeps its reason away. I am associating with the Duchesse de Guermantes, people as what you have never even heard in our ignorant part of the world. So it is with pleasure that Im going to send the works of Racine, Victor Hugo, the Selected works of Chenedollé, of Alfred de Musset, for I want to cure the land which give me birth of ignorance which leads inevitably to crime. I cant think of anything more to say to you and send you like the pelican wearied by a long flight my best regards as well as to your wife my godson and your sister Rose. May it not be said of her: And rose she has lived only as roses live, as has been said by Victor Hugo, the sonnet of Arvers, Alfred de Musset all those great geniuses who because of that were sent to die at the stake like Joan of Arc. Am looking forward to your next missive, yours with a brother's love Périgot Joseph.

Any life which represents something mysterious, like some last illusion to be shattered, exerts a pull on us. This said, the mysterious description of the Princesse de Guermantes provided by M. de Charlus, which had led me to conceive of her as an extraordinary being quite different from anyone I knew, was not enough to explain my amazement, shortly followed by my fear of being the target of a bad joke engineered by someone who wanted to see me expelled from a house to which I had not been invited, when, about two months after my dinner with the Duchesse and after her departure to Cannes, I opened an envelope which suggested nothing out of the ordinary to me, and read the following words on a printed card: 'The Princesse de Guermantes, née Duchesse en Bavière, At Home, the – th'. No doubt an invitation from the Princesse de Guermantes was really no more difficult to obtain, from a society point of view, than a dinner invitation from the Duchesse, and my smattering of heraldic knowledge told me that the title of Prince is not superior to that of Duc. I also told myself that the intelligence of a society woman could not be so radically dissimilar from that of the rest of her kind as M. de Charlus claimed, nor so radically dissimilar from that of any other woman. But my imagination, like Elstir in the process of creating some effect of perspective independently of the notions of physics he might use in other circumstances, depicted for me not what I knew but what it saw; what it saw, that is to say what the name showed it. Now, even before I knew the Duchesse, the name Guermantes preceded by the title Princesse, like a note or a colour or a quantity sharply modified by the values surrounding it, by the mathematical or aesthetic 'sign' governing it, had always called up something quite different to my mind. With the title Princesse, it is to be found mainly in the memoirs from the periods of Louis XIII and Louis XIV, and in those of the English court, the Queen of Scotland and the Duchesse d'Aumale; and I pictured the house of the Princesse de Guermantes as a place quite regularly frequented by the Duchesse de Logueville and the great Condé, whose presence there made it unlikely that I should ever enter it.

Much of what M. de Charlus had told me had whipped my imagination into vigorous activity and, by causing it to forget how much it had been disappointed by reality at Mme de Guermantes's (people's names and place names are similar in this respect), had steered it towards Oriane's cousin. It was also the case that I was misled by M. de Charlus about the imaginary value and variety of society people only because he was himself misled. Perhaps this was because he did nothing, did not write, did not paint, did not even read anything in a serious and thorough manner. But, superior as he was by several degrees to society people, when it came to drawing his conversational matter from them and the spectacle they represented, this did not mean that he was understood by them. Speaking as an artist, he could at the most bring out the deceptive charm of society people. But he could do this for artists only, and in relation to them he might be said to have been playing the part of the reindeer among the Eskimos: this prized creature plucks for them from barren rocks lichens and mosses they themselves could neither discover nor put to use, but which, once they have been digested by the reindeer, become a form of food the inhabitants of the far north can assimilate.

To which I may add that M. de Charlus's depiction of society was animated in the most lively way by the blend of his ferocious hatreds and his devoted affections, the hatreds directed mainly towards young men, the adoration aroused principally by various women.

If among these the Princesse de Guermantes had been enthroned in pride of place by M. de Charlus, his mysterious remarks about the 'inaccessible Aladdin's palace' in which his cousin lived did not sufficiently account for my feeling of stupefaction.

Despite the contribution from various subjective points of view in these artificial magnifications – and this is something I shall discuss at a later stage – the fact remains that there is a degree of objective reality in all these people and consequently a difference between them.

And how could it be otherwise? The world of people we associate with, bearing so little resemblance to the way we imagine it, is still the same world we have seen described in the memoirs and letters of eminent people and have felt a desire to know. The completely nondescript old man we meet at a dinner-party is the same man who wrote the proud letter to Prince Friedrich-Karl, which we read with such enthusiasm in a book about the 1870 war. Dinner-parties bore us because our imagination is absent, and reading interests us because it is keeping us company. But the people in question are the same. We should have liked to know Mme de Pompadour, who was so stalwart a patron of the arts, and we should have been as bored in her company as we are among all the modern Egerias [108] at whose houses we cannot bring ourselves to pay a second call, so mediocre is their company. The fact remains that these discrepancies do exist. People are never completely alike, their way of behaving towards us, even, one might say, at the same level of friendship, reveals differences which offset one another in the end. When I knew Mme de Montmorency, she took pleasure in saying disagreeable things to me, but if I asked her a favour, she would oblige me in the most generous way by effectively using all the influence she had to obtain it. Whereas another woman, Mme de Guermantes for instance, would never have wished to hurt my feelings, never said anything about me except what might give me pleasure, lavished upon me all those gestures of friendliness which for the Guermantes constituted the richness of moral life, but, had I asked her for the least thing beyond that, would not have budged an inch to procure it for me, as in those country houses where the guest is provided with a chauffeur and a valet but where it is impossible to obtain a glass of cider for which no provision has been made in the entertainment arrangements. Which was for me the true friend, Mme de Montmorency, so happy to ruffle my feelings and always so willing to oblige, or Mme de Guermantes, distressed at the least offence towards me and incapable of the least effort to be helpful? Again, it was said the Duchesse de Guermantes spoke only about frivolous matters, and her cousin, who was intellectually very drab, invariably about interesting things. Types of mind are so various, so conflicting, not only in literature but in society, that Baudelaire and Mérimée are not the only people with the right to mutual scorn. These distinctive characteristics produce in every person a system of looks, words and actions so coherent, so despotic, that it seems superior to any other when we are in the presence of any given individual. In the presence of Mme de Guermantes, her words, deduced like a theorem from her cast of mind, seemed to me to be both inevitable and appropriate. And at heart I agreed with the Duchesse when she told me that Mme de Montmorency was stupid and kept an open mind towards anything she did not understand, or when she said, after hearing about some malicious remark made by the latter: 'So that's what you call a kind woman. I call her a monster.' But this tyranny of immediate presence, this self-evident lamp-light which makes the already distant dawn pale to the faintness of something barely remembered, disappeared once I was out of Mme de Guermantes's presence and some other lady said to me, putting herself on my level and placing the Duchesse far below either of us: 'Oriane is not really interested in anything or anybody,' or even (something that it would have seemed impossible to believe in Mme de Guermantes's presence, so loudly did she deny it): 'Oriane is a snob.' Since there is no mathematical formula which would enable us to convert Mme d'Arpajon and Mme de Montpensier into uniform quantities, it would have been impossible for me to answer had anyone asked me which of the two seemed superior to the other.

Now, among the characteristics peculiar to the Princesse de Guermantes's salon, the one most usually mentioned was an exclusiveness due in part to the Princesse's royal birth, but more particularly to the almost fossilized rigidity of the Prince's aristocratic prejudices, prejudices which, incidentally, the Duc and Duchesse had not blushed to deride in my presence, and of course such exclusiveness inevitably made me feel it even more unlikely that I should have been invited by this man, who dealt only in royal personages and dukes and who was given to making a scene at every dinner-party because he had not been placed at table as he would have been by right under Louis XIV, an entitlement which, thanks to his immense erudition in matters of history and genealogy, he was the only person to recognize. On this account, in the matter of the differences that distinguished them from their cousins, many people settled in favour of the Duc and the Duchesse. 'The Duc and the Duchesse are far more up-to-date, far more intelligent, they've better things to interest them than the number of quarterings a person has, their salon is three hundred years in advance of their cousins',' were the customary remarks, and with these in mind I trembled as I looked at the invitation card, since they made it all the more likely that it had been sent to me as a hoax.

If the Duc and the Duchesse had not still been in Cannes, I could have tried to find out from them whether the invitation I had received was genuine. My state of uncertainty is in fact by no means something that would be unknown to a man of the world, as I flattered myself into believing for a moment, and consequently a writer, even if he belonged to the world of society, ought to reproduce it in order to be thoroughly 'objective' in his portrayal of class distinctions. In fact only a few days ago, in a charming volume of memoirs, I came across an account of uncertainties analogous to those induced in me by the Princesse de Guermantes's invitation. 'Georges and I (or Hély and I – I don't have the book at hand to check) were so itching to be invited to Mme Delessert's salon that when we actually received an invitation from her, we thought it prudent, quite independently, to make sure that we were not the victims of some April fool joke.' Now, the writer is none other than the Comte d'Haussonville (the man who married the Duc de Broglie's daughter), while the other young man who will ascertain 'independently' whether he is being hoaxed or not, is, according to whether he is called Georges or Hély, one or other of the two inseparable friends of M. d'Haussonville, either M.d'Harcourt or the Prince de Chalais.

On the day of the Princesse de Guermantes's reception, I learned that the Duc and Duchesse had returned to Paris the previous day. They would not have come back specially for the Princesse's ball, but one of their cousins was seriously ill, and there was also the fact that the Duc was very anxious to attend a fancy dress event that evening where he was to go as Louis XI and his wife as Isabeau de Bavière. I made up my mind to call on her that morning. But they had gone out early and not yet returned; I kept watch for their carriage at first from a little room which seemed to me to be a good look-out post. As it turned out, I had chosen my observation point very badly, for I could scarcely see into our courtyard, though I caught a glimpse of several others, and this, while of no practical use, diverted me for a time. It is not only in Venice that there are these views on to several houses at once which have drawn painters. The same is true of Paris. The reference to Venice is not random. The poor quarters of that city are what spring to mind when you see the poor quarters of Paris in the morning, with their tall, widening chimneys turned to the most vivid pinks, the brightest reds by the sunlight, a whole garden flowering above the houses, and flowering in such a variety of shades of colour as to suggest the garden of a tulip-fancier in Delft or Haarlem planted above the city. And then the close proximity of the houses, with their windows facing each other across a common courtyard, makes each window into a frame in which a cook stares dreamily down outside, or, further off, a girl is having her hair combed by an old woman whose witchlike face is barely distinguishable in the shadow; and so for the neighbours in the adjoining houses each courtyard, suppressing sound through distance and revealing silent gestures in a rectangle placed under the glass of closed windows, contributes to an exhibition of a hundred Dutch paintings placed side by side. It is true that from the Hôtel de Guermantes there was not the same sort of view, but there were interesting ones all the same, particularly from the odd trigonometric point where I had taken up position and from which there was an uninterrupted view, across the relatively featureless and steeply sloping area in between, as far as the distant heights formed by the mansion of the Princesse de Silistrie and the Marquise de Plassac, extremely noble cousins of M. de Guermantes whom I did not know. Between me and this mansion (the home of their father, M. de Bréquigny) nothing but blocks of fairly low buildings, facing in every possible direction, which, without obstructing the view, emphasized the distance with their oblique planes. The red-tiled turret of the outhouse in which the Marquis de Frécourt kept his carriages was in fact topped by a pointed roof which rose higher, but it was so narrow that it did not hide the view, and reminded me of those charming old buildings in Switzerland which rear up in isolation at the foot of a mountain. All these vague and divergent points of focus on which my eyes came to rest made Mme de Plassac's mansion, which was in fact quite near but looked deceptively distant as in an Alpine landscape, seem as though it were separated from us by several streets or by numerous foothills. When its wide square windows, dazzling in the sunlight like flakes of rock crystal, were thrown open while the housework was being done, as the eye followed from one floor to the next the various footmen whom it was impossible to see clearly but who were obviously beating carpets or wielding feather dusters, there was the same sense of pleasure as seeing a landscape by Turner or Elstir with a traveller in a stage-coach, or a guide, at different heights on the Saint-Gothard. But from the vantage-point where I had taken up position I should have run the risk of missing M. or Mme de Guermantes, so that when in the afternoon I found time to resume my watch I simply went and waited on the staircase, from which the opening of the carriage gate could not pass unnoticed, and it was on this staircase that I posted myself, even though the Alpine delights of the Hôtel de Bréquigny and Tresmes, so dazzling to the eye with their footmen made minute by distance as they did the housework, were not on view from where I was. Now this wait on the staircase was to entail such considerable discoveries and to reveal to me so important a landscape, no longer Turneresque but moral, that it is preferable to delay my account of it for a moment and turn first to my visit to the Guermantes once I knew they had returned home. I was received by the Duc alone, in his library. As I was walking towards the door out came a little man with the whitest hair and of shabby appearance, wearing a little black tie like the one worn by the Combray lawyer and by several of my grandfather's friends, but more diffident-looking than they were, and, bowing to me effusively, he utterly refused to pass downstairs until I had walked on in. The Duc shouted after him from the library something I did not catch, while he responded with a further series of bows, addressed this time to the wall, for the Duc could not see him, though the bows were repeated endlessly, like the redundant smiles of people talking to each other on the telephone; he had a falsetto voice, and he bowed to me once more with the humility of a tradesman. And he might indeed have been a tradesman from Combray, so provincial was his manner, the old-fashioned, mild manner of the ordinary people and the modest old folk of that part of the world.

'Oriane will be with us in a while, the Duc said to me when I had joined him in the library. Since Swann is coming round a bit later with the proofs of his study of the coinage of the Order of Malta and, worse still, some huge photograph he has had taken showing both sides of the coins, Oriane thought it better to get dressed first so that she can keep him company until it's time to go out to dinner. We've already got so much clutter around the place we don't know what to do with, and I'm wondering quite where we're going to stick this photograph. But my wife is too good-natured, incapable of saying no to people. She thought it would be nice to ask Swann to provide some means of seeing all those Grand Masters of the Order whose medals he found in Rhodes all together, side by side with each other. I said Malta, but I meant Rhodes, in any case it's the same Order of St John of Jerusalem. In fact she's interested in all that only because Swann is. Our family is very much mixed up in the whole thing; even today, my brother, whom you've met, is one of the highest dignitaries in the Order of Malta. But if I'd mentioned it all to Oriane she wouldn't have listened to me for a moment. Yet it only took the fact that Swann's researches into the Templars (amazing the passion people of one religion have for studying others) led him on to the history of the Knights of Rhodes, who succeeded the Templars, for Oriane to insist on seeing the heads of these knights. They were very small fry compared to the Lusignans, Kings of Cyprus, from whom we descend in a direct line. But so far Swann hasn't shown any interest in them, so Oriane couldn't care less about the Lusignans.' I had no immediate chance to explain to the Duc why I had come. As it happened, several relatives or friends, including Mme de Silistrie and the Duchesse de Montrose, came to call on the Duchesse, who often received people before dinner, and not finding her there, stayed for a time with the Duc. The first of these ladies (the Princesse de Silistrie), unostentatiously dressed, curt but friendly in manner, was holding a walking-stick. I was concerned at first that she had injured herself or was disabled in some way. On the contrary, she was very sprightly. She spoke sadly to the Duc about a first cousin of his – not on the Guermantes side, but more distinguished still, were such a thing possible – whose health, which had been in a very serious condition for some time, had suddenly deteriorated. But it was obvious that the Duc, while he was sympathetic to the state of his cousin's health and kept on repeating 'Poor Mama! He's such a fine chap,' was being optimistic about his case. The truth of the matter was that he was looking forward to the dinner-party he was to attend, was not at all bored by the thought of the big reception at the Princesse de Guermantes's, but above all, he was to go on at one o'clock in the morning with his wife to a grand supper-party and fancy dress ball, he as Louis XI and the Duchesse as Isabeau de Bavière, and the costumes were ready and waiting. So the Duc had a mind not to be disturbed amid all these revelries by the sufferings of his good cousin, Amanien d'Osmond. Then two other ladies carrying walking-sticks, Mme de Plassac and Mme de Tresmes, both daughters of the Comte de Bréquigny, came in to pay Basin a visit, and declared that cousin Mama's state was now beyond hope. The Duc shrugged his shoulders and changed the subject by asking them whether they were going to Marie-Gilbert's that evening. They replied that they were not, in view of the extreme nature of Amanien's condition, and in fact they had excused themselves from the dinner to which the Duc was going, and then proceeded to spell out the guest-list to him: the brother of King Theodosius, the Infanta Maria-Concepción, and so on. Since the Marquis d'Osmond was less closely related to them than he was to Basin, their 'defection' struck the Duc as some kind of indirect reproach for his conduct, and he was barely civil to them. And so, although they had come down from the heights of the Hôtel de Bréquigny to visit the Duchesse (or rather to announce to her the alarming character, incompatible for his relatives with their attendance at society events, of their cousin's illness), they did not stay long, but, armed with their alpenstocks, Walpurge and Dorothée (such were the names of the two sisters) retraced the craggy path to their mountain home. I never thought to ask the Guermantes what was the meaning of these sticks, such a common sight in a certain quarter of the Faubourg Saint-Germain. It is possible that, regarding the whole parish as their domain and averse to taking cabs, these ladies were in the habit of walking about a great deal, and that, owing to some old fracture caused by immoderate devotion to hunting and to the falls from the saddle often attendant upon it, or simply rheumatism caused by the dampness of the Left Bank and of old country houses, a stick was necessary. Perhaps they had not set out on any long expedition in the area and had merely come down to their garden (very close to the Duchesse's own) to pick fruit for their compotes, and stopped by on their way home to say good evening to Mme de Guermantes, though without going so far as to bring secateurs or watering-cans into the house. The Duc seemed touched that I should have come to see them the very day of their return home. But his expression darkened when I told him that I had come to ask his wife to find out whether her cousin had really invited me. I had touched upon one of those forms of help which neither M. nor Mme de Guermantes were keen to give. The Duc explained to me that it was too late, that if the Princesse had not sent me an invitation it would make him appear to be asking for one, that his cousins had refused him one on a previous occasion, and that he did not wish now to create the remotest impression that he was interfering with their guest-lists, 'meddling' with their arrangements, finally that he could not be sure that he and his wife, who were dining out that evening, would not come home straight afterwards, in which case their best excuse for not having gone to the Princesse's reception would be to conceal the fact that they were back in Paris, instead of rushing to inform her of the fact, which would be inevitable if they sent her a message or telephoned her about me, and certainly too late to be of any use, since it was more than likely that the Princesse's guest-list would be finally drawn up by now. 'You're not in her bad books, are you?' he asked suspiciously, with that constant anxiety the Guermantes had of not being abreast of the latest society quarrels and of people's possible attempts to patch them up by using them as intermediaries. Then finally, since the Duc was in the habit of assuming responsibility for any decision that might seem unwelcome, he said to me suddenly, as though the idea had just occurred to him: 'Look here, my boy, I'd really prefer to say nothing to Oriane about what you've said. You know how kind-hearted she is, and besides, she's enormously fond of you; she'd want to send word to her cousin, whatever I said to dissuade her, and if she's tired after dinner, there won't be any option, she will be forced to go to the reception. I've made up my mind; I shall say nothing to her about it. Anyhow, you'll be seeing her in a while. Not a word about all this, I beg you. If you decide to accept our cousins' invitation, I've no need to tell you what pleasure it will give us to spend the evening with you.' Humane motives are too sacred for the person they are used to appeal to not to bow before them, whether he believes them to be sincere or not; I did not wish for a moment to appear to be weighing up the relative importance of my invitation and the possible tiredness of Mme de Guermantes, and I promised to say nothing to her about the object of my visit, acting as though I had been completely taken in by this rigmarole M. de Guermantes had staged for my benefit. I asked him if there was any chance of my meeting Mme de Stermaria at the Princesse's.

'Indeed not, he replied with an air of expert assurance. The name you mention is known to me from club directories – it's not at all the type of person who goes to Gilbert's. You'll meet no one there who is not excessively genteel and extremely boring, duchesses with titles one thought were extinct and have been trotted out for the occasion, all the ambassadors, large numbers of Coburgs and foreign royalties, but don't expect the least hint of a Stermaria. Gilbert would have a fit at the mere thought. Oh, by the way, you like painting, don't you? I must show you a superb picture I bought from my cousin, partly in exchange for the Elstirs, which we didn't really care for in the end. It was sold to me as a Philippe de Champagne, but personally I think it's by someone even more famous. Do you want to know what I think? I think it's a Velázquez, and of his finest period,' said the Duc, looking me straight in the eye, either to gauge my reaction or to accentuate it. A footman came in.

'Madame la Duchesse wishes to know if M. le Duc will be good enough to see M. Swann, since Madame is not quite ready.

– Show M. Swann in,' said the Duc after consulting his watch and seeing that he himself still had a little time left before he need go and dress. 'As ever, my wife, who told him to come, isn't ready. No point in saying anything in front of Swann about Marie-Gilberte's reception, said the Duc. I don't know whether he's been invited. Gilbert is very fond of him, because he thinks that he's the natural grandson of the Duc de Berri, there's a whole story involved there. (Otherwise, you can imagine! – my cousin, who nearly has a stroke if he sees a Jew a mile off.) But now of course the Dreyfus case has made matters worse. Swann of all people ought to have realized that he must drop all connection with those people, instead of which he comes out with the most unfortunate views.'

The Duc called the footman back in to find out whether the man he had sent to cousin d'Osmond's for news had returned. His plan was as follows: since he rightly believed his cousin to be dying, he was anxious to obtain news of him before his actual death, that is before he was obliged to go into mourning. Once he was covered by the official certainty that Amanien was still alive, he would push off to his dinner, to the Prince's reception, to the fancy dress party he was to attend as Louis XI and where he had a most titillating assignation with a new mistress, and put off any further enquiries until the next day, when his pleasure was over. Then he would put on mourning if his cousin had passed away in the course of the evening. 'No, M. le Duc, he is not back yet. – Damn and blast it! nothing is ever done in this house until the last minute,' shouted the Duc, thinking that Amanien might have 'snuffed it' in time to be in the evening paper and to make him miss his party. He sent for Le Temps, in which there was nothing.

I had not seen Swann for a very long time, and I wondered for a moment whether he used formerly to clip his moustache or not to wear his hair en brosse, for there was something different about him. It was simply that he was very 'different' because he was very ill, and illness alters the face as much as growing a beard or changing one's parting. (Swann's illness was the same one that carried off his mother, who had been struck down by it at exactly the age he now was. In fact heredity makes our lives as full of cabalistic ciphers and horoscopic forecasts as if sorcerers really existed. And just as there is a given life expectancy for humanity in general, so there is one for families in particular, that is, in any one family, for those members of it who resemble each other.) Swann was dressed with an elegance which, like his wife's, connected what he now was with what he had once been. In a very fitted pearl-grey frock-coat which did justice to his tall, slim figure and white gloves with black stitching, he was wearing a grey topper of a flared shape which Delion now made only for him, for the Prince de Sagan, M. de Charlus, the Marquis de Modène, M. Charles Haas and Comte Louis de Turenne. I was surprised at the charming smile and affectionate hand-clasp with which he returned my greeting, for I thought that after so long he would not recognize me so quickly; I gave voice to my astonishment; he responded to this with peals of laughter, a hint of indignation, and a further squeeze of my hand, as if it were to cast doubt on his soundness of mind or the sincerity of his affection to imagine that he did not recognize me. And yet this was in fact the case; as I learned long afterwards, he did not realize who I was until several minutes later when he heard my name mentioned. But no change in expression, in his words, in his conversation with me, betrayed the realization which something M. de Guermantes let drop enabled him to make, so confident a master was he of the social game. In fact he brought to it the same spontaneity of behaviour and the same individual initiative, even in matters of dress, that typified the Guermantes style. And so the greeting the old clubman had given me without recognizing me was not the cold, stiff greeting of a man of the world merely going through the motions, but a greeting full of real friendliness, of genuine charm, similar to those, say, of the Duchesse de Guermantes (who, if she ran into you, even made a point of smiling at you first before you had greeted her), in contrast to the more automatic greetings practised by the ladies of the Faubourg Saint-Germain. Similarly the hat he placed on the floor beside him, in conformity with a custom that was beginning to disappear, was lined, unconventionally, in green leather because (as he would have us believe) it showed the dirt far less, but in fact because it was extremely chic.

'I say, Charles, you're a great expert, I've got something to show you. And then, my boys, I'm going to ask your permission to leave you together for a moment while I go and dress for dinner. I don't imagine Oriane will be very long now, in any case.' He then showed Swann his 'Velázquez'. 'But this seems familiar,' said Swann with the pained expression of a sick man for whom even speaking is an effort.

'Yes,' said the Duc, in a tone rather flattened by the time the expert was taking to express his admiration. 'You've probably seen it at Gilbert's.

– Yes, of course, I remember.

– What do you think it is?

– Well, if it was at Gilbert's, it's probably one of your ancestors,' said Swann with a mixture of irony and deference towards a grandeur he would have felt it impolite and absurd to ignore, but which, for reasons of good taste, he chose to refer to only in a playful manner.

'Of course it is, said the Duc bluffly. It's Boson, the umpteenth member of the Guermantes family. But I don't give a damn about all that. You know I'm not as feudal as my cousin. Rigaud, Mignard, even Velázquez are some of the names I've heard mentioned,' he went on, scrutinizing Swann like an inquisitor or a torturer in a dual attempt to read his thoughts and to influence his response. 'Well now, he concluded (for when he was led to bludgeon someone into delivering the opinion he wanted to hear, it took only a few seconds for him to start believing that it had been spontaneously uttered), come on, none of your flattery. Do you think it's by one of the big names I've just mentioned?

– N… no, Swann replied.

– So what then? I know nothing about these things, it's not for me to judge who painted this old fossil. But you're a lover of these things, a master of the subject, who do you think did it?'

Swann hesitated for a moment in front of this canvas; it was quite clear he thought it dreadful. 'It was done by malicious intent, I should say,' came his amused reply to the Duc, who could not repress a start of rage. This subsided, and he said: 'Be good chaps, both of you, and wait a minute for Oriane. I'll be back as soon as I've put on my tails. I'll send word to my good lady that you're both waiting for her.'

I chatted to Swann briefly about the Dreyfus case and asked him how it was that all the Guermantes were anti-Dreyfusards. 'In the first place because all these people are anti-Semitic at heart,' replied Swann, although his experience made him perfectly well aware that some of them were not, but, like everyone who holds deep convictions, he preferred to explain the fact that other people did not share them by assuming that they had incurable preconceptions and prejudices rather than reasons that were more open to discussion. Also, as a man who had reached the premature end of his life, like a weary animal that is being tormented, he was loathing these persecutions and turning back to the spiritual fold of his fathers.

'I've certainly been told the Prince de Guermantes is anti-Semitic, I remarked.

– Oh, him! He's unmentionable. Do you know that when he was in the army and had an excruciating toothache, he preferred to sit it out in agony rather than go to the only dentist in the area, who happened to be Jewish, and that later on, when a wing of his country house caught fire, he let it burn to the ground rather than send to the neighbouring property – it belongs to the Rothschilds – for hoses?

– Are you going to the reception at his place this evening, by any chance?

– Yes, he replied, although I really don't feel up to it. But he sent me a wire to tell me he has something to say to me. I can feel that I'm soon unlikely to be well enough to go and see him or to receive him myself – I'd find it too stressful – so I'd rather get it over at once.

– Yet the Duc de Guermantes isn't anti-Semitic, is he?

– But you can see for yourself he is, since he's an anti-Dreyfusard,' replied Swann, not realizing that he was begging the question. 'None the less I'm upset I disappointed the fellow – sorry! the Duc – by not admiring his Mignard or whatever he thinks it is.

– 'But at least, I continued, reverting to the Dreyfus case, the Duchesse is a woman with intelligent views.

– Yes, she is charming. But for me she was even more charming when she was still the Princesse des Laumes. Her mind has become more sharp-edged somehow – it was all much softer in her younger days as a grande dame. But anyway, what do you expect, younger or older, men or women, these people belong to a different race, they can't help it with a thousand years of feudalism in their blood. And of course, they are under the impression that all that has absolutely no bearing on the views they hold.

– All the same, Robert de Saint-Loup is a Dreyfusard.

– Ah! so much the better, given that his mother is so anti. I'd heard he was, but I wasn't certain. That delights me. Nor does it surprise me, he's highly intelligent. That certainly counts for a lot.'

Swann's Dreyfusism had made him extraordinarily naive and shifted his way of looking at the world towards an impulsiveness, an instability of judgment more pronounced even than the similar effects of his marriage to Odette in the past; this recent class demotion was more like a reassessment of class and something entirely to his credit, since it made him return to the paths trodden by his own people from which he had been led astray by the aristocratic company he kept. But precisely at the moment when his clear-sightedness enabled him, thanks to the principles inherited from his ancestors, to perceive a truth that was still hidden from society people, Swann nevertheless showed a comic capacity to hoodwink himself. He put everything he admired or disdained to the test of a new criterion, Dreyfusism. That the anti-Dreyfusism of Mme Bontemps should make him dismiss her as a fool was no more astonishing than that he should have thought her intelligent at the time of his marriage. Nor was it particularly serious that this new tide of opinion should affect his political judgments and make him forget that he had once branded Clemenceau as a man with mercenary motives, a British spy (an absurdity originating from the Guermantes circles), while he now declared that he had always regarded him as a voice of conscience, a man of steel like Cornély.[109] 'No, I've never expressed a different view to you. You're thinking of someone else.' But the tide washed beyond his political judgments and overturned Swann's literary judgments too, even his way of expressing them. Barrès had lost any talent he once had, and even his early works were on the feeble side and scarcely the sort of thing you would want to reread. 'Just try it, you won't be able to get to the end. How different from Clemenceau! Personally I'm not anti-clerical, but put them side by side, and it's pretty clear that Barrès lacks any backbone. He's a very great man is our Clemenceau. He really knows the language!' Yet the anti-Dreyfusards were in no position themselves to criticize such madness. According to them, one was a Dreyfusard only because one was of Jewish origin. If a practising Catholic like Saniette was also in favour of reviewing the case, it was only because he was cornered into it by Mme Verdurin, who conducted herself like a wild radical. Her foremost grudge was against 'the cloth'. Saniette was more foolish than malicious, and had no idea of the harm the Patronne was doing him. And if you pointed out that Brichot was equally a friend of Mme Verdurin but was also a member of the 'Patrie française', that was because he was more intelligent.

'You see him occasionally? I asked Swann, in reference to Saint-Loup.

– No, never. He wrote to me the other day asking me to persuade the Duc de Mouchy and various other members to vote for him at the Jockey, where he was accepted for that matter as smoothly as posting a letter.

– In spite of the Affair!

– The question never came up. And let me tell you that since all this business began I never set foot in the place.'

M. de Guermantes rejoined us and was shortly followed by his wife, now attired for the evening, tall and proud in a red satin gown, the skirt bordered with sequins. She wore in her hair a long ostrich feather dyed bright red, and over her shoulders a tulle wrap of the same colour. 'How smart to have one's hat lined in green, said the Duchesse, who missed nothing. But with you, Charles, everything is so tasteful, what you wear, what you say, what you read, and what you do.' Swann meanwhile, without seeming to have caught these remarks, was contemplating the Duchesse as he might have studied the canvas of a master, and then sought her eyes, pulling his face into an expression which conveyed the word 'Gosh!' Mme de Guermantes burst into laughter. 'So you like the way I'm dressed. I'm delighted. To be honest, I can't say I'm very pleased with it myself, she continued with a sullen look. God, what a bore it is to dress up and go out when it would be so much nicer to spend the evening at home!

– What magnificent rubies!

– Ah! my dear Charles, at least it's clear you know what you're talking about, not like that oaf Monserfeuil, who asked me if they were real. I have to admit I've never seen finer ones myself. They were a present from the Grand Duchess. They're a little on the large side for my liking, rather too like claret glasses filled to the brim, but I'm wearing them because we shall see the Grand Duchess this evening at Marie-Gilbert's,' added Mme de Guermantes, in no way suspecting that her last remark nullified what the Duc had previously told me.

'What's taking place at the Princesse's? Swann asked.

– Oh, almost nothing,' the Duc hastened to reply, thinking that this question meant that Swann had not been invited.

'What are you talking about, Basin? The world and his wife have been invited. We'll be crushed to death by tiresome people. What will be lovely though, she added, looking discriminatingly at Swann, if this storm in the air now doesn't break, will be those marvellous gardens. You know them, of course. I was there a month ago when the lilacs were in flower. You can't imagine how lovely they were. And then the fountain – it's really like having Versailles in Paris.

– What sort of person is the Princesse? I asked.

– Why, you know quite well, since you've seen her here, that she's as beautiful as the daylight, and also a touch stupid, but very nice, for all her Germanic haughtiness, full of kindness and blunders.'

Swann was too shrewd not to realize that the Duchesse was trying to show off the 'Guermantes wit', and in a rather cheap manner, since she was merely serving up a rather debased version of a few of her old quips. Nevertheless, to indicate to the Duchesse that he appreciated her intention to be amusing, and as though she really had been, he gave a rather forced smile, a particular form of insincerity which made me feel the same embarrassment I had experienced in the past when I heard my parents discussing the corruption of certain sections of society with M. Vinteuil (when they knew only too well that far greater corruption reigned at Montjouvain), or Legrandin colouring his speech for the benefit of fools, selecting subtle adjectives when he was perfectly well aware that they would be incomprehensible to his rich or smart yet illiterate audience.

'Come now, Oriane, what are you saying, said M. de Guermantes. Marie stupid? Why, she's read everything, and she's musical to the tips of her fingers.

– But, my poor dear Basin, you're like a babe in arms. As if one couldn't be all that and rather stupid at the same time! Stupid is too strong a word. No, she's fuzzy-minded, she's Hesse-Darmstadt, Holy Roman Empire, wa-wa-wa. Even her pronunciation sets me on edge. But I have to say she has a charming way of being batty. In the first place, the very idea of stepping down from her German throne to go and marry a private individual, as if she were the most middle-class woman alive. It's true that she chose him! Ah, but of course,' she added, turning to me, 'you don't know Gilbert. To give you some idea, he's the man who once took to his bed because I left my calling-card at Mme Carnot's[110]… But, my dear Charles,' said the Duchesse, changing the subject, since she could see that the story of the card and Mme Carnot seemed to anger M. de Guermantes, 'you know, you've not sent me the photograph of those Knights of Rhodes you've taught me to love and with whom I'm so keen to become acquainted.'

During all this, the Duc's eyes had not left his wife's face: 'Oriane, you might at least tell the whole story instead of keeping half of it back. I ought to explain, he said in rectification of her omission and addressing himself to Swann, that the British Ambassadress at the time, a very worthy woman, but one who tended to live on the moon and was apt to mismatch her guests, conceived the rather outlandish idea of inviting us with the President and his wife. Even Oriane was rather taken aback by this, especially as the Ambassadress was familiar enough with people of our kind not to invite us to such an incongruous gathering. There was a minister present who's a known swindler… but the less said about that the better – we simply hadn't been warned, we were caught in a trap, though I have to say that all these people behaved very decently. And it would have been better left at that. But Mme de Guermantes, who rarely does me the honour of asking my opinion, thought fit to leave her card at the Élysée the following week. It was perhaps a bit extreme of Gilbert to regard that as a stain upon our name. But one simply has to bear in mind that, politics apart, M. Carnot, who as it happens held his position very respectably, was the grandson of a member of the Revolutionary tribunal which saw eleven members of our family to their deaths in a single day.

In that case, Basin, why did you use to go and dine at Chantilly every week? The Duc d'Aumale too was the grandson of a member of the Revolutionary tribunal, but with this difference: Carnot was a decent man and Philippe-Égalité a dreadful villain.

– I'm sorry to interrupt, but I did send that photograph, said Swann. I can't understand why it hasn't reached you.

– That doesn't altogether surprise me, said the Duchesse. My servants tell me only what they want me to know. They probably have an aversion to the Order of St John.' And she rang the bell.

'I was never very enthusiastic about those dinners at Chantilly, you know, Oriane.

– Not enthusiastic? That's why you took your nightshirt in case the Prince asked you to stay the night, which he rarely did, of course, being a complete lout like all the Orléans family. Do you happen to know who we're dining with at Mme de Saint-Euverte's? Mme de Guermantes asked her husband.

– Apart from the guests already known to you, there'll be the brother of King Theodosius. He was invited at the last moment.'

At this piece of news the Duchesse's features were a picture of contentment, while her speech exuded boredom: 'Oh, God, more princes!

– But this one is agreeable and intelligent, said Swann.

– But not entirely so, however,' replied the Duchesse, who seemed to be seeking for words that would convey her thought with more novelty. 'Have you ever noticed with princes that the nicest of them are never entirely nice? No, I'm not joking. They always have to have an opinion about everything. And since they have no opinions of their own, they spend the first half of their lives asking us ours and the second serving them back up to us. They're not happy unless they can say that this has been well played and that not so well. Even when there's no difference. That little Theodosius Junior now – I forget his name – once asked me what an orchestral motif was called. I told him, said the Duchesse, her eyes sparkling and laughter bursting from her lovely red lips, "an orchestral motif, of course". And oh dear, he was none too pleased with that really. Oh, my dear Charles, Mme de Guermantes continued listlessly, how tiresome these dinners can be. There are evenings when one would sooner die! But of course dying is perhaps just as tiresome, since we don't know what it's like.'

A servant appeared. It was the young fiancé who had come to grief with the concierge until the Duchesse, out of kindness, had restored a semblance of peace between them.

'Am I to enquire after M. le Marquis d'Osmond this evening? he asked.

– Most certainly not, do nothing until tomorrow morning! There's not even any need for you to remain here tonight. His footman, who's a friend of yours, might well come round with news and send you out after us. Go out somewhere, anywhere, go and live it up, sleep out, but I don't want to see your face here before tomorrow morning.'

The young footman's face was overjoyed. At last he would be able to spend long hours with his betrothed, whom it had become practically impossible for him to see since yet another scene with the concierge when the Duchesse had considerately explained to him that, to avoid further conflict, it would be better if he did not go out at all. The thought of finally having a free evening bore him on a tide of happiness which the Duchesse saw and understood. She felt something like a pang and an itching in her whole body as she imagined this happiness being enjoyed behind her back, concealed from her, and it made her irritated and jealous. 'No, Basin, he's to remain here. He's not to stir out of the house.

– But, Oriane, that's absurd. You have all your servants here, and then at midnight there'll be the costumier and the dresser for the fancy dress ball. There's absolutely nothing to keep him here, and since he's the only one who is friendly with Mama's footman, I'd far sooner he was well out of the house.

– Look, Basin, will you just listen to me for a moment. It so happens I shall have a message for him in the course of the evening, I'm not sure at what time. You're not to stir from here for a second,' she said to the despairing footman.

If there were constant quarrels, and if servants did not remain long with the Duchesse, the person responsible for this continual state of warfare was certainly there to stay, but that person was not the concierge. No doubt for the meatier tasks, for the tortures it was more strenuous to inflict, for the quarrels which ended in blows, the Duchesse entrusted the heavy tools to him; and these were roles he played without suspecting that he had been cast for them. Like her servants, he admired the Duchesse's kindness; even the less clear-sighted of her footmen who had left her service and came back to visit Françoise were of the opinion that to be employed by the Duc would have been the best position in Paris if it had not been for the concierge's lodge. The Duchesse made use of the lodge in the same way as people have long made use of clericalism, freemasonry, the Jewish peril and so forth. A footman came into the room.

'Why has the package M. Swann had sent not been brought up? And, since you're here, has Jules come back yet? He went for news of M. le Marquis d'Osmond. (You probably know that Mama is very ill, Charles.)

– He's just arrived back, M. le Duc. They're expecting M. le Marquis to pass away at any moment.

– Ah, he's alive! exclaimed the Duc with a sigh of relief. So they're expecting, are they? To the devil with your expecting! While there's life there's hope, said the Duc cheerfully, turning to us. 'They've already been talking about him as though he were dead and buried. In a week's time he'll be chippier than me.

– It's the doctors who said he wouldn't last the evening. One of them wanted to call again during the night. The head doctor told them it was pointless. M. le Marquis would be dead by then. They've only kept him alive by giving him enemas of camphorated oil.

– Shut up, you stupid fool! shouted the Duc in a furious rage. Who asked for your opinion? You haven't understood a word they told you.

– It wasn't me they told, it was Jules.

– I asked you to shut up! roared the Duc, and he turned towards Swann: How wonderful he's still alive! He's bound to regain his strength in due course. Still alive after such a critical turn – that in itself is really quite something. One can't expect miracles. It can't be too dreadful having a little enema with camphorated oil, he added, rubbing his hands. He's alive. What more could one want? After all he's gone through, that's really quite impressive. To have a constitution like that is even something to be envied. Ah! these invalids, their every need is attended to in a way that ours aren't. At lunch today some blasted chef presented me with a leg of lamb and béarnaise sauce – done to a turn, I admit, but for that very reason I ate so much of it that it's still lying on my stomach. But that doesn't mean that people will come enquiring after me as they do after my dear cousin Amanien. There's too much enquiring going on. It's wearying for him. He needs breathing-space. They're killing the poor man with their endless sending round for news.

– Just wait a moment, said the Duchesse to the footman as he was leaving the room, I asked for the package with the photograph M. Swann sent to be brought up.

– It's so large, Mme la Duchesse, that I wasn't sure if it would get through the door. We've left it in the hall. Does Madame wish me to bring it up?

– In that case, no. They should have told me, but if it's so big I shall see it later when I come downstairs.

– I also forgot to tell Madame la Duchesse that Mme la Comtesse Molé left a card this morning for Madame.

– What, this morning?' said the Duchesse disapprovingly, being of the opinion that so young a woman ought not to take the liberty of leaving cards at that time of day.

'About ten o'clock, Madame la Duchesse.

– Bring me the cards.

– In any case, Oriane, when you say that it was a funny idea of Marie's to marry Gilbert, said the Duc, reverting to his earlier topic of conversation, it's you who have a peculiar way of writing history. If anyone was a fool in that marriage, it was Gilbert, for choosing of all people a woman so closely related to the King of the Belgians, who has usurped the name of Brabant from us. In a word, we are of the same blood as the Hesse family, and of the elder branch. It's always stupid to talk about oneself, he said, addressing himself to me, but it is true that whenever we've been to Darmstadt, and not only Darmstadt but even to Cassel and all over electoral Hesse, all the landgraves have invariably been courteous enough to yield us right of precedence as members of the elder branch.

– Oh, I say, Basin, you're not trying to tell me that a person who was honorary commandant of every regiment in her country, who was to be engaged to the King of Sweden…

– Really, Oriane, that's a bit much. Anyone would think you didn't know that the King of Sweden's grandfather was tilling the soil in Pau at a time when we had been holding pride of place all over Europe for nine hundred years.

– Which doesn't alter the fact that if someone were to say in the street: "Look, there's the King of Sweden," everyone would rush as far as the Place de la Concorde to see him, whereas if he said: "There's M. de Guermantes," no one would know who he was talking about.

– What sort of argument is that?

– Nor can I understand how, once the title of Duc de Brabant has passed into the Belgian royal family, you can make any claim to it.'

The footman returned with the Comtesse Molé's card, or rather what she had left to pass for a card. Claiming that she did not have one with her, she had produced from her pocket a letter addressed to herself, removed the contents of the envelope which bore the name: 'La Comtesse Molé,' folded down the corner to present it. Since the envelope was rather large, in accordance with that year's fashion in notepaper, this hand-written 'card' was almost twice the size of an ordinary visiting-card.

'This is an example of what people call Mme Molé's "simple ways", said the Duchesse ironically. She would have us believe she had no cards on her so that she can show off her inventiveness. But we know all about that, don't we, my dear Charles, we're rather too grown-up and inventive ourselves not to see into the mind of this little lady of four years' social experience. She's charming, but, for all that, it doesn't seem to me that she carries enough weight to imagine that she can amaze the world with the tiny effort it takes to leave an envelope instead of a card and to leave it at ten in the morning. Her old mother mouse will show her that she knows a thing or two about those sorts of tricks.'

Swann could not hold back his laughter at the thought that the Duchesse, who happened to be rather jealous of Mme Molé's success, would draw on her stock of 'Guermantes wit' to find some insolent response to her visitor.

'As for the title of Duc de Brabant, I've told you a hundred times, Oriane…' the Duc resumed, but the Duchesse cut him short without listening.

'But, my dear Charles, I'm dying to see your photograph.

– Ah! Extinctor draconis latrator Anubis,[111] said Swann.

– Yes, it was so charming what you told me about that in connection with San Giorgio in Venice. But why Anubis? I don't follow.

– What's the one like who was an ancestor of Babal? M. de Guermantes asked.

– You want to see his Babby Babal, do you?' said Mme de Guermantes dryly, to show that she herself despised the wordplay. 'I want to see them all, she added.

– Listen, Charles, let's go downstairs until the carriage comes, said the Duc. You can pay your call on us in the hall, because my wife won't give us a moment's peace until she's seen your photograph. I'm less impatient, if the truth were told, he added complacently. I can bide my time, but she would see us all dead first.

– What an excellent suggestion, Basin, said the Duchesse. Let's go into the hall. At least we'll know why we've come down from your study, though we'll never know how we have come down from the counts of Brabant.

– I've told you a hundred times how the title came into the House of Hesse, said the Duc (as we moved off to see the photograph, and I thought of the ones that Swann used to bring me in Combray), through the marriage of a Brabant in 1241 with the daughter of the last landgrave of Thuringia and Hesse, so that really it's the title of Prince of Hesse that came to the House of Brabant rather than that of Duc de Brabant to the House of Hesse. You'll remember that our battle-cry was that of the Ducs de Brabant: "Limbourg to her conqueror!" until we exchanged the arms of Brabant for those of Guermantes, something we were wrong to do in my opinion, and the example of the Gramonts will do nothing to make me change it.

– But, replied Mme de Guermantes, since it's the King of the Belgians who conquered it… Besides, the Belgian Crown Prince is known as Duc de Brabant.

– But, my dear, what you're saying is unsound, it doesn't hold water. You know as well as I do that there are assumed titles which can perfectly well survive even if the territory is occupied by an usurper. For example, the King of Spain is yet another who describes himself as Duc de Brabant, on the grounds of rights to possession less ancient than ours, but more ancient than those of the King of the Belgians. He also calls himself Duke of Burgundy, King of the West and East Indies, Duke of Milan. Yet he's no more in possession of Burgundy, the Indies or Brabant than I am of Brabant myself, or the Prince of Hesse, if it comes to that. The King of Spain likewise proclaims himself King of Jerusalem, as does the Emperor of Austria, and Jerusalem belongs to neither.'

He broke off for a moment, uneasy that the mention of Jerusalem might have embarrassed Swann, in view of 'current events', only to take up again at a faster pace:

‘What you have just said could be applicable to anyone. In the past we were Ducs d’ Aumale, a duchy that has passed as regularly to the House of France as Joinville and Chevreuse have to the House of Albert. We make no more claim to those titles than to that of Marquis de Noirmoutiers, which was at one time ours and became very regularly monopolized by the House of La Trémoïlle, but because certain transfers of titles are valid, it does not follow that they all are. For instance, he continued, turning to me, my sister-in-law’s son bears the title of Prince d’Agrigente, which comes to us from Joan the Mad, as the title of Prince de Tarente comes to the La Trémoïlles. Now, this title of Tarente was given by Napoleon to a soldier, who may well have done his job excellently, but by doing this Napoleon was giving away something which was not his to give, even less so than Napoleon III when he created a Duc de Montmorency, since Périgord at least had a mother who was a Montmorency, whereas the Tarente of Napoleon I had no more of a Tarente about him than Napoleon’s wish that he should be created one. That didn’t prevent Chaix d’Est-Ange, in some mention of your uncle Condé, from asking the Imperial Attorney if he had fished up the title of Duc de Montmorency from the moat at Vincennes.

– Look, Basin, I’d like nothing better than to follow you to the moat at Vincennes, or even to Taranto. Which reminds me, dear Charles, of something I wanted to say to you when you were telling me about your San Giorgio of Venice. Basin and I were thinking of spending next spring in Italy and Sicily. If you were to accompany us, think what a difference it would make! I’m not thinking only of the pleasure of having you with us, but imagine, after all you’ve so often told me about the remains of the Norman Conquest and of the classical world, just imagine what a trip like that would be like, with you as company! I mean even Basin – what am I saying! I mean Gilbert – would benefit from it, because I feel that even his claims to the throne of Naples and all that sort of thing would begin to interest me if they were explained by you in old Romanesque churches or on little villages perched on hills as they are in primitive paintings. But we’re going to look at your photograph. Unwrap it, said the Duchesse to a footman.

– Please, Oriane, not this evening! You can look at it tomorrow, begged the Duc, who had already been shooting me signs of alarm at the vast size of the photograph.

‘But I need to look at it with Charles,’ said the Duchesse with a smile which was both misleadingly concupiscent and psychologically calculated, for in her desire to please Swann, she spoke of the enjoyment this photograph would give her as of the benefit an invalid feels he would derive from eating an orange, or as though she had simultaneously planned to run off with several lovers and informed a biographer of tastes that were to her credit.

‘In that case, he can make you a special visit, declared the Duc, to whom his wife was obliged to yield. You can spend three hours together in front of it, if that’s what you want, he added ironically. But where are you going to put a toy as big as that?’

– In my bedroom, of course. I want to have it somewhere I can look at it properly.

– Well, just as you please. If it’s in your room, there’s little chance of me ever seeing it,’ said the Duc, heedless of the revelation he was so unthinkingly making about the negative character of his conjugal relations.

‘Just make sure you undo it very carefully, Mme de Guermantes told the servant (she was being liberal with her instructions out of consideration for Swann). And don’t ruin the envelope, either.

– Even the envelope has to be treated with care! the Duc whispered in my ear, raising his hands to the ceiling. I say, Swann, he added, what amazes me, dull unimaginative husband that I am, is how did you manage to find an envelope that size. Where of all places did you dig it up?

– Oh, the photographers are always sending things like that. But the man’s an oaf; I see he’s written on it “La Duchesse de Guermantes” and omitted ‘Madame’.

– I forgive him,’ said the Duchesse with her mind elsewhere; she seemed struck by a sudden idea of an amusing kind, but repressed a faint smile and returned her attention to Swann: ‘Come, now, you haven’t told us whether you’re coming to Italy with us?

– I really don’t think, Madame, that it will be possible.

– Oh, well, Mme de Montmorency is the luckier woman. You went with her to Venice and Vicenza. She told me that with you one saw things one would never see otherwise, things no one has ever mentioned before, that you’d shown her unheard-of marvels, and that even among the familiar things she learned to appreciate details which without you she would have passed by a score of times without ever noticing. She was clearly more privileged than we are to be… She turned to the servant: You will take the huge envelope that contained M. Swann’s photograph, and you will leave it with the corner turned down, as a calling-card from me at Mme la Comtesse Molé’s, at half-past ten this evening.’

Swann burst out laughing.

‘I should like to know all the same, Mme de Guermantes asked him, how you can tell ten months beforehand that it will be impossible to come with us.

– My dear Duchesse, I can tell you if you really want me to, but, first of all, you can see that I’m not at all well.

– True, my dear Charles, I don’t think you look at all well, and it pains me to see you so off-colour, but I’m not asking you to accompany us next week, I’m asking you come with us in ten months’ time. Ten months is surely enough time to get oneself treated?’

At this point a footman came to announce that the carriage was at the door. ‘Come, Oriane, time to saddle up,’ said the Duc, who had been champing at the bit for some time now, just as if he had been one of the horses that stood waiting.

‘Very well, will you tell me in one word why you can’t come to Italy?’ the Duchesse challenged Swann as she rose to take leave of us.

‘But, my dear friend, it’s because I shall have been dead for several months by then. According to the doctors I’ve consulted, by the end of the year my present illness – and as far as that goes it could carry me off at any time – will leave me three or four months to live at the most, and even that is an optimistic estimate,’ replied Swann with a smile, as the footman opened the glass door of the hall for the Duchesse to leave.

‘What on earth are you telling me?’ the Duchesse broke out, stopping short for a second on her way to the carriage and raising her handsome, melancholy blue eyes, her gaze now fraught with uncertainty. Poised for the first time in her life between two duties as far removed from each other as getting into her carriage to go to a dinner-party and showing compassion for a man who was about to die, she could find no appropriate precedent to follow in the code of conventions and, not knowing which duty to honour, she felt she had no choice but to pretend to believe that the second alternative did not need to be raised, thus enabling her to comply with the first, which at that moment required less effort, and thought that the best way of settling the conflict would be to deny that there was one. ‘You must be joking,’ she said to Swann.

‘It would be a joke in charming taste, replied Swann ironically. ‘I don’t know why I’m telling you this. I’ve never mentioned my illness to you before. But since you asked me, and since now I may die at any moment… But please, that last thing I want to do is to hold you up, and you’ve a dinner-party to go to,’ he added, because he knew that for other people their own social obligations mattered more than the death of a friend, and as a man of considerate politeness he put himself in their place. But the Duchesse’s own sense of manners too afforded her a confused glimpse of the fact that for Swann her dinner-party must count for less than his own death. And so, while still moving towards her carriage, she said with a droop of her shoulders: ‘Don’t worry about the dinner-party. It’s of no importance!’ But her words put the Duc in a bad mood and he burst out: ‘Come along, Oriane, don’t just stand there with your chatter, whining away to Swann, when you know very well that Mme de Saint-Euverte makes a point of having her guests sit down to table at eight o’clock sharp. We need you to make up your mind. The horses have been waiting for a good five minutes now. Forgive me, Charles, he said turning to Swann, but it’s ten minutes to eight. Oriane is always late, and it will take us more than five minutes to get to old mother Saint-Euverte.’

Mme de Guermantes made a decisive move towards the carriage and said a last farewell to Swann. 'Look, we'll talk about this some other time. I don't believe a word you've been saying, but we need to discuss it, just the two of us. I'm sure they've given you unnecessary cause for alarm. Come and have lunch, any day you like (for Mme de Guermantes lunch was the answer to all problems), you've only to let me know the day and the time,' and, lifting her skirt, she set her foot on the carriage step. She was about to get in when the Duc caught sight of her foot and thundered out: 'Oriane, you wretched woman, what are you thinking of? You're still wearing your black shoes! With a red dress! Go up quickly and change into your red ones. No, wait, he said, turning to the footman, go and tell Madame's maid to bring down a pair of red shoes at once.

– But, my dear,' said the Duchesse softly, embarrassed to see that Swann, who was leaving the house with me but had stepped back to let the carriage pass out in front of us, had heard this, 'given that we're late… '

– No, no, we have plenty of time. It's only ten to. It won't take us ten minutes to get to the Parc Monceau. And anyway, what does it matter? Even if we arrive at half-past eight they'll still wait for us, but you simply can't go there in a red dress and black shoes. Besides, we shan't be the last to arrive, believe me. The Sassensages are coming. You know that they never turn up before twenty to nine.'

The Duchesse went up to her room.

'Huh! said M. de Guermantes to Swann and myself, people laugh at us poor husbands, but we're not completely useless. If it wasn't for me, Oriane would have gone out to dinner in black shoes.

– They were by no means a disaster, said Swann, I noticed the black shoes and I didn't find them remotely offensive.

– You may be right, replied the Duc, but it looks more elegant to have them matching the dress. Anyway, you can set your mind at rest. No sooner had she got there than she would have noticed, and I would have been the one who had to come back and fetch the others, which means I wouldn't have eaten till nine o'clock. Good-bye, my dear boys, he said, thrusting us gently away, off you go, now, before Oriane comes down. It's not that she doesn't like seeing you both. On the contrary, she's too fond of seeing you. If she finds you still here she'll start talking again. She's already very tired, and she'll be dead by the time she gets to that dinner. And quite frankly, I have to tell you that I'm dying of hunger. I had a miserable lunch this morning when I came from the train. That sauce béarnaise was damn good, certainly, but in spite of that I shan't be sorry, no two ways about it, to sit down to dinner. Five to eight! That's women for you! She'll give us both indigestion before the night's out. She's far less robust than people think.'

The Duc had absolutely no qualms in speaking in this way about his wife's petty discomforts and his own to a dying man, for because they were what was uppermost in his mind, they seemed more important to him. And so, after he had gently steered us to the door, it was merely his jocund sense of good manners that led him to boom out after Swann, who was already in the courtyard, in a voice for all to hear:

'Now mind you don't let all this damned doctors' nonsense get to you. They're fools. You're in strapping shape. You'll live to see us all in our graves!'

BOOK IV
Sodom & Gomorrah
PART I

First appearance of the men-women, descendants of those inhabitants of Sodom who were spared by the fire from heaven.

'Woman will have Gomorrah and man will have Sodom.'

Alfred de Vigny

As we know, well before going that day (the day when the Princesse de Guermantes' soirée was taking place) to pay the call on the Duc and Duchesse that I have just recounted, I had been watching out for their return and had, in the course of my vigil, made a discovery, involving M. de Charlus in particular, but so significant in itself that up until now, when I am able to give it the position and dimensions it requires, I have put off reporting it. I had, as I have said, abandoned the splendid vantage point, so comfortably installed at the top of the house, from where you can take in the uneven inclines by which ascent is made to the de Bréquigny hôtel, gaily ornamented in the Italian style by the pink campanile of the coachhouse belonging to the Marquis de Frécourt. I had found it more practical, once I thought that the Duc and Duchesse were on the point of returning, to station myself on the staircase. I a little regretted ending my sojourn on high. But at this hour of the day, which was that following lunch, I had less cause for regret, for I would not have seen, as in the morning, the footmen from the de Bréquigny and de Tresmes hôtel, reduced by the distance to tiny figures in a painting, making their slow ascent of the abrupt rise, feather duster in hand, between the large sheets of transparent mica that stood out so pleasingly against the red foothills.[2] Lacking the perspective of the geologist, I at least had that of the botanist, and gazed through the shutters on the stairs at the Duchesse's small shrub and the precious plant, exhibited in the courtyard with that insistence with which the marriageable young are thrust forward, and I wondered whether, by some providential chance, the improbable insect would come to visit the tendered and forlorn pistil. Curiosity gradually emboldening me, I descended as far as the ground-floor window, which was also open, and whose shutters were only half closed. I could distinctly hear Jupien getting ready to leave, who could not have detected me behind my blind, where I remained motionless up until the moment when I sprang hurriedly aside for fear of being seen by M. de Charlus, who, on his way to visit Mme de Villeparisis, was slowly crossing the courtyard, pot-bellied, aged by the full daylight, greying. It had taken an indisposition on Mme de Villeparisis's part (a consequence of the illness of the Marquis de Fierbois, with whom he personally was at daggers drawn) for M. de Charlus to pay a visit, for perhaps the first time in his life, at this hour of the day. For with that singularity of the Guermantes who, instead of conforming to the life of society, modified it in accordance with their own habits (unworldly, so they believed, and deserving in consequence that worldliness, that thing of no value, should be humbled before them – thus it was that Mme de Marsantes did not have her 'day' but entertained her women friends every morning, from 10 till 12), the Baron, setting this time aside for reading, or for hunting for old curios and the like, only ever went visiting between 4 and 6 in the evening. At 6 he would go to the Jockey Club or for a drive in the Bois.[3] A moment later, I once again drew back so as not to be seen by Jupien; it would soon be his time for leaving for his office, from where he returned only for dinner, or even not at all for the past week, since his niece had gone off to the country with her apprentices to a customer's to finish a dress. Then, realizing that no one could see me, I resolved not to be disturbed again for fear of missing, were the miracle to occur, the arrival, almost impossible to hope for (across all the obstacles, the distance, the contrary chances, the dangers), of the insect sent from afar as an ambassador to the virgin whose wait had been so long protracted. I knew that this wait was no more passive than with the male flower, whose stamens had spontaneously turned so that the insect might the more easily receive him; similarly, the flower-woman that was here would, should the insect come, arch her 'styles' coquettishly and, in order to be penetrated more fully by him, would imperceptibly, like a hypocritical but ardent young damsel, come to meet him half-way. The laws of the vegetable world are themselves governed by ever higher laws. If the visit of an insect, that is to say, the bringing of the seed from another flower, is necessary as a rule to fertilize a flower, this is because self-fertilization, the fertilization of the flower by itself, like repeated marriages within the same family, would lead to degeneration and sterility, whereas the cross-breeding effected by insects gives to succeeding generations of the same species a vigour unknown among their elders. This new lease of life may be excessive, however, and the species develop disproportionately; then, just as an anti-toxin protects us against disease, or as the thyroid controls our waistline, or as defeat comes to punish pride, or fatigue pleasure, and as sleep in turn reposes us from fatigue, so an exceptional act of self-fertilization comes at the appointed time to give its own turn to the screw, to apply the brake, and bring the flower that had exaggeratedly departed from the norm back within it. My reflections had been following an incline that I shall describe in due course, and I had already drawn from the conspicuous stratagem of the flowers a consequence bearing on a whole unconscious element in the work of literature, when I saw M. de Charlus coming out again from the Marquise's. A few minutes only had elapsed since he had gone in. Perhaps he had learned from his elderly relative herself, or merely through a servant, of the great improvement or rather the complete recovery from what in Mme de Villeparisis's case had been only a passing indisposition. At that moment, when he thought no one to be watching him, his eyelids lowered against the sunlight, M. de Charlus had relaxed the tension in his face and muffled the factitious vitality sustained in him by animated chit-chat and by force of will. Pale as a marble statue, he had a large nose, but his fine features no longer received a different meaning from a wilful gaze that might detract from the beauty of their modelling; nothing more now than a Guermantes, he seemed already sculpted, he, Palamède XV, in the chapel at Combray. Yet these features common to a whole family took on, in M. de Charlus's face, a more spiritualized, above all a gentler, delicacy. I regretted for his sake that he should habitually adulterate, by his many violences, his disagreeable idiosyncrasies, his scandal-mongering, his severity, his touchiness and his arrogance, that he should conceal, beneath a spurious brutality, the amenity and kindness I could see displayed so artlessly on his face at the moment when he emerged from Mme de Villeparisis's. Blinking against the sunlight, he seemed almost to be smiling, and in his face, seen thus in repose and as it were in its natural state, I found something so affectionate, so defenceless, that I could not help reflecting how angry M. de Charlus would have been had he known he was being watched; for what he put me in mind of, this man who was so enamoured of, who so prided himself on, his virility, who found everyone hatefully effeminate, what he suddenly put me in mind of, so unmistakably did he have, fleetingly, the features, the expression, the smile of one, was a woman!

I was about once again to move so that he should not catch sight of me; I had neither the time nor the need. For what did I see! Face to face, in this courtyard where they had certainly never encountered one another before (M. de Charlus coming to the Guermantes hôtel only in the afternoons, at times when Jupien was at his office), the Baron, his half-closed eyes all of a sudden opened wide, was gazing with an extraordinary intentness at the former waistcoat-maker on the doorstep of his shop, while the latter, standing suddenly transfixed in front of M. de Charlus, rooted like a plant, was contemplating with an air of wonderment the ageing Baron's embonpoint. But, what was even more astonishing, M. de Charlus's attitude having changed, that of Jupien was at once made to harmonize with it, as if in accordance with the laws of some secret art. The Baron, who was seeking now to disguise the impression he had felt, and who, for all his feigned indifference, seemed to be moving away only with regret, came and went, stared off into space in the manner that he believed best brought out the beauty of his eyes, and had assumed a self-satisfied, casual and ridiculous expression. Jupien meanwhile, at once shedding the humble, kindly expression I had always seen him wear, had – in perfect symmetry with the Baron – drawn back his head, set his torso at an advantageous angle, placed his fist on his hip with a grotesque impertinence and made his behind stick out, striking poses with the coquettishness that the orchid might have had for the providential advent of the bumblebee. I had not know he could look so unsympathetic. But nor had I known that he was capable of playing his part impromptu in this sort of scene between two deaf mutes, which (although he found himself in the presence of M. de Charlus for the first time) seemed to have been long rehearsed; we arrive at such perfection spontaneously only when meeting with a compatriot abroad, with whom understanding then comes of its own accord, the interpreter being one and the same, without ever having set eyes on one another before.

This scene was not positively comical, however, it was imbued with a strangeness, or if you like a naturalness, the beauty of which continued to grow. For all that M. de Charlus had tried to assume a detached air, distractedly lowering his eyelids, every now and again he would raise them again and give Julien an attentive glance. But (no doubt because he thought that a scene such as this could not be prolonged indefinitely in this place, either for reasons that will be understood in due course, or else out of that sense of the brevity of all things which means that we want every blow to strike home, and makes of any love affair a most affecting spectacle), each time M. de Charlus looked at Jupien, he saw to it that the look was accompanied by a word or two, which made it infinitely unlike the looks normally directed at someone whom we know or do not know; he gazed at Jupien with the peculiar fixity of someone who is about to say to you: 'Forgive my butting in, but you have a long white thread hanging down your back,' or else, 'I can't be mistaken, you must be from Zürich, too, I fancy indeed I've often met you at the antique dealer's.' Thus, every two minutes, the same question seemed to be being posed to Jupien with intensity by M. de Charlus's oglings, like those interrogative phrases in Beethoven, repeated indefinitely at equal intervals, and intended – with an exaggerated luxury of preparation – to bring in a new theme, a change of key, a 're-entry'. But the beauty of M. de Charlus's and Jupien's glances came, on the contrary, from the very fact that, provisionally at least, these glances did not seem to have as their aim to lead to anything. It was the first time I had seen the Baron and Jupien manifest this beauty. In the eyes of both, it was the sky, not of Zürich, but of some Oriental city whose name I had not as yet divined, which had just arisen. Whatever the point that was able to detain M. de Charlus and the waistcoat-maker, agreement seemed to have been reached between them and these useless glances to be no more than the ritual preliminaries, like the entertainments given before a marriage that has been agreed on. Closer still to nature – and the multiplicity of these comparisons is itself all the more natural in that, examined over the course of a few minutes, the same man seems successively to be a man, a man-bird, or a man-insect, and so on – it was like two birds, the male and the female, the male seeking to advance, the female – Jupien – making no sign in response to this manoeuvre, but looking at her new friend without surprise, with an inattentive fixity, adjudged more disturbing no doubt and alone of use, from the moment that the male had made the first moves, and contenting herself with preening her feathers. Finally, Jupien's indifference no longer seemed to be enough for him; from the certainty of having made a conquest to getting himself pursued and desired was but a short step, and, making up his mind to leave for his work, Jupien went out through the porte-cochère. It was only after turning his head two or three times, however, that he made his escape into the street, into which the Baron, fearful of losing the scent (whistling with a devil-may-care expression, and not without a loud 'au revoir' to the concierge, who, half-drunk and entertaining guests in his back kitchen, did not even hear him), dashed hurriedly out in order to catch him up. At the selfsame instant that M. de Charlus passed through the gateway whistling like a fat bumble-bee, another one, a real one this time, entered the courtyard. Who knows whether it was not the one so long awaited by the orchid, that had come to bring her the rare pollen without which she would remain a virgin? But I was distracted from following the insect's frolics, for, a minute or two later, Jupien, making a greater claim on my attention (perhaps in order to collect a package that he later took away with him and which, in the emotion caused in him by the appearance of M. de Charlus, he had forgotten, perhaps quite simply for some more natural reason), Jupien returned, followed by the Baron. The latter, resolved to precipitate matters, asked the waistcoat-maker for a light, but immediately remarked: 'I'm asking you for a light, but I see I've forgotten my cigars.' The laws of hospitality prevailed over the rules of flirtation. 'Come inside, you'll be given everything you want,' said the waistcoat-maker, on whose face disdain gave way to joy. The door of the shop closed on them and I could no longer hear anything. I had lost sight of the bumble-bee, I did not know whether it was the insect that the orchid needed, but I no longer doubted the miraculous possibility of a very rare insect and a captive flower being conjoined, now that M. de Charlus (a simple comparison of the providential chances, whatever they might be, without the least scientific pretension to drawing a parallel between certain botanical laws and what is sometimes quite wrongly called homosexuality), who, for years past, had come into this house only at the times when Jupien was not there, had, through the accident of Mme de Villeparisis's indisposition, encountered the waistcoat-maker and with him, the good fortune reserved for men of the Baron's kind by one of those fellow creatures who may even be, as we shall see, infinitely younger than Jupien and better-looking, the man predestined so that they may receive their share of sensual pleasure on this earth: the man who loves only elderly gentlemen.

What I have just said here is anyway what I was to understand only a few minutes later, however, so closely do these properties of being invisible adhere to reality, until some circumstance removes them. At all events, for the time being I was most annoyed no longer to be able to hear the conversation between the former waistcoat-maker and the Baron. I then noticed that the shop that was to let was divided from Jupien's only by an exceedingly thin partition. To get into it, all I need do was to return upstairs to our apartment, go to the kitchen, descend the servants' staircase as far as the cellars, follow these internally for the whole width of the courtyard and, having reached the point in the basement where, only a few months before, the cabinet-maker had been storing his joinery, and where Jupien was anticipating putting his coal, climb the few steps that gave access to the interior of the shop. Thus my whole route would be under cover, I should be seen by no one. That was the most prudent course. It was not the one that I adopted, but, keeping along the walls, I circled the courtyard in the open, trying not to be seen. If I was not seen, I owe it more to chance, I fancy, than to my good sense. And, supposing there to be one, I can see three possible reasons for the fact that I came to so rash a decision, when the cellar route was so safe. My impatience first of all. Then perhaps an obscure recollection of the scene in Montjouvain, hidden in front of Mlle Vinteuil's window.[4] Indeed, the staging of the things of this sort that I witnessed was always of the rashest and least probable nature, as if such revelations had to be the reward only for an action full of risk, though partly clandestine. Lastly, piece of childishness that it was, I hardly dare confess to the third reason, which was, I do believe, unconsciously determining. Since, in order to follow – and to see contradicted – the military principles of Saint-Loup, I had been following the Boer War in great detail, I had been led to reread old accounts of travel and exploration. These accounts had excited me and I had applied them in my everyday life in order to give myself more courage. When my attacks had forced me to remain for several days and several nights on end, not merely without sleeping, but without lying down, and without drinking or eating, at the moment when my exhaustion and suffering had become such that I thought I would never re-emerge from them, I would think of some traveller cast up on the shore, poisoned by unwholesome plants, shivering with fever in clothes drenched in sea-water, yet who felt better after a day or two and resumed his journey at random, in search of some inhabitants or other, who would perhaps be cannibals. Their example braced me, and gave me back some hope, and I felt ashamed of having momentarily lost heart. Thinking of the Boers who, with English armies facing them, were not afraid to expose themselves at the moment when, before regaining the bush, they needed to cross a stretch of open country: 'A fine thing,' I thought, 'that I should be more pusillanimous when the theatre of operations is merely our own courtyard and when the only steel I, who have just fought several duels without any fear, on account of the Dreyfus Affair, have to fear is that of the neighbours' gaze, who have better things to do than stare into the courtyard.'

But once I was in the shop, avoiding making even the faintest creak of the floorboards, realizing that the slightest sound from Jupien's shop could be heard from mine, I reflected how imprudent Jupien and M. de Charlus had been and the extent to which luck had been with them.

I did not dare move. The Guermantes's groom, taking advantage of their absence no doubt, had in fact transferred a ladder previously stored in the coachhouse into the shop where I now found myself. And had I climbed up on it I could have opened the transom and heard as if I had been in Jupien's shop itself. But I was afraid of making a noise. Moreover, there was no point. I did not even need to regret having taken several minutes to get into my shop. For to judge by what I heard in the early stages from Jupien's, which was simply inarticulate sounds, I assume few words were uttered. It is true that these sounds were so violent that, had they not constantly been taken up an octave higher by a parallel moaning, I might have thought that one person was slitting another's throat close beside me and that the murderer and his resuscitated victim were then taking a bath in order to erase the traces of the crime. From which I later concluded that if there is one thing as noisy as suffering it is pleasure, especially when there is added to it – failing the fear of having children, which could not be the case here, in spite of the far from convincing example in the Golden Legend[5] – an immediate concern with cleanliness. Finally, at the end of half an hour or so (during which time I had surreptitiously hoisted myself up on my ladder so as to see through the transom, which I did not open), a conversation was joined. Jupien was energetically refusing the money that M. de Charlus wanted to give him.

Then M. de Charlus took a step outside the shop. 'Why do you have your chin shaved like that, he said to the Baron affectionately. It's so handsome, a good beard! – Pah, it's disgusting!' replied the Baron. He still lingered in the doorway, however, and asked Jupien for information about the neighbourhood. 'You don't know anything about the chestnut vendor on the corner, not on the left, he's a horror, but on the even-numbered side, a big, strapping fellow, very dark? And the chemist opposite, he's got a very nice cyclist who delivers his medicines.' These questions no doubt ruffled Jupien, for, drawing himself up in pique, like a great coquette betrayed, he replied: 'I can see you're inconstant.' Uttered in a sorrowful, icy and affected tone, this reproach no doubt found a response in M. de Charlus, who, in order to erase the bad impression his inquisitiveness had created, addressed an entreaty to Jupien, too low for me to be able to make out the words, which would no doubt necessitate their prolonging their stay in the shop and which sufficiently affected the waistcoat-maker to erase his suffering, for he stared at the Baron's face, fat and flushed beneath his grey hair, with the supremely happy look of someone whose amour propre has just been profoundly flattered, and, making up his mind to grant M. de Charlus what the latter had just requested, Jupien, after one or two remarks lacking in refinement such as 'You've got a fat bum!, said to the Baron, with an expression at once smiling, emotional, superior and grateful: All right, come on, you great baby, you!'

'If I revert to the question of the tram-driver,[6] M. de Charlus went on tenaciously, it's because, aside from anything else, it might provide a bit of interest for the journey home. Like the caliph who used to roam Baghdad mistaken for a simple merchant,[7] I sometimes indeed condescend to follow some curious young person whose silhouette has amused me.' Here I made the same observation as I had made concerning Bergotte. If ever he had to answer before a court of law, he would use, not the phrases apt for persuading the judges, but those Bergotte-like phrases that his peculiar literary temperament prompted in him naturally and from the employment of which he derived pleasure. Similarly, M. de Charlus used the same language with the waistcoat-maker as he would have done with members of society from his own coterie, exaggerating its tics even, whether because the shyness against which he was struggling to fight had impelled him to an excess of pride, or because, by preventing him from being in command of himself (for we are more ill at ease in front of someone who is not from our own circle), it forced him to unveil, to lay bare his true nature, which was indeed arrogant and a little mad, as Mme de Guermantes used to say. 'In order not to lose the scent, he went on, I jump like a little schoolmaster, like a good-looking young doctor, into the same tram as the young person herself, whom we speak of in the feminine only so as to observe the rule (just as we say when speaking of a prince: "Is Son Altesse in good health?").[8] If she changes trams, I take, along perhaps with the microbes of the plague, that unbelievable thing known as a "transfer", a number which, although it is being handed to me, isn't always Number i! In this way I change "carriages" as many as three or four times. I am sometimes left stranded at eleven o' clock in the evening at the Gare d'Orléans, and have to come home! If only it wasn't just from the Gare d'Orléans! But one time, for instance, not having been able to get into conversation earlier, I went as far as Orléans itself, in one of those frightful carriages where for a view you have, between the triangles of crochetwork known as "luggage racks", the photographs of the network's chief architectural masterpieces. There was only one seat free, and I had facing me, for a historical monument, a "view" of Orléans cathedral, which is the ugliest in France, and as wearisome to gaze at like that against my will as if I'd been forced to concentrate on its towers in the glass knob on those optical penholders that give you ophthalmia.[9] I got off at Les Aubrais at the same time as my young person where, alas (when I had been assuming every defect in her bar that of having a family), her family was waiting on the platform! For consolation, while waiting for the train that would take me back to Paris, I had only Diane de Poitiers's house.[10] It may well have charmed one of my royal ancestors, I'd have preferred a more living beauty. It's for that reason, as a remedy for the tedium of these solitary return journeys, that I'd rather like to get to know a sleeping-car attendant or the driver of an omnibus. Anyway, don't be shocked, the Baron concluded, it's all a question of class. With young society men, for example, I don't desire any physical possession, but I can't rest until I've touched them, I don't mean bodily, but touched some chord in them. Once, instead of leaving my letters unanswered, a young man never ceases writing to me, is mine to dispose of morally, I am appeased, or I would be at least if I wasn't soon gripped by concern about another one. It's rather curious, isn't it? Talking of young society men, of the ones who come here, you don't know any of them?' 'No, baby boy. Oh yes, one, dark, very tall, with a monocle, who's always laughing and turning round. – I can't tell who you mean.' Jupien completed the portrait, but M. de Charlus could not manage to discover whose portrait it was, for he was unaware that the former waistcoat-maker was one of those people, more numerous than we imagine, who cannot remember the hair-colour of people they know only slightly. For me, however, who knew of this infirmity in Jupien and who replaced dark by fair, the portrait seemed an accurate reference to the Duc de Châtellerault. 'To get back to the young men who are not from the lower orders, resumed the Baron, at this moment my head has been turned by a strange little fellow from the petty bourgeoisie, intelligent, who displays a prodigious incivility towards me. He has absolutely no notion of what a prodigious personage I am and of the microscopic vibrio that he represents. But after all what does it matter, the little donkey can bray all he likes before my august bishop's robe. – Bishop! exclaimed Jupien, who had understood nothing of the last words that M. de Charlus had just uttered, but who was stunned by the word bishop. But that hardly goes with religion, he said. – I have three popes in my family,[11] replied M. de Charlus, and the right to wear red mourning by virtue of a cardinal's title, the niece of the Cardinal, my great-uncle, having brought my grandfather the title of Duke that was substituted for it. I can see you have no ear for metaphors and are indifferent to the history of France. Moreover,' he added, by way less perhaps of a conclusion than of a warning, 'the attraction exerted on me by the young persons who avoid me, out of fear, naturally, for respect alone seals their lips from shouting aloud that they love me, requires of them an eminent position in society. There again, their feigned indifference may produce for all that the directly contrary effect. Foolishly prolonged, it nauseates me. To take an example from a class you will be more familiar with, when my town house was being repaired, so as not to provoke jealousy among all the duchesses vying for the honour of being able to tell me they had given me lodging, I went to spend a few days at a "hotel", as they say. One of the room waiters was known to me, I pointed out to him an intriguing young "chasseur", who closed carriage doors and who remained unamenable to my propositions. Exasperated finally, to prove to him that my intentions were pure, I got them to offer him a ridiculously large sum merely to come up and talk to me for five minutes in my room. I waited for him in vain. I then took such a dislike to him that I used to go out by the service entrance so I wouldn't see that wicked young rogue's pretty little face. I learned later that he'd never got any of my letters, which had been intercepted, the first by the room waiter who was envious, the second by the day porter who was virtuous, the third by the night porter who was in love with the young chasseur and used to sleep with him at the hour when Diana was rising. But my dislike has persisted all the same, and were they to serve me up the chasseur simply as game on a silver dish I wgould reject him and be sick. But there, what a shame, we've been speaking of serious matters and now it's over between us where what I'd been hoping for is concerned. But you could be of great service to me, as a go-between; and then no, that idea in itself puts a bit of spunk back into me and I feel nothing's yet over.'

From the very beginning of this scene, a revolution had been effected in M. de Charlus in my newly opened eyes, as complete and as immediate as if he had been touched by a magic wand. Up until now, because I had not understood, I had not seen. Vice (I put it thus for the sake of linguistic convenience), each person's vice accompanies him in the same fashion as the genie who was invisible to men for as long as they were unaware of his presence. Kindness, double-dealing, reputation, our social relations do not let themselves be discovered, we carry them concealed. Ulysses himself did not at first recognize Athena.[12] But the gods are immediately perceptible to the gods, as like equally soon is to like, and as M. de Charlus had been to Jupien. Up until now I had found myself in the same position when confronted by M. de Charlus as an absent-minded man who, faced by a pregnant woman whose bulging waistline he has not noticed, persists, while she smilingly repeats to him, 'Yes, I'm a little tired at present', in asking her tactlessly: 'What's the trouble then?' But should someone say to him 'She's expecting', he suddenly notices the belly and thereafter sees nothing else. It is reason that opens our eyes; an error dispelled lends us an extra sense.

Those who do not like to go for examples of this law to the Messieurs de Charlus of their acquaintance, whom for a very long time they had not suspected, until that day when, on the smooth surface of an individual no different from the rest, there have appeared, traced in a hitherto invisible ink, the characters making up that word beloved of the ancient Greeks, need only, in order to convince themselves that the world around them appears at first bare, stripped of the innumerable adornments it offers to those better informed, remember how many times in their lives it has happened that they were on the point of committing a gaffe. Nothing, on this or on that man's face, devoid of characters as it is, could have given them to imagine that he was none other than the brother, or the fiancé, or the lover of a woman of whom they were about to say: 'What a cow!' But then, fortunately, a word whispered to them by a neighbour arrests the fatal expression on their lips. At once the words appear, like a Mene, Takel, Upharsin:[13] he is the fiancé, or he is the brother, or he is the lover of the woman whom it is not right to call a 'cow' in front of him. And this new notion in itself will entail a whole regrouping, the withdrawal or promotion of some fraction of the notions, henceforth complete, we had held concerning the rest of the family. In M. de Charlus, for all that another creature had been coupled with him, which differentiated him from other men, like the horse with the centaur, and that this other creature had formed one with the Baron, I had never noticed it. Now that the abstraction had been materialized, this creature, understood at last, had at once lost its capacity to remain invisible, and the transmutation of M. de Charlus into a new person was so complete that not only the contrasts in his face and his voice, but, in retrospect, even the ups and downs in his relationship with me, all that up until now had appeared incoherent to my mind, became intelligible, showed itself to be self-evident, just as a sentence that had presented no meaning for as long as it remained broken up into letters arranged at random, expresses, if the characters find themselves restored to their rightful order, a thought we will not again be able to forget.

Moreover, I understood now why, a moment ago, when I had seen him coming out from Mme de Villeparisis's, I had been able to think that M. de Charlus had the look of a woman: he was one! He belonged to that race of beings, less contradictory than they appear to be, whose ideal is virile, precisely because their temperament is feminine, and who are in life like other men in appearance only; there where each of us carries, inscribed in the eyes through which we see everything in the universe, a silhouette intaglioed into the facet of the pupil, for them it is not that of a nymph, but of an ephebe. A race on which a malediction weighs and which must live in falsehood and in perjury, because it knows that its desire, which, for every created being, is life's sweetest pleasure, is held to be punishable and shameful, to be inadmissible; which must deny its God, since, even if Christian, when they stand arraigned at the bar of the court, they must, before Christ and in his name, defend themselves, as if from a calumny, from what is their life itself; sons without a mother, to whom they are obliged to lie even in the hour when they close her eyes; friends without friendships, notwithstanding all those that their frequently acknowledged charm inspires and which their often kindly hearts would respond to; but can we give the name of friendship to relationships that vegetate only by virtue of a lie and from which the first impulse of trust and sincerity which they might be tempted to show would cause them to be rejected in disgust, unless their dealings are with an impartial, or even a sympathetic spirit, but who then, misled in their regard by a conventional psychology, will ascribe to the vice confessed the one affection that is the most alien to it, just as certain judges presume and excuse murder more readily among inverts and betrayal among Jews for reasons deriving from original sin and the fatality of the race? Finally – at least according to the first theory I had then sketched out, which we shall see being modified in due course, in which this would have angered them more than anything else had the contradiction not been hidden from view by the very illusion that made them see and live – lovers to whom the possibility of that love, the hope of which gives them the strength to bear so many risks and so much loneliness, is all but closed, simply because they are much taken with a man having nothing of the woman about him, with a man who is not an invert and cannot, in consequence, love them; so that their desire would be forever unsatisfiable were money not to deliver up real men to them, and imagination not finally to lead them to mistake the inverts to whom they have prostituted themselves for real men. Their only honour is precarious, their only liberty provisional until the crime be discovered; their only position unstable, as for the poet who was yesterday being fêted in every drawing-room and applauded in every theatre in London, only to be driven on the morrow from every lodging-house, unable to find a pillow on which to lay his head,[14] turning the millstone like Samson and saying, like him: 'Les deux sexes mourront chacun de son côte',[15] excluded even, save at times of high misfortune when the majority rally around the victim, like the Jews around Dreyfus, from the sympathy – sometimes from the company – of their own kind, who are disgusted to be made to see themselves as they are, depicted in a mirror that no longer flatters them but brings out all the blemishes that they had not wanted to remark in themselves and makes them understand that what they had been calling their love (to which, by playing on the word, they had annexed, out of a social sense, all that poetry, painting, music, chivalry and asceticism have been able to add to love) stems not from an ideal of beauty that they have chosen, but from an incurable malady; like the Jews once again (save those few who wish to associate only with those of their own race, and who have the ritual words and hallowed jokes constantly on their lips), shunning one another, seeking out those who are the most opposed to themselves, who want nothing to do with them, forgiving when rebuffed, elated when indulged; yet also brought together with their own kind by the ostracism that afflicts them, the opprobrium into which they have fallen, having finally acquired, by a persecution similar to that of Israel, the physical and moral characteristics of a race, sometimes beautiful, often ghastly, finding (despite all the ridicule that he who mixes more with, is better assimilated to the opposing race, and is relatively, on the surface, less inverted, heaps on him who has remained more so) relief in the frequentation of their own kind, a support even in their existence, so that, while denying that they are a race (the name of which is the gravest insult), they willingly unmask those who succeed in concealing that they belong to it, less in order to hurt them, to which they have no objection, than to excuse themselves, and going in search, like a doctor of appendicitis, of inversion, even in history, taking pleasure in reminding you that Socrates was one of them, just as the Israelites tell you that Jesus was a Jew, without reflecting that no one was abnormal when homosexuality was the norm, no one anti-Christian before Christ, that opprobrium alone makes the crime, for it has allowed to survive only those who were recalcitrant to all preaching, all example, all punishment, by virtue of an innate disposition so special that it repels other men more (even though it may be accompanied by lofty moral qualities) than certain vices which contradict it such as theft, cruelty, or bad faith, which are better understood and thus more readily excused by the common run of men; forming a freemasonry far more extensive, more effective and less suspected than that of the lodges, for it rests on an identity of tastes, of needs, of habits, of dangers, of apprenticeship, of knowledge, of commerce and of vocabulary, in which even the members who do not wish to know one another at once recognize one another by natural or conventional signs, whether involuntary or deliberate, which indicate to the beggar one of his own kind in the great nobleman whose carriage door he is closing, to the father in his daughter's fiancé, to the man who had wanted to be cured, or to confess, or to be defended, in the doctor or the priest or the advocate of whom he has gone in search; all of them obliged to protect their secret, yet having their share in a secret of others which the rest of humanity does not suspect and which means that for them the most improbable cloak-and-dagger stories seem true; for in this fabulous, anachronistic life, the ambassador is friends with the convict; the prince, with a certain freedom of manner lent him by his aristocratic upbringing, which no fearful petty bourgeois could have, when he comes out from the duchess, goes off to confer with the ruffian; a reprobate portion of the human collectivity, but a significant portion, suspected in places where it is not, flaunted, insolent, unpunished in places where it goes undetected; numbering adherents everywhere, among the common people, in the army, in the temple, in prison, on the throne; living finally, a great number of them at least, in a dangerous, caressing intimacy with the men of the other race, provoking them, playing with them by speaking of their vice as if it were not theirs, a game made easy by the blindness or falseness of the others, a game that may be prolonged for years up until the day of the scandal when these animal-tamers are devoured; obliged until then to keep their lives hidden, to avert their gaze from where they would like to be fixing it, to fix their gaze on what they would like to avert it from, to change the gender of many of the adjectives in their vocabulary, a small social constraint compared with the inner constraint that their vice, or what is improperly so called, imposes on them, in respect no longer of others but of themselves, and in such a way that it does not appear to them to be a vice. But some, more practical, more impatient, who do not have time to go and do their own bargaining or to give up the simplification of their lives and the saving in time that can result from co-operation, have created two societies, the second of which is made up exclusively of people like themselves.

This is striking among those who are poor and have come from the provinces, without connections, with nothing but the ambition of one day becoming a doctor or a celebrated advocate, having a mind as yet empty of opinions, and a body devoid of graces which they expect rapidly to adorn, just as, for their little room in the Latin Quarter, they would buy furniture according to what they have observed and copied among those who have already 'arrived' in the serious and useful profession in which they hope to enrol and to become famous; with these, their special proclivity, inherited without their knowing, like an aptitude for drawing, for music, or for blindness, is perhaps their one deep-rooted, despotic originality – which on certain evenings forces them to miss some meeting or other useful to their careers with people whose manner of speaking, of thinking, of dressing, of doing their hair they have on the other hand adopted. In their own neighbourhood, where they otherwise associate only with their fellow disciples, their mentors or some compatriot who has arrived and taken them under his wing, they have soon come across other young men drawn to them by the same peculiar proclivity, just as in a small town the fifth-form teacher and the notary become friends, who both love chamber music or medieval ivories; applying to the object of their hobby the same utilitarian instinct, and the same professional spirit that guides them in their careers, they meet with them at occasions to which laymen are not admitted, any more than to those which bring together connoisseurs of old snuff-boxes, Japanese prints or rare flowers, and at which, because of the pleasure of learning something new, the usefulness of the exchanges and the fear of competition, there reigns, as at a stamp market, at once the close understanding of specialists and the fierce rivalry of collectors. No one, moreover, in the café where they have their table knows what the meeting is, whether of an angling club, of sub-editors, or of sons of the Indre,[16] so correct is their costume, so cold and reserved their expression, and so guarded the only glances they dare to give at the fashionable young men, the young 'lions', who, a few yards away, are sounding off about their mistresses, and among whom those who admire them without daring to look up will learn only twenty years later, when some will be on the eve of entering an academy, and others old men in a club, that the most seductive, now a fat and greying Charlus, was in actual fact like themselves, but elsewhere, in another world, beneath other external symbols, with alien signs, the difference of which has led them into error. But these groupings are more or less advanced; and just as the 'Union des Gauches' differs from the 'Fédération socialiste'[17] and this or that Mendelssohn Society from the Schola Cantorum,[18] so on certain evenings, at another table, there are extremists who allow a bracelet to protrude from beneath their cuff, or sometimes a necklace in the opening of their collar, who, by their insistent glances, their giggling, their laughter and their mutual caresses, force a band of schoolboys to take to their heels, and who are served, with a politeness beneath which there broods indignation, by a waiter who, as on the evenings when he serves Dreyfusards, would delight in going off to fetch the police were it not to his advantage to pocket the tips.

It is to these professional organizations that the mind opposes the taste of the solitaries, and without too much artifice in one respect, since in so doing it is only imitating the solitaries themselves, who believe that nothing differs more from organized vice than what appears to them a misunderstood love, yet with some artifice nonetheless, for these different classes correspond, every bit as much as to diverse physiological types, to successive moments in a pathological or merely social evolution. Indeed, it is only very rarely that the solitaries do not, sooner or later, merge into organizations such as these, sometimes out of simple fatigue, or out of convenience (just as those who have been the most opposed to it end up installing the telephone, by receiving the Iénas or by shopping at Potin's).[19] They are generally none too well received there, however, for, in their relatively pure lives, the lack of experience, the saturation by daydreams to which they are reduced, have brought out more strongly in them those signs peculiar to effeminacy that the professionals have sought to erase. And it has to be admitted that with some of these newcomers, the woman is not merely one with the man inwardly, but hideously apparent, agitated as they are in some hysterical spasm by a shrill laugh that convulses their knees and their hands, and no more resembling the common run of men than those monkeys, with their melancholy, dark-ringed eyes and prehensile feet, which put on dinner jackets and wear a black tie; with the result that these new recruits are deemed, and by those less chaste moreover, to be compromising company, and hard of admission; they are accepted, however, and they benefit then from the facilities by which commerce, the great enterprises, have transformed the lives of individuals, have brought within reach commodities hitherto too costly to acquire or even hard to find, but which now submerge them in a plethora of what, on their own, they had been unable to discover in the largest crowds. Yet, even with these innumerable outlets, the social constraint still weighs too heavily on some, who are recruited chiefly from among those in whom no mental constraint has been exercised and who still hold their kind of love to be more uncommon than it is. Let us leave aside for the time being those who, led by the exceptional nature of their inclination to believe themselves superior to women, despise them, who make of homosexuality the privilege of great geniuses and of glorious epochs, and who, when they seek to share their taste with others, do so less with those who seem predisposed to it, as a morphinomane does with morphine, than with those who seem to them worthy of it, out of an apostolic zeal, just as others preach Zionism, conscientious objection, Saint-Simonism,[20] vegetarianism or anarchy. Some, if you come on them unawares in the morning, still in bed, display an admirable woman's head, so general is the expression and symbolic of the sex as a whole; the hair itself declares it; its inflection is so feminine, when loosened, it falls so naturally on the cheek in tresses, that you marvel that the young woman, the girl, Galatea,[21] barely awake as yet in the unconscious of this man's body in which she is imprisoned, should have been able so ingeniously, of her own accord, without having been taught by anyone, to take advantage of the humblest escape route from her prison and find what was necessary to her life. The young man whose delectable head this is doubtless does not say: 'I am a woman.' Even if – for so many possible reasons – he lives with a woman, he may deny to her that he is one, may swear that he has never had relations with a man. Let her look at him as we have just shown him, lying in a bed, in pyjamas, his arms bare, his neck bare beneath his black hair. The pyjamas have become a woman's shift, the head that of a pretty Spanish woman. The mistress is appalled by the confidences entrusted to her gaze, truer than any words could be, or even actions, and which actions moreover, if they have not done so already, will not fail to confirm, for every human being pursues his own pleasure; and if this human being is not too vicious, he seeks it in a sex opposite to his own. But for the invert vice begins, not when he establishes a relationship (for too many reasons may govern that), but when he takes his pleasure with women. The young man whom we have just tried to depict was so obviously a woman, that the women who looked longingly at him were doomed (for lack of a particular proclivity) to the same disappointment as those who, in Shakespeare's comedies, are taken in by a young girl in disguise who passes herself off as an adolescent boy. The deception is the same, the invert knows it even, he can guess at the disillusionment the woman will experience once the travesty is removed, and senses how rich a source of poetic fancy it is, this mistake over gender. Moreover, for all that he may not confess, even to his exigent mistress (unless she is a citizen of Gomorrah), 'I am a woman,' with what stratagems, and what agility, will the unconscious yet visible woman within not seek out the masculine organ, with the obstinacy of a climbing plant! You have only to look at those curly tresses against the white pillow to understand that, in the evenings, if this young man slips from his parents' fingers, in spite of them, in spite of himself, it will not be to go to meet with women. His mistress may castigate him, may turn the key on him, the next day the man-woman will have found the means of attaching himself to a man, just as the convolvulus throws out its tendrils wherever a hoe or a rake is to be found. Why, admiring in this man's face a delicacy that touches us, a grace and a natural affability such as men do not have, should we be distressed to learn that this young man seeks out boxers? These are different aspects of the one reality. And the aspect that repels us is in fact the most touching, more touching than all the delicacy, for it represents an admirable unconscious effort on the part of nature: the recognition of the sex by itself, despite that sex's deceptions, appears as the unavowed attempt to break out towards what an initial error on society's part has set far away from it. Some, those whose childhoods were the most self-conscious no doubt, hardly concern themselves with what sort of physical pleasure they receive, provided they can relate it to a masculine face. Whereas others, whose senses are no doubt more violent, give imperious localization to their physical pleasures. The confessions of these last would perhaps shock the world at large. They live less exclusively beneath the satellite of Saturn perhaps,[22] because for them women are not altogether excluded as they are for the first kind, with regard to whom they would not exist were it not for conversation, flirtation and love in the head. But the second kind seek out the women who love women, who can procure a young man for them and add to the pleasure which they get from finding themselves with him; much more, they can, in the same way, find the same pleasure with them as with a man. Whence it is that, in the case of those who love the first kind, jealousy is excited only by the pleasure they might be finding with a man and which alone seems to them a betrayal, since they have no part in the love of women, have practised it only out of habit and so as to preserve the possibility of marriage, so little picturing to themselves the pleasure it may afford that they cannot bear for the man they love to enjoy it; whereas the second kind often inspire jealousy by their love affairs with women. For in the relationships they have with them, they play the role of another woman for the women who love women, and the woman offers them at the same time more or less what they find in a man, so that the jealous friend suffers from feeling that the man he loves is inseparable from the woman who is for him almost a man, at the same time as he feels him almost escaping from him, because, for these women, he is something he does not know, a sort of woman. Let us not speak either of those young madmen who, out of a sort of childishness, in order to tease their friends or shock their parents, display a sort of fury in choosing clothes that look like dresses, in reddening their lips and blacking their eyes; let us leave them aside, for it is they whom we shall meet with again, once they have too cruelly paid the penalty for their affectation, spending a whole lifetime trying vainly to make reparation, by their severe, protestant demeanour, for the wrong they did themselves when they were carried away by the same demon that drives young women in the Faubourg Saint-Germain to live in a scandalous fashion, to break with all custom, to flout their families, up until the day when they set out perseveringly but unavailingly to reascend the slope that they had found such amusement in, or rather had been unable to stop themselves from descending. Let us leave until later finally those who have concluded a pact with Gomorrah. We shall speak of them when M. de Charlus comes to know them. Let us leave all those, of one variety or another, who will appear in their turn, and, to bring this first exposé to an end, say a word only about those of whom we began to speak a little earlier, the solitaries. Holding their vice to be more of an exception than it is, they have gone off to live on their own on the day when they discovered it, having long borne it without recognizing it, longer merely than others. For no one knows right away that he is an invert, or a poet, or a snob, or a miscreant. The schoolboy who was learning love poetry or looking at obscene pictures, if he then pressed up against a classmate, merely imagined that he was communing with him in the same desire for a woman. How could he believe that he was not like everyone else, when he recognizes the substance of what he feels in reading Mme de Lafayette, Racine, Baudelaire, Walter Scott, at a time when he is as yet too little able to observe himself to appreciate what he is adding to it of his own making, and that if the sentiment is the same its object is different, that what he desires is Rob Roy and not Diana Vernon?[23] With many of them, out of a prudent defensive instinct that precedes the clearer view of the intelligence, the mirror and walls of their room vanish beneath cheap colour prints of actresses; they write verses such as

Chloë is the one for whom I care,
She is divine, a girl so fair,
Such love for her my heart doth bear.

Must we on this account set at the beginning of these lives a taste not to be met with again in them subsequently, like the blond curls of the children who will later become the darkest? Who knows whether the photographs of women are not a beginning of hypocrisy, and a beginning also of horror for the other inverts? But the solitaries are the very ones for whom hypocrisy is painful. Perhaps even the example of the Jews, of a different colony, is not strong enough to explain how weak a hold upbringing has over them, and with what artistry they succeed in reverting, not perhaps to something as simply atrocious as suicide (to which, whatever precautions we may take, madmen revert, and, having been rescued from the river into which they had thrown themselves, take poison, procure a revolver, and so on), but to a life which not only can the men of the other race not understand or imagine, loathing its necessary pleasures, but whose frequent danger and permanent shame would fill them with horror. In order to depict them, we need perhaps to think, if not of those animals that can not be domesticated, then of lion cubs supposedly tamed yet which are lions still, or at least of blacks, who are driven to despair by the comfortable existence of whites and prefer the risks of the uncivilized life and its incomprehensible joys. The day having come when they discover themselves to be incapable at once of lying to others and of lying to themselves, they go off to live in the country, fleeing their own kind (whom they believe to be few in number) out of horror at the monstrosity or fear of temptation, and the rest of humanity out of shame. Having never achieved genuine maturity, and having lapsed into melancholy, from time to time, on a Sunday when there is no moon, they take a walk along a lane as far as a crossroads where, without a single word having passed between them, one of their childhood friends who lives in a nearby château has come to wait for them. And they take up the games of old once again, on the grass, in the darkness, without exchanging a word. During the week, they meet in one another's houses, chat about this or that, without referring to what has taken place, exactly as if they had not done anything and were never going to do anything again, except, in their dealings, for a hint of coldness, of irony, of irritability, of resentment, and sometimes of hatred. Then the neighbour leaves on an arduous journey on horseback or by mule, scaling mountain peaks and sleeping in the snow; his friend, who identifies his own vice with a weakness of temperament, with his timid, home-loving life, realizes that the vice will not be able to survive in his emancipated friend, at so many thousands of metres above sea-level. And indeed, the other gets married. The abandoned one is not cured, however (in spite of the cases in which we shall see that inversion is curable). He insists on taking in the fresh cream himself in the mornings, in his kitchen, from the hands of the dairy-boy and, on those evenings when he is too troubled by desire, he forgets himself to the extent of setting a drunkard back on his right road or straightening the blind man's blouse. No doubt the life of some inverts seems sometimes to change, and their vice (as we say) no longer shows in their habits; but nothing has been lost: a hidden jewel is recovered; when the quantity of urine decreases in an invalid, it is good that he should perspire more, but the excretion must still take place. One day this homosexual loses a young cousin, and, by his inconsolable grief, you realize that it was into this love, chaste perhaps and which had more to do with preserving esteem than obtaining possession, his desires had passed by a transference, just as, in a budget, certain expenses can be carried over into another financial year without affecting the total. As with those invalids in whom an attack of urticaria causes their habitual ailments to disappear for a time, so, in the invert, a pure love felt for a young relative seems momentarily to have replaced, by metastasis, habits that will sooner or later once again take the place of the vicarious, now cured sickness.

Meanwhile, the solitary's married neighbour has returned; faced with the beauty of the young wife and the affection shown her by her husband, on the day when the friend is obliged to invite them to dinner, he feels shame for the past. Already in an interesting condition, she has to go home early, leaving her husband behind; the latter, when the time comes to go home, asks to be taken some of the way by his friend, who is not at first touched by any suspicion but who then at the crossroads finds himself being thrown down on the grass, without a word, by the mountaineer soon to be a father. And the encounters recommence, up until the day when one of the young wife's male cousins comes and settles not far away, with whom the husband is now always going off. And should the abandoned one call and try to get close to him, the latter pushes him furiously away, indignant that the other should not have had the tact to sense the dislike he will from now on inspire. One time, however, a stranger presents himself, sent by the unfaithful neighbour; but the abandoned one is too busy and can not receive him, and realizes only afterwards with what object the stranger had come.

Then the solitary languishes alone. He has no pleasure other than going to the nearby seaside resort to ask for information from a certain railwayman. But the latter has been given promotion, and been posted to the other end of France; the solitary will no longer be able to go and ask him the times of the trains or the price of a first-class ticket, and before returning home to dream in his tower, like Griselda,[24] he lingers on the beach, like some strange Andromeda whom no Argonaut will come to deliver, like a sterile jellyfish that will perish on the sand, or else he remains idly on the platform, before the departure of the train, casting glances at the crowd of passengers that will seem indifferent, disdainful or distracted to those of another race, but which, like the brilliant luminescence with which certain insects adorn themselves to attract those of the same species, or like the nectar that certain flowers offer to attract the insects that will fertilize them, would not deceive the adept, almost impossible to find, of a pleasure too singular, too difficult to place, that is being offered to him, the confrère with whom our specialist might speak the unusual tongue; at most, some scarecrow on the platform will feign interest, but solely for material gain, like those who, at the Collège de France, in the hall where the professor of Sanskrit is speaking without any hearers, will follow the lecture, but only in order to get warm. Jellyfish! Orchid! When I was following only my own instinct, the jellyfish repelled me at Balbec; but had I known how to look at it, like Michelet,[25] from the point of view of natural history and of aesthetics, I would have seen a delectable girandole of azure. Are they not, with the transparent velvet of their petals, like the mauve orchids of the sea? Like so many creatures of the animal and vegetable kingdoms, like the plant that would produce vanilla, but which, because, in it, the male organ is divided by a septum from the female organ, remains sterile unless humming-birds or certain small bees transport the pollen from one to the other, or unless man fertilizes them artificially, M. de Charlus (and here the word fertilization must be taken in its moral sense, since in the physical sense the union of male with male is sterile, but it matters that an individual should be able to meet with the one pleasure he is capable of enjoying, and that 'here below every soul' can give someone 'its music, its flame or its fragrance'),[26] M. de Charlus was one of those men who may be called exceptional, because, however numerous they may be, the satisfaction, so simple with others, of their sexual needs depends on the coincidence of too many conditions, too difficult to encounter. For men like M. de Charlus (allowance being made for the accommodations that will gradually appear and of which a hint may already have been given, demanded by the need for pleasure that resigns itself to a half-consent), a mutual love adds to the very great, at times insurmountable, difficulties it encounters among the common run of individuals, ones of its own so particular that what is always very rare for anyone at all becomes in their case almost impossible, and should a truly happy encounter transpire, or one that nature makes to seem so, their happiness, far more even than that of the normal lover, has something extraordinary, something selective, something profoundly necessary about it. The hatred of the Montagus and the Capulets[27] was as nothing compared with the impediments of every kind that have been overcome, the special eliminations to which nature must have subjected the already far from common chances that lead on to love, before a former maker of waistcoats, who had been anticipating setting quietly off for his office, should reel about, bedazzled, in front of a fifty-year-old man with a pot belly. This Romeo and this Juliet have good cause to believe that their love is not a momentary whim, but truly predestined, prepared for by the harmonies of their temperament, and not only by their own temperament but by that of their forebears, of their most remote heredity, so that the fellow-creature now conjoined to them belongs to them from before birth, has attracted them by a force comparable to that which governs the worlds in which we have spent our previous lives. M. de Charlus had distracted me from looking to see whether the bumble-bee had brought the orchid the pollen it had been awaiting for so long, and that it had the good fortune to receive only thanks to a chance so improbable it might be called a sort of miracle. But it was a miracle also which I had just witnessed, of almost the same kind, and no less marvellous. As soon as I had considered the encounter from this point of view, everything about it seemed imbued with beauty. The most extraordinary stratagems that nature has invented to force insects to ensure the fertilization of flowers which could otherwise not be so, for the male flower is too far removed from the female flower, or that which, if it is the wind that must ensure the transporting of the pollen, makes it much easier to detach from the male flower and much simpler for the female flower to trap it as it passes, by suppressing the secretion of the nectar, which is no longer of use since there are no insects to attract, and even the brilliance of the corollas that attract them, and the stratagem which, so that the flower may be reserved for the pollen it requires, which can fructify in it alone, causes it to secrete a liquid that immunizes it against other pollens – seemed to me no more marvellous than the existence of the sub-variety of inverts destined to ensure the pleasures of love to the invert who is growing old: of the men who are attracted, not by all men, but – through a phenomenon of correspondence and of harmony comparable to those that govern the fertilization of such heterostyled, trimorphic flowers as Lythrum salicaria – only by men much older than themselves. Jupien had just offered me an example of this sub-variety, though one less striking than others which any human herborist, any moral botanist, will be able to observe, despite their rarity, and which will present them with a frail young man awaiting the advances of a robust, pot-bellied fifty-year-old, and remaining indifferent to the advances of other young men, just as the short-styled hermaphroditic flowers of Primula veris remain sterile for as long as they are being fertilized only by other likewise short-styled Primula veris, whereas they welcome with delight the pollen from the long-styled Primula veris.[28] Where M. de Charlus was concerned, however, I came to realize subsequently that for him there were various kinds of conjunction, certain of which, by their multiplicity, their barely perceptible instantaneity, and especially the absence of contact between the two agents, were even more reminiscent of those flowers which in a garden are fertilized by the pollen from a neighbouring flower that they will never touch. There were indeed certain individuals that he found it enough to have come to him, and to hold them for a few hours under the sway of his tongue, for the desire kindled in him by some encounter to be appeased. Merely with words the conjunction was made, as easily as may happen among the Infusoria. On occasions, as had no doubt transpired in my own case on the evening when I had been summoned by him after the Guermantes dinner-party, assuagement came about thanks to a violent dressing-down cast by the Baron into his visitor's face, just as certain flowers, thanks to a spring-mechanism, spray the unconsciously complicit, disconcerted insect from a distance. M. de Charlus had passed from being the dominated to the dominator, and, feeling himself calmed and purged of his anxiety, dismissed the visitor he had at once ceased to find desirable. Finally, inversion itself arising from the fact that the invert approximates too closely to a woman to be able to have useful relations with her, it is thereby linked to a higher law which means that so many hermaphroditic flowers remain infertile, that is to the sterility of self-fertilization. It is true that inverts in search of a male are often content with an invert as effeminate as themselves. But it is enough that they should not belong to the feminine sex, of which they have inside them an embryo they are unable to make use of, as occurs with so many hermaphroditic flowers and even certain hermaphroditic animals, like the snail, which cannot be fertilized by themselves, but can be so by other hermaphrodites. Hence inverts, who readily link themselves to the ancient East or the golden age of Greece, might go further back still, to those experimental epochs when neither dioecious flowers or unisexual animals existed, to that initial hermaphroditism of which a few rudimentary male organs in the female anatomy and female organs in the male anatomy appear to conserve the trace.[29] I found the mimicry of Jupien and M. de Charlus, incomprehensible to me at the outset, as curious as those gestures of enticement addressed to insects, according to Darwin, by the flowers known as composites, which raise the florets of their capitula so as to be seen from further away, like a certain heterostyled flower which turns its stamens over and arches them in order to clear a path for insects, or which offers them an ablution, or quite simply, like the fragrance of the nectar, the brilliance of its corollas, which were at that very moment attracting insects into the courtyard. From that day forward, M. de Charlus was to alter the time of his visits to Mme de Villeparisis, not that he would have been unable to meet Jupien elsewhere, and more conveniently, but, just as they were for me, the afternoon sunlight and the flowering shrub were no doubt linked to his memory. He did not content himself, moreover, with recommending the Jupiens to Mme de Villeparisis, to the Duchesse de Guermantes and to a whole brilliant clientèle who were all the more attentive to the young embroideress inasmuch as the few ladies who had resisted or merely taken their time were the object of terrible reprisals on the part of the Baron, either so that they might serve as an example, or because they had excited his fury and stood up against his efforts at domination. He made Jupien's position more and more lucrative until finally he took him on as a secretary and set him up in the conditions in which we shall meet him later on. 'Oh, that Jupien's one very lucky man,' said Françoise, who had a tendency to play down or to exaggerate kindnesses according to whether they were shown to her or to others. This time, however, she had no need to exaggerate nor, moreover, did she feel any envy, being genuinely fond of Jupien. 'Oh, the Baron's such a good man, she added, so respectable, so devout, so correct! If I had a daughter to marry off, and came from the world of the rich, I'd give her to the Baron with my eyes shut. – But Françoise,' said my mother gently, she'd have lots of husbands, that daughter. Remember, you already promised her to Jupien. – Oh heavens, so I did, answered Françoise, the fact is he's someone else who'd make a woman very happy. It's all very well there being rich and dirt poor, that doesn't make you what you are. The Baron and Jupien, they're two of a kind right enough.'

Faced by this initial revelation, I had greatly exaggerated the elective nature of so selective a conjunction. True, each of the men of M. de Charlus's kind is an extraordinary creature, since, if he makes no concessions to life's possibilities, he searches essentially for the love of a man of the other race, that is of a man who loves women (and who in consequence will not be able to love him); contrary to what I believed in the courtyard, where I had just seen Jupien circling around M. de Charlus like the orchid making advances to the bumble-bee, these exceptional beings for whom we feel pity are legion, as we shall see in the course of the present work, for a reason that will be disclosed only at the end, and they complain themselves of being too many rather than too few. For the two angels who were posted at the gates of Sodom to learn whether its inhabitants, says Genesis, had done every one of the things report of which had risen as far as the Eternal, had been, and we can but rejoice at the fact, very ill chosen by the Lord God, who ought to have entrusted the task only to a Sodomist. He would not have been led benevolently to lower the flaming sword or temper the sanctions by the excuses, 'Father of six children, I have two mistresses, etc.' He would have answered: 'Yes, and your wife suffers the torments of jealousy. But even if these women were not chosen by you in Gomorrah, you spend your nights with a keeper of flocks from Hebron.' And he would immediately have made him retrace his steps towards the town about to be destroyed by the rain of fire and brimstone. On the contrary, all the shameful Sodomists were allowed to flee, even if, on catching sight of a young boy, they looked away, like Lot's wife, without thereby being turned as she was into pillars of salt.[30] With the result that they had a numerous posterity, among whom this gesture has remained habitual, like that of those debauched women who, while appearing to stare at a display of shoes in a shop window, look round at a student. These descendants of the Sodomists, so numerous that another verse of Genesis may be applied to them, 'So that if a man be able to number the dust of the earth, so thy seed also shall be numbered,'[31] have established themselves over the whole earth, they have had access to all the professions and gain admission so readily to the most exclusive clubs that, when a sodomist is not admitted, the black balls are in the majority those of the sodomists, but who take care to incriminate sodomy, having inherited the lie that enabled their ancestors to leave the accursed city. It is possible that they will return there one day. Certainly, they form in every country a colony at once Oriental, cultivated, musical and slanderous, which has charming virtues and unbearable defects. A more thorough picture of them will emerge in the course of the ensuing pages, but I have wanted provisionally to forestall the fatal error that would consist, just as a Zionist movement has been encouraged, in creating a sodomist movement and in rebuilding Sodom. But, no sooner arrived there and the sodomists would be leaving the town so as to appear not to belong to it, would take a wife, would keep mistresses in other cities where they would find, moreover, all the appropriate amusements. They would go to Sodom only on days of supreme necessity, when their own town would be empty, at those times when hunger brings the wolf out from the woods, that is to say that everything would proceed in sum as in London, Berlin, Rome, Petrograd[32] or Paris.

At all events, on that particular day, before my visit to the Duchesse, I was not thinking so far ahead and was distressed at having, by attending to the Jupien–Charlus conjunction, perhaps missed the fertilization of the flower by the bumble-bee.

PART II

CHAPTER 1

M. de Charlus in society – A doctor – Characteristic face of Mme de Vaugoubert – Mme d'Arpajon, the Hubert Robert fountain and the merriment of Grand-Duke Vladimir – Mme d'Amoncourt, Mme de Citri, Mme de Saint-Euverte, etc – Curious conversation between Swann and the Prince de Guermantes – Albertine on the telephone – Visits while awaiting my second and last stay in Balbec – Arrival in Balbec – Jealousy with regard to Albertine – The intermittences of the heart.

As I was not in any hurry to arrive at the Guermantes soirée, to which I was not certain of having been invited, I whiled away the time outside; but the summer daylight seemed in no greater haste to move than I was. Although it was after nine o'clock, the daylight it was still which, on the place de la Concorde, had given to the Luxor obelisk an appearance of pink nougat. Then it modified the tint and turned it into a metallic substance, with the result that the obelisk did not merely become more precious, but seemed thinner and almost flexible. You fancied that you might have been able to twist it, that this jewel had already been bent slightly out of true perhaps. The moon was in the sky now like a quarter of orange, delicately peeled but with a small bite out of it. Later it would be made of the most resistant gold. Huddled all alone behind it, a poor little star was about to serve as the solitary moon's one companion, while the latter, even as it shielded its friend, but more daring and going on ahead, would brandish, like an irresistible weapon, like a symbol of the Orient, its marvellous, ample golden cresent.

In front of the Princesse de Guermantes's hôtel, I met the Duc de Châtellerault; I no longer remembered that half an hour before I was still haunted by the fear – which was soon indeed to take hold of me again – of coming without having been invited. We feel uneasy, and it is sometimes long after the moment of danger, forgotten thanks to our distraction, that we remember our unease. I said good day to the young Duc and made my way into the house. But here I must first note a trifling circumstance which will enable a fact that will follow shortly to be understood.

On that, as on the preceding evenings, there was someone who had the Duc de Châtellerault very much on his mind, without, however, suspecting who he was: this was Mme de Guermantes's doorman (known in those days as the 'barker'). M. de Châtellerault, very far from being an intimate – as he was of the cousins – of the Princesse, was being received in her drawing-room for the first time. His parents, who had quarrelled with her ten years ago, had made it up two weeks ago, and, obliged to be away from Paris on that evening, had asked their son to stand in for them. Now, a few days before, the Princesse's doorman had met a young man in the Champs-Elysées whom he had thought charming but whose identity he had been unable to establish. Not that the young man had not proved as amiable as he was generous. All the favours that the doorman had imagined having to grant so young a gentleman, he had, on the contrary, received. But M. de Châtellerault was as cowardly as he was imprudent; he was the more determined not to discover his incognito inasmuch as he did not know whom he had to deal with; he would have felt an even greater fear – though ill-founded – had he known. He had merely passed himself off as an Englishman, and to all the doorman's impassioned questions, who was eager to see someone to whom he was indebted for so much pleasure and largesse again, the Duc had merely answered in English, all the way along the Avenue Gabriel, 'I do not speak French.'

Although in spite of everything – because of his cousin's maternal origins – the Duc de Guermantes affected to find something a trifle Courvoisier-like[1] about the Princesse de Guermantes-Bavière's salon, the general verdict on that lady's spirit of initiative and intellectual superiority was based on an innovation not to be met with anywhere else in those circles. After dinner, and whatever the importance of the rout that was to follow, the seats, at the Princesse de Guermantes's, were arranged in such a manner that you formed small groups, which, if need be, had their backs to one another. The Princesse would then mark her social sense by going and sitting in one of these, as if from preference. She was not afraid, however, of selecting and calling on a member of another group. If, for example, she had remarked to M. Detaille,[2] who had naturally agreed, what a pretty neck Mme de Villemur had, whose position in another group showed her from behind, the Princesse did not hesitate to raise her voice: 'Madame de Villemur, M. Detaille, great painter that he is, is busy admiring your neck.' Mme de Villemur understood this as a direct invitation to join in the conversation; with an agility born of her hours in the saddle, she caused her chair slowly to pivot through an arc of three-quarters of a circle and, without the least disturbance to her neighbours, sit almost facing the Princesse. 'You don't know M. Detaille?' asked her hostess, for whom her guest's skilful but modest about-face was not enough. 'I don't know him, but I know his work,' replied Mme de Villemur, with a winning and respectful expression, and an aptness that many envied, even as she was directing an imperceptible nod at the celebrated painter, her being summoned not having amounted to a formal introduction to him. 'Come, Monsieur Detaille,' said the Princesse, 'I'm going to introduce you to Mme de Villemur.' The latter then showed as much ingenuity in making room for the author of The Dream[3] as a little earlier in turning towards him. And the Princesse brought a chair forward for herself; indeed, she had summoned Mme de Villemur only so as to have a pretext for leaving the first group, where she had spent the regulation ten minutes, and granting an equal duration of her presence to a second. Within three-quarters of an hour, all of the groups had received her visit, which seemed every time to result from a sudden inspiration or a predilection, but which had the object above all of throwing into relief how naturally 'a great lady knows how to entertain'. But now the guests at the soirée were starting to arrive and the hostess had taken her seat not far from the entrance – erect and haughty, in her quasi-royal majesty, her eyes ablaze with their own incandescence – between two plain-looking Highnesses and the Spanish Ambassadress.

I lined up behind several guests who had arrived ahead of me. Facing me I had the Princesse, whose beauty, among so many others, is no doubt not the only one to remind me of that particular party. But our hostess's face was so perfect, had been struck like some beautiful medal, that for me it has preserved a commemorative value. The Princesse was in the habit of saying to her guests, when she met them a few days before one of her soirées: 'You will come, won't you?', as if she felt a strong desire to talk with them. But since, on the contrary, she had nothing to say to them, the moment they arrived in front of her, she contented herself, without getting up, with breaking off for a moment from her vacuous conversation with the two Highnesses and the Ambassadress to thank them, by saying, 'It's kind of you to come,' not because she thought that the guest had given proof of kindness by coming, but in order to enhance even further her own; then at once throwing him back into the river, she would add: 'You'll find M. de Guermantes at the door into the gardens,' so that you went off visiting and left her in peace. To some even she said nothing, contenting herself with displaying her admirable onyx eyes, as if you had come merely to an exhibition of precious stones.

The first person to go in ahead of me was the Duc de Châtellerault.

Needing to respond to all the smiles, all the waved greetings that came to him from the drawing-room, he had not noticed the doorman. But the doorman had recognized him from the very first moment. In a moment, he was going to know the identity he had so longed to learn. As he asked his 'Englishman' of two days before what name he should announce, the doorman was not merely moved, he judged himself to be indiscreet, tactless. He seemed to be about to reveal to all the world (who would suspect nothing, however) a secret that he was guilty of having uncovered in this way and of broadcasting publicly. On hearing the guest's reply, 'the Duc de Châtellerault', he felt so overcome by pride that he remained speechless for a moment. The Duc looked at him, recognized him, saw himself ruined, as the manservant meanwhile, who had regained control of himself and knew his armorial well enough to complete for himself an over-modest designation, shouted out with a professional vigour, mellowed by an intimate tenderness: 'His Highness Monseigneur the Duc de Châtellerault – But now it was my turn to be announced. Absorbed in contemplation of our hostess, who had not yet seen me, I had not reflected on the functions, terrible for me – though in another way than for M. de Châtellerault – of this doorman, clad in black like an executioner and surrounded by a troop of footmen in the most cheerful liveries, lusty fellows ready to lay hands on an intruder and show him the door. The doorman asked my name, and I gave it to him as mechanically as a condemned man allowing himself to be attached to the block. He at once raised his head majestically and, before I had been able to beg him to keep his voice down when announcing me so as to spare my amour propre if I had not been invited, and that of the Princesse de Guermantes if I had been, he shouted out the disquieting syllables with a force capable of causing the roof of the house to vibrate.

The illustrious Huxley (he whose nephew currently occupies a preponderant place in the English literary world) [4] recounts how one of his patients no longer dared go into society because often, in the very chair that was being politely indicated to her, she could see an elderly gentleman sitting. She was quite sure that either the gesture of invitation, or the presence of the elderly gentleman, was a hallucination, for they would not have been showing her to a chair that was already occupied. When Huxley, in order to cure her, forced her to return to a reception, she experienced a moment of painful hesitation wondering whether the hospitable sign they made to her was the real thing, or whether, in order to obey a non-existent vision, she was about to sit down in public on the knees of a flesh-and-blood gentleman. Her brief uncertainty was cruel. Less so perhaps than my own. From the moment I heard my own name being roared out, like the sound preceding a possible cataclysm, I had, so as at all events to plead my good faith and as if I were not tormented by any doubts, to advance towards the Princesse with a resolute air.

She caught sight of me when I was a few feet away and, what left me no longer in any doubt that I had been the victim of a conspiracy, instead of remaining seated as for the other guests, she got up and came towards me. A second later, I was able to heave the sigh of relief of Huxley's patient when, having made up her mind to sit down on the chair, she found it was unoccupied and realized that it was the elderly gentleman who was a hallucination. The Princesse had just held out her hand to me with a smile. She stayed standing for a few moments, with the kind of graciousness peculiar to the stanza in Malherbe which ends: 'Et pour leur faire honneur les Anges se lever.'[5]

She apologized for the fact that the Duchesse had not yet arrived, as though without her I must be bored. In order to thus bid me welcome, she performed about me, holding me by the hand, a very graceful pirouette, in whose vortex I felt swept away. I was almost expecting her then to hand me, like the leader of a cotillion, an ivory-knobbed cane or a wristwatch. Truth to tell, she gave me nothing like that but as if, rather than dancing the Boston, she had been listening to a sacrosanct Beethoven quartet, the sublime strains of which she was afraid of disturbing, she halted the conversation there, or rather did not begin it, and, still radiant from having seen me enter, merely informed me of where the Prince was to be found.

I moved away and did not dare approach her again, sensing that she had absolutely nothing to say to me and that in her immense good-will, this marvellously tall and beautiful woman, noble as so many great ladies were who mounted the scaffold with such pride, could only, not daring to offer me some melissa cordial, have repeated what she had already twice told me: 'You'll find the Prince in the garden.' But to go up to the Prince was to feel my doubts revive in a different form.

At all events, someone had to be found to present me. Dominating every conversation could be heard the inexhaustible prattle of M. de Charlus, who was talking with His Excellency the Duc de Sidonia, whose acquaintance he had just made. As profession recognizes profession, so, too, does vice. M. de Charlus and M. de Sidonia had each immediately nosed out that of the other, which was, for both, to be, when in company, monologuists, to the extent of being unable to bear any interruption. Having at once adjudged that the malady was without remedy, as a famous sonnet has it,[6] they had made a resolve, not to stay silent, but each to speak without concerning himself with what the other would say. This had created that jumble of sound which, in Molière's comedies, is produced by several people saying different things at one and the same time. The Baron, with his resonant voice, was certain in any case of having the better of it, of drowning out the feeble voice of M. de Sidonia, without discouraging the latter, however, for, whenever M. de Charlus drew breath for a moment, the interval was filled by the susurration of the Spanish grandee, who had imperturbably continued discoursing. I might well have asked M. de Charlus to present me to the Prince de Guermantes, but I was afraid (with only too good reason) that he might be angry with me. I had behaved towards him in the most ungrateful fashion in not taking him up on his offer for a second time and in not showing him any sign of life since the evening when he had seen me home so affectionately. Yet I had certainly not had as an anticipated excuse the scene that I had just witnessed, that very afternoon, taking place between Jupien and him. I had suspected nothing of the sort. It is true that a little time before, when my parents were reproaching me for my laziness and for not having yet taken the trouble of dropping M. de Charlus a line, I had reproached them furiously for wanting to make me accept dishonourable propositions. But anger alone, and the desire to find the words that would be most disagreeable to them, had dictated this untruthful reply. In actual fact, I had not imagined there to have been anything sensual, or even sentimental, in the Baron's offers. I had said that to my parents out of sheer foolishness. But the future sometimes dwells in us without our knowing it, and the words thought to be untruthful describe an imminent reality.

M. de Charlus would no doubt have forgiven me my lack of gratitude. But what made him furious was that my presence that evening at the Princesse de Guermantes', as for some little time past at her cousin's, seemed to make a mockery of his solemn declaration: 'The only entrée to those salons is through me.' A grave fault, an inexpiable crime perhaps: I had not followed the hierarchical path. M. de Charlus well knew that the thunderbolts that he brandished at those who did not submit to his commands, or to whom he had taken a strong dislike, were beginning to pass, in the eyes of many, and however much fury he put into them, for thunderbolts of cardboard, and no longer had the strength to expel anyone from anywhere. But perhaps he thought that his power, although diminished, was still great and remained intact in the eyes of a novice such as myself. So I did not consider it the wisest course to ask a service of him at a party where my mere presence seemed like an ironic challenge to his pretensions.

At which moment I was stopped by a somewhat vulgar man, Professor E. He had been surprised to see me at the Guermantes'. I was no less so to find him there, for never before, and never again subsequently, had a person of his sort been seen at the Princesse's. He had just cured the Prince, who had already received the last rites, of an infectious pneumonia, and the very particular gratitude that Mme de Guermantes felt towards him for this was the reason why they had broken with custom and invited him. Since he knew absolutely no one in these drawing-rooms and could not prowl about there indefinitely on his own like a minister of death, having recognized me, he had felt that, for the first time in his life, he had infinitely many things to say to me, which enabled him to keep in countenance and was one of the reasons why he had come towards me. There was a second reason. He attached great importance to never being mistaken in a diagnosis. Now so many letters did he receive that he could not always remember clearly, when he had only seen a patient once, whether the illness had indeed followed the course he had assigned to it. It has not been forgotten perhaps that at the time of my grandmother's stroke, I had taken her round to him on the evening when he was having all those decorations sewn on. Some time having elapsed, he no longer remembered the announcement he had been sent at the time. 'Madame your grandmother is indeed dead, is she not?' he said to me, in a voice in which near-certainty had stilled a slight apprehensiveness. 'Ah, indeed! Anyway, from the very first moment I saw her, my prognosis was altogether gloomy, I remember very well.'

Thus it was that Professor E. learned or relearned of my grandmother's death, and I have to say to his credit, which is that of the medical body as a whole, without manifesting, or perhaps feeling, any satisfaction. The mistakes of doctors are innumerable. They err as a rule out of optimism as to the treatment, and pessimism as to the outcome. 'Wine? In moderation it can't do you any harm, it's a tonic when all's said and done… Physical pleasure? It's a function after all. I permit it but not to be overdone, you understand. Excess of any kind is a mistake.' What a temptation all of a sudden for the patient to give up those two resuscitators, water and chastity! If, on the other hand, you have a heart or an albumen problem, or something of the kind, then there is not long to go. Grave, but functional, troubles are readily ascribed to an imaginary cancer. There is no point in keeping on with visits that could never stay an ineluctable disease. Should the patient, left to his own devices, now impose an implacable regimen on himself, and then be cured or at the very least survive, the doctor, greeted by him in the avenue de l' Opéra when he thought him long since in the Père-Lachaise, will see in this tipping of the hat a gesture of sarcastic insolence. An innocent walk taken under his very nose would arouse no greater fury in the Assize Court judge who, two years before, had pronounced sentence of death on the seemingly fearless stroller. Doctors (this does not apply to all of them, naturally, and I do not omit, mentally, some admirable exceptions) are in general more disgruntled, more irritated by the quashing of their verdict than joyful at its execution. Which explains why Professor E., whatever intellectual satisfaction he will have felt no doubt at finding he had not been mistaken, was able to to speak only with sadness of the misfortune that had struck us. He was not keen to cut short the conversation, which was keeping him in countenance and was a reason for staying. He spoke to me of the heat-wave we had been having in recent days but, although he was literate and could have expressed himself in good French, he said: 'This hyperthermia doesn't upset you?' The fact is that medicine has made some small progress in knowledge since Molière, but none in its vocabulary. My interlocutor added: 'What you need to do is to avoid the sudations weather like this causes, especially in overheated drawing-rooms. You can remedy them, when you return home and want something to drink, by heat' (which means, obviously, hot drinks).

Because of the manner of my grandmother's death, the subject interested me and I had recently read in a book by a great scientist that perspiration harmed the kidneys by causing what should issue elsewhere to pass through the skin. I had deplored the canicular weather during which my grandmother died and had come close to holding it responsible. I made no mention of this to Doctor E. but he said without being prompted: 'The advantage of this very hot weather, when perspiration is very abundant, is that the kidney is correspondingly relieved.' Medicine is not an exact science.

Now that he had hold of me, Professor E. asked only not to leave me. But I had just caught sight, making deep bows to the Princesse de Guermantes to left and to right, having taken a step backwards, of the Marquis de Vaugoubert. M. de Norpois had recently introduced me to him and I hoped that in him I would find someone capable of presenting me to our host. The proportions of the present work do not allow me to explain here the incidents during his youth in consequence of which M. de Vaugoubert was one of the few men (perhaps the only man) in society who found himself in what is known in Sodom as 'confidence' with M. de Charlus.[7] But if our minister to King Theodosius had some of the same faults as the Baron, they ranked as no more than the palest reflections of them. It was only in an infinitely milder, sentimental and simple-minded form that he displayed those alternations between sympathy and loathing through which the desire to charm and then the fear – equally imaginary – of being, if not despised then at least discovered, caused the Baron to pass. M. de Vaugoubert nonetheless displayed these alternations, but rendered absurd by a chastity, a 'platonism' (to which, highly ambitious as he was, he had, ever since the days of the Foreign Office examination, sacrificed all pleasure), above all by his intellectual nullity. But whereas, in M. de Charlus's case, immoderate praises were trumpeted in a veritable sunburst of eloquence, and salted with the subtlest, most mordant raillery, which marked a man for ever, with M. de Vaugoubert, on the contrary, sympathy was expressed with the banality of an utter mediocrity, a man of the fashionable world and a functionary, and his grievances (generally a complete invention, as with the Baron) by a malevolence that was untiring but mindless and all the more shocking in that it was usually in contradiction of remarks the minister had been making six months earlier and would perhaps be making again before very long: a regularity of change that lent an almost astronomical poetry to the various phases of M. de Vaugoubert's life, even though, this aside, no one could have put one less in mind of a heavenly body.

The 'good evening' that he returned had nothing of that which M. de Charlus would have wished me. To this 'good evening', M. de Vaugoubert lent, apart from the high ceremoniousness he thought to be that of society and of diplomacy, a jaunty, brisk, smiling tone, so as to seem, on the one hand, overjoyed by life – whereas inwardly he was brooding over the setbacks to a career lacking in promotion and in danger of ending in a forced retirement – and on the other hand, young, virile and charming, though he could see, and no longer dared even to go and inspect in his mirror, the wrinkles forming on the outlying parts of a face all of whose seductiveness he would have liked to have preserved. It was not that he would have wished for actual conquests, the mere thought of which frightened him on account of hearsay, of scandal and of blackmail. Having gone from an almost infantile debauchery to absolute continence on the day his thoughts turned to the Quai d'Orsay[8] and the desire to make a great career, he wore the look of a caged beast, casting glances in all directions expressive of fear, craving and stupidity. His own was such that he did not pause to consider that the street boys of his adolescence were no longer children and that, when a newspaper seller yelled 'La Presse!'[9] into his face, he shuddered in terror more even than in desire, believing he had been recognized and tracked down.

But, failing the pleasures sacrificed to an ungrateful Quai d'Orsay, M. de Vaugoubert – and it was on this account that he would have liked still to be found attractive – had sudden impulses of the heart. God knows with how many letters he had pestered the Ministry, what personal stratagems he had deployed, and how many times he had drawn on the credit of Mme de Vaugoubert (who, because of her corpulence, her high birth, her masculine look and especially because of the mediocrity of her husband, was thought to be endowed with superior qualities and fulfilling the true functions of the minister) in order, for no valid reason, to get a young man entirely devoid of merit taken on to the staff of the legation. It is true that, a few months or a few years later, should this insignificant attaché have appeared to show, without the least hint of any evil intent, signs of coldness towards his chief, the latter, believing himself despised or betrayed, devoted the same hysterical ardour to punishing him as once to gratifying him. He moved heaven and earth to get him recalled, and the Director of Political Affairs would receive a letter daily: 'What is keeping you from getting rid of this fellow for me? Give him a bit of a talking-to, for his own good. What he needs is to be given a really hard time of it.' For which reason the post of attaché to the court of King Theodosius was far from pleasant. But in every other respect, thanks to his perfect good sense as a man of the world, M. de Vaugoubert was one of the French government's best representatives abroad. When, later on, a supposedly superior man, a Jacobin,[10] well-informed in every sphere, replaced him, war was not long in breaking out between France and the country ruled over by the King.

Like M. de Charlus, M. de Vaugoubert did not like to be the first to greet one. Both preferred to 'respond', forever fearful of the rumours that the person to whom they would otherwise have held out their hand might have heard on their account since they last saw him. In my own case, M. de Vaugoubert did not have to ask himself the question, for in fact I had gone to greet him first, if only because of the difference in age. He answered me with a wondering and delighted look, his two eyes continuing to jump about as if there were forbidden clover to be grazed on either side. I thought it proper to solicit from him my introduction to Mme de Vaugoubert before that to the Prince, about which I was counting on speaking to him only afterwards. The idea of bringing me into contact with his wife appeared to fill him with joy for himself, as for her, and he led me with resolute steps towards the Marquise. Arriving in front of her, and indicating me with both his hand and his eyes, with every possible mark of consideration, he remained nonetheless without speaking and after a few seconds withdrew, with a fidgety look, so as to leave me alone with his wife. The latter had at once held out her hand to me, but without knowing to whom this mark of affability was being addressed, for I realized that M. de Vaugoubert had forgotten what my name was, had perhaps not recognized me even, and not wanting, out of politeness, to admit it, had made the introduction consist of pure pantomime. So I was no further advanced; how to get myself presented to our host by a woman who did not know my name? Moreover, I found myself forced to talk for a few moments with Mme de Vaugoubert. This annoyed me from two points of view. I had no wish to remain for ever at this party, for I had arranged with Albertine (I had given her a box for Phèdre) [11] that she would come and see me a little before midnight. It is true that I was not in love with her; by getting her to come that evening I was obeying a wholly sensual desire, even though we were in that torrid season of the year when a liberated sensuality is more ready to visit the organs of taste and seeks coolness above all. More than for the kiss of a girl, it thirsts for an orangeade or for a bath, or to gaze indeed on that peeled and juicy moon that was quenching the thirst of the sky. But I was counting on ridding myself at Albertine's side – who brought back for me, moreover, the coolness of the waves – of the regrets I could not fail to be left with by so many charming faces (for the soirée the Princesse was giving was for girls as well as ladies). There was nothing attractive, on the other hand, about the morose Bourbon face of the imposing Mme de Vaugoubert.

It was said at the Ministry, without the least hint of malice, that, in this ménage, it was the husband who wore the skirts and the wife the breeches. Now there was more truth in this than they thought. Mme de Vaugoubert was a man. Whether she had always been one, or had become what I now saw her to be, hardly matters, for in either case we are dealing with one of nature's most touching miracles, whereby, in the second case especially, the human kingdom is made to resemble the kingdom of flowers. On the first hypothesis – whether the future Mme de Vaugoubert had always been so heavily mannish – nature, by a stratagem both diabolical and beneficent, gives to the young girl the deceptive aspect of a man. And the adolescent male who does not like women and wishes to be cured lights with joy on this subterfuge, of discovering a fiancée who for him is the embodiment of a market porter. In the contrary case, if the woman does not to start with have masculine characteristics, she gradually acquires them in order to please her husband, unconsciously even, by that sort of mimeticism whereby certain flowers give themselves the appearance of the insects they seek to attract. The regret she feels at not being loved, at not being a man, virilizes her. Even aside from the case that concerns us, who has not observed how many of the most normal couples end up resembling one another, sometimes even by exchanging their good qualities? A former German Chancellor, the Prince von Bülow, had married an Italian woman.[12] In due course, on the Pincio, it was remarked how much Italian delicacy the German husband had acquired, and how much German coarseness the Italian princess. To move out to a point eccentric to the laws we are tracing, everyone knows of an eminent French diplomat whose origin was recalled only by his name, one of the most illustrious in the East.[13] As he matured, as he aged, the Oriental whom no one had ever suspected was revealed, and on seeing him you regretted the absence of the fez that would have been the crowning touch.

To come back to habits wholly unknown to the ambassador whose ancestrally padded silhouette we have just evoked, Mme de Vaugoubert embodied the type, acquired or predestined, the immortal image of which is the Princesse Palatine, forever in her riding habit and who, having taken more from her husband than his virility, and espousing the defects of the men who do not like women, denounces in her gossipy letters the mutual dealings of all the great noblemen at the court of Louis XIV.[14] One of the factors that further accentuate the masculine appearance of women such as Mme de Vaugoubert is that the neglect they are left in by their husbands, and the shame that they feel, casts a gradual blight on everything womanly in them. In the end they acquire the virtues and defects that the husband does not have. As he grows more frivolous, more effeminate and more indiscreet, they become the charmless effigy as it were of the virtues that the husband ought to be practising.

Traces of opprobrium, annoyance and indignation had clouded Mme de Vaugoubert's regular features. I felt, alas, that she looked on me with interest and curiosity as one of the young men who appealed to M. de Vaugoubert, and whom she would have so much liked to be now that her ageing husband preferred youth. She looked at me with the attentiveness of those provincial women who copy out of a fashion catalogue the tailored dress that looks so well on the pretty young person in the drawing (the same one on every page in point of fact, but illusorily multiplied into different individuals thanks to the difference in the poses and the variety of outfits). The vegetable attraction that drove Mme de Vaugoubert towards me was so strong that she went so far as to seize hold of my arm so that I might take her to drink a glass of orangeade. But I freed myself on the pretext that, on the point of leaving as I was, I had not yet had myself presented to our host.

The distance separating me from the entrance to the gardens where he stood talking to one or two people was not very great. But it made me more afraid than if, in order to cross it, I had had to expose myself to a running fire.

Many women by whom I fancied I might be able to get myself presented were in the garden, where, even as they feigned an impassioned admiration, they hardly knew what to do with themselves. Parties of this kind are generally anticipated. They scarcely become real until the next day, when they occupy the attention of the people who were not invited. If, on reading the article of a critic who has always evinced the greatest admiration for him, a true writer, devoid of the foolish amour propre of so many literary people, finds the name of second-rate authors listed but not his own, he does not have time to dwell on what might for him be cause for astonishment: his books reclaim him. But a society woman has nothing to do and, on discovering in the Figaro: 'Yesterday the Prince and Princesse de Guermantes gave a grand soirée, etc.,' she exclaims: 'What! I talked, three days ago, for an hour with Marie-Gilbert, without her so much as mentioning it!' and she racks her brains wondering what she might have done to the Guermantes. It has to be said that where the Princesse's parties were concerned, the surprise was sometimes as great among those who were invited as those who were not. For they exploded at the very moment when they were least expected, and sent a summons to people whom Mme de Guermantes had been neglecting for years. And almost all society people are so insignificant that each of their peers judges them only according to their degree of friendliness, cherishes them if invited, detests them if excluded. In the case of these last, if, indeed, the Princesse, even though they were among her friends, did not invite them, this often arose from her fear of displeasing 'Palamède', who had excommunicated them. So I could be certain that she had not spoken about me to M. de Charlus, otherwise I would not have found myself there. He was now leaning, facing the garden, next to the Ggerman Ambassador, on the balustrade of the great staircase which led back into the house, so that, in spite of the three or four female admirers who had congregated around the Baron and were almost screening him, the guests were obliged to come and wish him good evening. He answered by styling people by their names. You heard successively: 'Good evening, Monsieur du Hazay, good evening, Madame de la Tour du Pin-Vercluse, good evening, Madame de la Tour du Pin-Gouvernet, good evening, Philibert, good evening, my dear Ambassadress, and so on.' This made for a continuous yapping, interspersed with well-meaning advice or questions (to the answers to which he paid no heed), which M. de Charlus addressed in a tone at once gentler, artificial, in order to attest to his indifference, and benign: 'Mind the little one doesn't catch cold, gardens are always a bit damp. Good evening, Madame de Brantes. Good evening, Madame de Mecklembourg. Is your young daughter here? Has she put on that ravishing pink dress? Good evening, Saint-Géran.' Certainly, there was arrogance in this attitude. M. de Charlus knew he was a Guermantes occupying a preponderant place at this entertainment. But there was not only arrogance, and the very word entertainment evoked, for a man of aesthetic gifts, the sense of luxury and of curiosity that it may have if the entertainment in question is being given not by society people but in a painting by Carpaccio or Veronese. It is even more likely that the German prince that was M. de Charlus was picturing to himself rather the entertainment that unfolds in Tannhäuser, with himself as the Margrave, having a kindly, condescending word for each of the guests at the entrance to the Warburg, as they disperse into the castle or the park, saluted by the long phrase, a hundred times repeated, of the famous March.[15]

I had to come to a decision, however. I was well able to recognize under the trees women with whom I was more or less friendly, but they seemed transformed because they were at the Princesse's and not at her cousin's, and because I saw them sitting not in front of a Saxe plate but beneath the branches of a chestnut tree. The elegance of the setting played no part in it. Had it been infinitely less than at 'Oriane's' the same unease would still have existed inside me. Should the electricity happen to go off in our drawing-room and have to be replaced by oil lamps, everything seems altered. I was rescued from my uncertainty by Mme de Souvré. 'Good evening, she said as she came up to me. Is it long since you saw the Duchesse de Guermantes?' She excelled at lending words of this kind an intonation which proved she was not uttering them out of pure stupidity, like those people who, not knowing what to talk about, are forever accosting you and naming some common acquaintance, often very vague. She, on the contrary, had a fine conductor wire in her eyes, which signified: 'Don't think I didn't recognize you. You're the young man I've seen at the Duchesse de Guermantes's. I remember very well.' Unfortunately, the protection extended over me by these seemingly stupid yet delicately intentioned words was extremely fragile and vanished the moment I sought to make use of it. Mme de Souvré had the art, if it were a matter of backing up a request to someone of influence, of appearing both to be recommending it in the eyes of the petitioner, and not to be recommending this petitioner in the eyes of the exalted personage, in such a way that this double-edged gesture opened a credit balance of gratitude from the former without incurring any debt vis-à-vis the other. Encouraged by this lady's good grace to ask her to present me to M. de Guermantes, she seized on a moment when our host's eyes were not turned in our direction, took me maternally by the shoulders and, smiling at the Prince's face, which was turned away, so that he could not see her, she thrust me towards him with a movement purportedly protective yet deliberately ineffective, which left me stranded almost at my point of departure. Such is the cowardliness of society people.

That of a lady who came up to greet me by calling me by my name was greater still. I tried to recover her name even as I was speaking to her; I remembered very well having dined with her, I remembered things she had said to me. But my attention, straining towards that inner region where these memories of her were, was unable to discover the name. Yet it was there. My mind was engaged on a sort of game with it in order to grasp its contours and the letter it began with, and finally to illuminate it in its entirety. It was so much wasted effort, I could more or less sense its mass, its weight, but as for its forms, comparing these with the mysterious captive huddled in the darkness within, I said to myself, 'That's not it.' My mind might certainly have been able to create the most difficult names. But alas, it had, not to create, but to reproduce. Any action of the mind is easy when it is not subject to reality. Here, I was forced to submit. At last, suddenly, the name came in its entirety: 'Madame d'Arpajon.' I am wrong to say that it came, for I do not believe it appeared to me under its own propulsion. Nor do I think that my numerous faint memories relating to this lady, whose help I did not cease to solicit (by exhortations such as: 'Come on, this is the woman who's a friend of Mme de Souvré, who has so simple-minded an admiration for Victor Hugo, along with so much terror and repugnance'), I do not believe that all these memories, fluttering about between me and her name, served in the very least to refloat it. In the great game of 'hide-and-seek' played out in the memory when we are trying to recover a name, there is not a series of graduated approximations. We can see nothing, then all of a sudden the exact name appears and quite different from what we thought we could divine. It is not it that has come to us. No, I believe rather that, as we go on through life, we spend our time distancing ourselves from the zone where a name is distinct, and that it was by the exercise of my will and my attention, which enhanced the acuity of my inward gaze, that I had suddenly penetrated the semi-darkness and seen clearly. At all events, if there are transitions between forgetfulness and memory, those transitions are unconscious. For the intermediate names through which we pass, before finding the right name, are themselves false, and bring us no closer to it. They are not even names properly speaking, but often mere consonants not to be found in the rediscovered name. The work of the mind as it passes from nothingness to reality is so mysterious, on the other hand, that it is possible after all that these false consonants are a pole held clumsily out to us in advance, to help us grapple the right name. 'All of which, the reader will say, teaches us nothing about this lady's disobligingness; but since you've been at a standstill for this long, let me, Monsieur l'auteur, make you waste one minute more to tell you how regrettable it is that, young as you were (or as your hero was if he is not yourself), you should already have had so little memory as to be unable to recall the name of a lady whom you knew very well.' It is very regrettable, you are right, Monsieur le lecteur. And sadder than you think, once it is sensed as heralding the day when names and words will vanish from the illuminated zone of the mind and we shall have to give up for ever naming to ourselves those whom we have known best. It is regrettable indeed that, from our youth on, it should require such labour to recover names we know well. But were this infirmity to occur only with names barely known and quite naturally forgotten, and which we do not want to weary ourselves by recalling, then this infirmity would not be without its advantages. 'And what are they, pray?' Well, Monsieur, the fact is that this malady alone causes us to take notice of and to learn, and enables us to analyse, the mechanisms of which we would otherwise be ignorant. A man who drops into his bed each evening like a dead weight and lives again only at the moment of coming awake and getting up, will that man ever dream of making, if not great discoveries, then at least some minor observations, concerning sleep? He hardly knows whether he sleeps. A spot of insomnia is not without its uses for appreciating sleep, for projecting a certain light into that darkness. An unfailing memory is no very powerful stimulus for studying the phenomena of memory. 'So Mme d'Arpajon finally introduced you to the Prince?' No, but be quiet and let me take up my story again.

Mme d'Arpajon was even more cowardly than Mme de Souvré, but her cowardice had greater excuse. She knew she had always had little influence in society. This influence had been further weakened by the liaison she had had with the Duc de Guermantes; the latter's rejection of her was the final straw. The ill-humour produced in her by my request to be introduced to the Prince resulted in a silence, which she was naïve enough to think was an appearance of not having heard what I said. She did not even realize that anger had caused her to frown. Or perhaps she did realize but was not troubled by the contradiction, using it for the lesson in tact she could give me without being too impolite, I mean a lesson which was wordless but no less eloquent on that account.

Mme d'Arpajon was in any case much put out, the gaze of many having been raised towards a Renaissance balcony at the corner of which, in place of the monumental statues that were so often placed there in those days, there leaned, no less sculptural than they, the magnificent Duchesse de Surgis-le-Duc, she who had just succeeded Mme d'Arpajon in the affections of Basin de Guermantes. Beneath the flimsy white tulle that protected her against the cool night air could be seen the supple body of a winged Victory. My one remaining recourse was to M. de Charlus, who had gone back into a room below, which gave access to the garden. I had ample leisure (since he was pretending to be absorbed in a simulated game of whist, which enabled him not to appear to see people) in which to admire the wilful and artistic simplicity of his dress coat which, thanks to tiny details that a couturier alone might have discerned, looked like a 'Harmony' in black and white by Whistler;[16] or rather black, white and red for M. de Charlus wore, suspended by a broad ribbon against the jabot of his evening-dress, the white, black and red enamel cross of a Knight of the religious Order of Malta. At that moment, the Baron's game was interrupted by Mme de Gallardon, who had her nephew in tow, the Vicomte de Courvoisier, a young man with a pretty face and an impertinent air: 'Cousin, said Mme de Gallardon, allow me to introduce to you my nephew Adalbert. Adalbert, you know, the famous Uncle Palamède you're always hearing about. – Good evening, Mme de Gallardon,' replied M. de Charlus. And he added, without even looking at the young man: 'Good evening, Monsieur', with a surly look and in so violently discourteous a tone that everyone was astounded. Perhaps, knowing that Mme de Gallardon had her suspicions as to his habits and had been unable to resist for once the pleasure of alluding to them, M. de Charlus was anxious to forestall whatever embroidery she might add to a friendly reception of her nephew, at the same time making a resounding profession of his indifference with respect to young men; or perhaps he considered that the aforesaid Adalbert had not replied to his aunt's words with a sufficiently respectful air; or perhaps, eager to press home his attack later on so attractive a cousin, he wanted to give himself the advantages of a previous act of aggression, like those sovereigns who, before engaging in a diplomatic démarche, support it with a military action.

It was not as difficult as I had thought for M. de Charlus to accede to my request for an introduction. For one thing, in the course of the last twenty years, this Don Quixote had tilted against so many windmills (frequently relatives who he claimed had behaved badly towards him), and had forbidden people to be invited with such regularity, 'as someone unfit to be received', by either male or female Guermantes, that the latter were beginning to be afraid of quarrelling with all the people whom they liked, and of being deprived until the day they died of the company of certain newcomers about whom they were curious, in order to espouse the thunderous yet unexplained grudges of a brother-in-law or cousin who would have wanted them to abandon wife, brother and children for his sake. Being more intelligent than the other Guermantes, M. de Charlus had noticed that only one in two of his vetoes was effective and, looking ahead to the future and fearing that one day it might be him of whom they would deprive themselves, he had begun to cut his losses, to lower, as they say, his prices. Moreover, if he was capable of giving an identical life to some hated individual for months, or for years, on end – to whom he would not have tolerated an invitation being extended, but would rather have fought, like a street porter, with a queen, the rank of whatever stood in his way no longer counting for him – his explosions of anger on the other hand were too frequent for them not to be somewhat fragmentary. 'The imbecile, the miserable devil! We're going to return him to where he belongs, sweep him into the gutter where, alas, he won't do much for the salubriousness of the town,' he would shout, even when alone at home, on reading a letter he considered irreverent, or on recalling a remark that had been repeated to him. But a fresh outburst against a second imbecile would dispel the earlier one, and, provided the first imbecile proved deferential, the attack he had occasioned was forgotten, not having lasted long enough to create a foundation of hatred on which to build. So perhaps – in spite of his ill-humour against me – I would have succeeded with him when I asked him to introduce me to the Prince, had I not had the unhappy idea of adding, out of scrupulousness, and so that he should not suppose me tactless enough to have entered on the off chance, relying on him to enable me to stay: 'You know that I know them very well, the Princesse has been very kind to me. – Well, if you know them, what need have you of me to introduce you?' he snapped at me and, turning his back, resumed his make-believe game of cards with the Nuncio, the German Ambassador and a personage whom I did not know.

Then, from the depths of those gardens where once the Duc d'Aiguillon had bred rare animals, there reached me, through the wide-open doors, a sniffing sound, of someone breathing in all this elegance and wanting none of it to go to waste. The sound drew closer, I made in its direction on the off chance, with the result that the words 'good evening' were murmured into my ear by M. de Bréauté, not like the jagged, metallic sound of a knife being ground on the wheel, let alone the cry of the young wild boar that lays waste the crops, but like the voice of a potential saviour. Less influential than Mme de Souvré, but less fundamentally afflicted than her by disobligingness, far more at ease with the Prince than was Mme d'Arpajon, under an illusion perhaps concerning my own place in the Guermantes circle, or perhaps knowing it better than I did, I yet had, in those first seconds, some difficulty in securing his attention for, with nostrils dilated and the papillae of his nose quivering, he was facing in all directions, his monocle-eye wide with curiosity as though he had found himself faced by five hundred masterpieces. But having heard my request, he welcomed it with satisfaction, led me towards the Prince and presented me to him wearing a hungry, ceremonious and vulgar expression as though he were passing him, along with a recommendation, a plate of petits fours. Just as the Duc de Guermantes's greeting was, when he wanted, friendly, imbued with camaraderie, cordial and familiar, so I found that of the Prince stiff, solemn and haughty. He barely smiled at me, and addressed me gravely as 'Monsieur'. I had often heard the Duc make fun of his cousin's aloofness. But from the first words he spoke to me, which, in their coldness and seriousness, formed the most complete contrast with Basin's way of speaking, I realized at once that the fundamentally disdainful man was the Duc, who spoke to you from your first visit 'as an equal', and that, of the two cousins, the truly simple one was the Prince. In his reserve I found a greater sense, I will not say of equality, for that would have been inconceivable for him, then at least of the consideration one may accord an inferior, as occurs in any strongly hierarchical setting, at the Palais de Justice for example, or in a university faculty, where a public prosecutor or a 'dean', conscious of his high office, perhaps hides more actual simplicity and, once you get to know him better, more kindness, true simplicity and cordiality, beneath a traditional hauteur than someone more up to date in his affectation of a bantering camaraderie. 'Are you expecting to follow Monsieur your father's career?' he said to me with a distant yet interested expression. I replied summarily to his question, realizing he had only asked it in order to be gracious, and moved away to let him welcome the new arrivals.

I caught sight of Swann, and wanted to speak to him, but at that moment I saw that the Prince de Guermantes, instead of receiving Odette's husband's greeting there where he stood, had immediately, with the force of a suction pump, dragged him off to the end of the garden, but, so certain persons informed me, 'so as to show him the door'.

So distracted in society that I learned only two days later, from the newspapers, that a Czech orchestra had been playing throughout the evening and that there had been, minute by minute, a constant succession of Bengal fire, I recovered a certain capacity for attentiveness at the thought of going to see Hubert Robert's celebrated fountain.[17]

It could be seen from afar, set up to one side, in a clearing sequestered by beautiful trees, several of which were as old as it was, slender, immobile, solidified, allowing only the faintest spray falling back from its pale and tremulous plume to be disturbed by the breeze. The eighteenth century had purified the elegance of its lines, but, in determining the jet's style, seemed to have arrested its life; at this distance, you had an impression of art rather than the sensation of the water. The moist cloud that was perpetually gathering at its summit had itself preserved the character of the age, like those which congregate in the sky around the palaces of Versailles. But from close to, you became aware that, even as they respected, like the stones of an ancient palace, the design traced out for them beforehand, the waters were being constantly renewed as they sprang upwards, seeking to obey the ancient orders of the architect, and executing them accurately only by appearing to violate them, their innumerable scattered surges able to give the impression of a single impulse only from a distance. This last was in actual fact as frequently interrupted as the scattering of its fall, whereas, from a distance, it had seemed to me dense, inflexible, of an unbroken continuity. From quite close to, you could see that this continuity, altogether linear in appearance, was ensured at every point in the jet's ascent, wherever it ought to have been broken, by the coming into play, the lateral reprise, of a parallel jet that rose higher than the first and was itself, at a greater, and by now exhausting, height, relieved by a third. From close to, spent drops were falling back from the column of water and meeting their ascending sisters along the way, and now and again, torn and seized by an eddy of the air disturbed by this tireless upsurge, they drifted before capsizing into the basin. By their vacillations, and by travelling in the contrary direction, they frustrated, and with their soft vapour they blurred, the verticality and tension of this shaft, which bore above it an oblong cloud formed of innumerable droplets, yet appearing to have been painted an immutable golden brown, that rose, infrangible, immobile, slender and rapid, to add itself to the clouds in the sky. Unfortunately, a puff of wind was enough to send it obliquely across the ground; at times even, a single disobedient jet would diverge and, had it not remained at a respectful distance, would have soaked the incautious crowd of onlookers to the skin.

One of these minor accidents, which hardly ever occurred except at moments when the breeze got up, was somewhat disagreeable. Mme d'Arpajon had been led to believe that the Duc de Guermantes – in actual fact not yet arrived – was with Mme de Surgis in the galleries of pink marble which were reached through the double colonnade, hollow inside, that rose from the rim of the basin. Now, just as Mme d'Arpajon was about to enter on one of these colonnades, a strong gust from the warm breeze twisted the jet of water and inundated the good lady so thoroughly that, with the water trickling down inside her dress from her décolletage, she was as soaked as if she had been plunged into a bath. Then, not far away, a rhythmical rumbling sounded, loud enough to be audible by an entire army, yet prolonged in periods as if it were addressed not to the whole assembly, but successively, to each section of the troops; it was the Grand-Duke Vladimir[18] laughing for all he was worth at the sight of Mme d'Arpajon's immersion, one of the jolliest things, he liked to say afterwards, he had ever witnessed in all his life. A few charitable souls pointing out to the Muscovite that a word of condolence from him was perhaps in order and would give pleasure to the lady, who, although she would never see forty again, and even as she was mopping herself with her scarf, without asking for anyone's help, had extricated herself despite the water that had made the rim of the basin treacherously wet, the Grand-Duke, a kindly man at heart, thought action was called for and, the last drum-rolls of laughter having hardly been stilled, a fresh rumbling could be heard, still more violent than the earlier one. 'Bravo, old thing!' he cried, clapping his hands as if at the theatre. Mme d'Arpajon did not appreciate having her dexterity praised at the expense of her youth. And when someone said to her, deafened by the sound of the water, which was dominated even so by the thunder of Monseigneur: 'I believe His Imperial Highness said something to you. – No, it was to Mme de Souvré,' she replied.

I crossed the gardens and reascended the steps, where the absence of the Prince, who had vanished off to one side with Swann, had swollen the crowd of guests around M. de Charlus, just as, when Louis XIV was not at Versailles, more people gathered at Monsieur, his brother's. I was stopped as I passed by the Baron, while behind me two ladies and a young man were approaching to greet him.

'It's nice to see you here,' he said, offering me his hand. 'Good evening, Madame de la Tremoïlle, good evening, my dear Herminie.' But no doubt the memory of what he had said to me concerning his role as head of the Guermantes hôtel had given him the desire to appear to be feeling, with regard to what displeased him but which he had been unable to prevent, a satisfaction to which his lordly impertinence and his hysterical amusement at once lent a form of excessive irony: 'It's nice, he repeated, but above all it's very comic.' And he began to let out roars of laughter that seemed to testify both to his delight and to the incapacity of human speech to give it expression, as certain people meanwhile, knowing both how hard of access he was and how liable to insolent 'outbursts', approached in curiosity and then, with an almost indecent haste, took to their heels. 'Come, don't be angry, he said, touching me gently on the shoulder, you know I'm very fond of you. Good evening, Antioche, good evening, Louis-René. Have you been to see the fountain?' he asked me in a tone of voice more affirmative than questioning. 'It's very pretty, is it not? It's marvellous. It could be even better, of course, by doing away with certain things, then there'd be nothing to equal it in France. But even as it is, it's among the best things. Bréauté will tell you they were wrong to hang lanterns, to try and make people forget it was he who had that absurd idea. But, when all's said and done, he succeeded in making it only a little bit uglier. It's much harder to disfigure a masterpiece than to create it. We already had a vague suspicion anyway that Bréauté was no Hubert Robert.'

I rejoined the line of visitors who were entering the house. 'Has it been long since you saw my delightful cousin Oriane?' the Princesse asked me, who had shortly before deserted her armchair by the entrance, and with whom I now returned to the drawing-rooms. 'She's due to be here this evening, I saw her during the afternoon, added our hostess. She promised me. I believe in any case that you are dining with the two of us at the Queen of Italy's,[19] in the embassy, on Thursday. Every possible Highness will be there, it'll be most intimidating.' They could in no way have intimidated the Princesse de Guermantes, whose drawing-rooms teemed with them and who used to say 'My little Coburgs', as it might have been 'My little dogs'. And so Mme de Guermantes said 'It'll be most intimidating' out of sheer silliness, which, among society people, even overcomes their vanity. With respect to her own genealogy, she knew less than an agrégé d'histoire.[20] Where her connections were concerned, she was keen to show that she knew the nicknames they had been given. Having asked me whether I would be dining the following week at the Marquise de la Pommelière's, often known as 'la Pomme', the Princesse, having obtained a negative reply, was silent for a few moments. Then, for no reason other than a deliberate display of involuntary erudition, banality and conformity to the prevailing spirit, she added: 'She's quite an agreeable woman, la Pomme!'

It was just as the Princesse was talking with me that the Duc and Duchesse de Guermantes made their entry. But I was unable at first to go forward to them, for I was snapped up in passing by the Turkish Ambassadress, who, pointing to our hostess, whom I had just left, exclaimed, seizing hold of me by the arm: 'Oh, what a delightful woman the Princesse is! A being so superior to all others! I fancy that were I a man, she added, with a hint of Oriental obsequiousness and sensuality, I would devote my life to that heavenly creature.' I replied that I indeed found her charming, but that I knew her cousin the Duchesse better. 'But there's no comparison, the Ambassadress said to me, Oriane is a charming woman of the world who gets her wit from Mémé and Babal, whereas Marie-Gilbert is somebody.'

I never much like thus being told without possibility of reply what I am to think about people whom I know. And there was no reason why the Turkish Ambassadress's judgment as to the merits of the Duchesse de Guermantes should be any more sure than my own. On the other hand, which also explained my irritation with the Ambassadress, the fact is that the defects of a mere acquaintance, or even of a friend, are for us true poisons, against which we are fortunately 'mithridatized'. But, without making the least show of scientific comparisons and talking of anaphylaxy, let me say that at the heart of our friendly or merely social dealings, there is a hostility, cured temporarily but recurring in fits. Normally, we suffer little from these poisons so long as people are 'natural'. By saying 'Babal' and 'Mémé', to refer to people whom she did not know, the Turkish Ambassadress had suspended the effects of the 'mithridatism' which normally made her bearable. She had irritated me, which was the more unjust inasmuch as she had not spoken in this way in order to make me think she was an intimate of 'Mémé's, but because an over-rapid education had led her to name these noble lords according to what she believed was the local custom. She had completed her schooling in a few months without seeing it through to the end. But on reflection, I discovered another reason for my displeasure at remaining with the Ambassadress. It was not long since, at 'Oriane's', this same diplomatic personage had told me, wearing a serious, considered expression, that the Princesse de Guermantes was frankly antipathetic to her. I saw fit not to dwell on this about-turn: the invitation to this evening's party had brought it about. The Ambassadress was perfectly sincere in telling me that the Princesse de Guermantes was a sublime creature. She had always thought so. But never having up until now been invited to the Princesse's, she thought she must give to this kind of non-invitation the form of a voluntary abstention founded on principle. Now that she had been invited, and very likely would be from now on, her sympathy could express itself freely. There is no need, in order to explain three-quarters of the opinions held about people, to go so far as a love that has been spurned or an exclusion from political power. Our judgment remains unsure: an invitation refused or received determines it. Moreover, the Turkish Ambassadress, in the words of the Duchesse de Guermantes, who was carrying out an inspection of the drawing-rooms with me, 'did well'. She was above all very useful. The true stars of society are weary of appearing there. Anyone who is curious to set eyes on them has often to emigrate into another hemisphere, where they are more or less alone. But women of the Ottoman Ambassadress's kind, newly entered into society, do not fail to shine there, everywhere at once, so to speak. They are useful to performances of the kind known as a soirée or a rout, to which they would have themselves dragged from their death-beds rather than miss them. They are the extras on whom you can always count, zealous in never missing a party. Thus foolish young men, unaware that they are false stars, see them as the queens of fashion, whereas instruction would be needed to explain to them the reasons in virtue of which Mme Standish, not known to them and who paints cushions, far away from society, is at least as great a lady as the Duchesse de Doudeauville.[21]

In the ordinary course of things, the Duchesse de Guermantes's eyes were distracted and a little melancholy; she only made them shine with a flame of wit each time she had to greet some friend, absolutely as if the latter had been some witticism, some delightful shaft, some gourmet delicacy, the sampling of which has brought an expression of joy and refinement to the face of the connoisseur. But with these grand soirées, since she had too many people to acknowledge, she had decided it would be wearisome, after each one of them, to turn off the light each time. A literary gourmet, going to the theatre to see a new play by one of the masters of the stage, attests to his certainty that he will not be spending a bad evening by having already, even as he hands his things to the usherette, adjusted his lips for a judicious smile, and brought a light of sly approval into his eyes; so it was that, from the moment she arrived, the Duchesse would turn on the lights for the whole evening. And as she was handing over her evening cloak, of a magnificent Tiepolo red, to reveal a yoke of real rubies which encircled her neck, after casting the couturière's last rapid, meticulous and complete glance at her dress, which is that of the society woman, Oriane checked on the sparkle in her eyes no less than on her other jewels. In vain did a few 'well-wishers' like M. de Joinville dash up to the Duc to stop him from entering: 'Don't you know then that poor Mama is at the point of death? They've just given her the last rites. – I know, I know,' replied M. de Guermantes, pushing the intruder away in order to enter. The viaticum has worked wonders,' he added with a smile of pleasure at the thought of the costume ball he was determined not to miss after the Prince's soirée. 'We didn't want it known that we had returned home,' the Duchesse said to me. She did not suspect that the Princesse had invalidated these words for me in advance by recounting how she had seen her cousin briefly, who had promised to come. The Duc, after a long stare, with which he crushed his wife for five whole minutes: 'I told Oriane of the doubts you had.' Now that she could see they were unfounded and that she need take no steps to try to dispel them, she declared them to be absurd, and teased me at length. 'Fancy supposing you weren't invited! One is always invited! And then, there was me. Do you think I wouldn't have been able to get you invited to my cousin's?' I have to say that often, subsequently, she did far more difficult things for me; nevertheless, I was careful not to take her words in the sense of my having shown too great a reserve. I was beginning to know the precise value of the spoken or silent language of aristocratic amiability, an amiability happy to pour balm on the sense of inferiority of those in respect of whom it is exercised, but not, however, to the extent of dispelling it, in which event it would no longer have any raison d'être. 'But you are our equal, if not better,' the Guermantes seemed, by all their actions, to be saying; and they said it in the nicest way imaginable, so as to be liked and admired, but not so as to be believed; to tease out the fictitious nature of this amiability was to have been what they called well brought up; to believe that amiability to be real was to lack breeding. I received as it happens a short time after this a lesson which finally taught me, with the most perfect exactitude, the extent and limits of certain forms of aristocratic amiability. It was at a matinée given by the Duchesse de Montmorency[22] for the Queen of England; a sort of small cortège had formed to go to the buffet, at the head of which walked the sovereign with, on her arm, the Duc de Guermantes. This was the moment of my own arrival. With his free hand, the Duc made, from a good forty metres away, innumerable gestures of summons and of friendship, which seemed to be saying that I could approach without fear, that I would not be eaten alive in place of the sandwiches. But, I, who was beginning to become word perfect in the language of the courts, instead of moving even a single step closer, gave a deep bow from my forty metres of distance, but without smiling, as I would have done faced by someone I hardly knew, then continued on my way in the opposite direction. I might have written a masterpiece, and the Guermantes would have done me less honour than for this bow. It did not go unobserved by the eyes either of the Duc, even though he had to respond to more than five hundred people that day, or of the Duchesse, who, having met my mother, recounted it to her, and, while being careful not to say that I had been in the wrong, that I should have gone up, told her that her husband had marvelled at my bow, that it would have been impossible to make it any more expressive. They did not cease to discover all the virtues in that bow, without however mentioning that which had seemed the most precious, to wit that it had been discreet, nor did they cease paying me compliments which I realized were less a reward for the past than an indication for the future, on the lines of that tactfully supplied to his pupils by the head of an educational establishment: 'Don't forget, my dear children, that these prizes are less for you than for your parents, so that they will send you back next year.' Thus it was that Mme de Marsantes, when someone from a different world entered her circle, extolled before him those discreet people 'whom one finds when one goes in search of them and who keep themselves to themselves the rest of the time', just as, in a roundabout way, you advise a servant who smells that bathing does wonders for the health.

While, before even she had left the entrance hall, I was talking with Mme de Guermantes, I heard a voice of a kind that, in the future, I was to be able to distinguish beyond possibility of error. It was, in this particular instance, that of M. Vaugoubert talking with M. de Charlus. A clinician has no need even for the patient under observation to lift his shirt nor to listen to his breathing, the voice is sufficient. How many times later on was I not struck in a drawing-room by the intonation or the laugh of some man who was imitating exactly the language of his profession or the manners of his circle, and affecting a severe refinement or a coarse familiarity, yet the falsity of whose voice acted like a tuning-fork on my practised ear and was enough to tell me 'he's a Charlus'! At that moment, the entire staff of an embassy went by, and bowed to M. de Charlus. Although my discovery of the kind of sickness in question dated only from that same day (when I had caught sight of M. de Charlus and Jupien), I would not have needed, in order to make a diagnosis, to ask any questions or listen to any chests. But M. Vaugoubert, talking with M. de Charlus, seemed unsure. Yet he ought to have known how things stood after the doubts of his adolescence. The invert believes he is the only one of his kind in the entire universe; only later does he imagine – another exaggeration – that the sole exception is the normal man. But, ambitious yet timorous, M. de Vaugoubert had not yielded for a long time past to what for him would have been pleasure. The diplomatic career had had the same effect on his life as if he had taken holy orders. Coupled with his assiduity at the École des Sciences Politiques,[23] it had condemned him since his twenties to the chastity of a Christian. Thus, just as each sense loses some of its strength and acuity, and atrophies once it is no longer exercised, M. de Vaugoubert, like the civilized man who would no longer be capable of the feats of strength or the keenness of hearing of the cave-man, had lost that special perspicacity which was rarely found wanting in M. de Charlus; and at official dinner-tables, whether in Paris or abroad, the Minister Plenipotentiary no longer managed even to recognize those who, under the disguise of their uniforms, were in fact of his own kind. A few names uttered by M. de Charlus, indignant should his own tastes be mentioned but always amused to let those of others be known, came as a delightful surprise to M. de Vaugoubert. Not that, after all these years, he dreamed of taking advantage of any such windfall. But these rapid revelations, similar to those which, in Racine's tragedies, inform Athalie and Abner that Joas is of the race of David, or that Esther, seated in the purple, has kinsfolk who are 'yids',[24] by altering the aspect of the X… Legation or of this or that department of the Foreign Ministry, rendered these palaces retrospectively as mysterious as the Temple of Jerusalem or the throne-room of Suze.[25] For the embassy the young personnel of which came up as one to shake M. de Charlus's hand, M. de Vaugoubert adopted the wondering expression of Elise exclaiming in Esther:

> Ciel! Quel nombreux essaim d'innocentes beautés
> S'offre à mes yeux en foule et sort de tous côtés!
> Quelle aimable pudeur sur leur visage est peinte![26]

Then, anxious to be 'better informed', he smiled and cast a fatuously questioning and concupiscent glance at M. de Charlus: 'Oh come, but of course,' said M. de Charlus, with the learned expression of a scholar talking to an ignoramus. Instantly, M. de Vaugoubert (which greatly annoyed M. de Charlus) could no longer take his eyes off these young secretaries, whom the Ambassador of X… to France, a habitual offender, had not selected at random. M. de Vaugoubert fell silent, I could see only his eyes. But, accustomed since childhood to attribute the language of the classics, even to what is speechless, I made M. de Vaugoubert's eyes speak the lines in which Esther explains to Elise that, out of zeal for his religion, Mordecai has wanted only girls who belonged to it to attend on the Queen.

> Cependant son amour pour notre nation
> A peuplé ce palais de filles de Sion,
> Jeunes et tendres fleurs par le sort agitées,
> Sous un ciel étranger comme moi transplantées.
> Dans un lieu séparé de profanes témoins
> Il (the excellent ambassador) met à les former son étude et ses soins.[27]

M. de Vaugoubert finally spoke, other than by his glances. 'Who knows, he said mournfully, whether, in the country where I reside, the same thing does not exist? – It's likely, replied M. de Charlus, starting with King Theodosius, although I don't know anything positive about him. – Oh no, absolutely not! – Then it's not permitted to look like one to that extent. And he has his fancy ways. He's one of the "darling" kind, the kind I detest most. I wouldn't dare show myself with him in the street. Anyway, you must certainly know him for what he is, it's common knowledge. – You're totally mistaken about him. He's charming as it happens. The day when the agreement with France was signed, the King embraced me. I have never been so moved. – That was the moment to tell him what you wanted. – Oh, good God, how horrible, supposing he'd even suspected! But I have no fears on that score.'

Words which I overheard, for I was not far away, and which led me to recite in my head:

> Le roi jusqu'à ce jour ignore qui je suis,
> Et ce secret toujours tient ma langue enchaînée.[28]

This dialogue, half mute, half spoken, had lasted only a few moments and I had not yet taken more than a few steps into the drawing-rooms with the Duchesse de Guermantes when a small dark-haired woman, extremely pretty, stopped her: 'I'd very much like to call on you. D'Annunzio[29] caught sight of you from a box and wrote a letter to the Princesse de T. in which he says he'd never seen anything so lovely. He'd give his whole life for ten minutes' conversation with you. At all events, even if you can't or won't, the letter is in my possession. You must fix a time for us to meet. There are certain secret things I can't say here. I can see you don't recognize me, she added, addressing herself to me; I met you at the Princesse de Parme's (where I had never been). The Russian Emperor would like your father to be sent to Petersburg. If you were able to come on Tuesday, Isvolsky[30] will in fact be there, he could talk to you about it. I've a present to give you, darling, she added, turning to the Duchesse, which I wouldn't give to anyone except you. The manuscripts of three of Ibsen's plays,[31] which he had his old nurse bring me. I shall keep one and give you the other two.'

The Duc de Guermantes was not enchanted with these offers. Unsure whether Ibsen or d'Annunzio were dead or alive, he could already see writers and dramatists coming to call on his wife and putting her into their works. Society people readily picture books to themselves as a sort of cube, one face of which has been removed, so that the author need waste no time in 'bringing in' the people he meets. This obviously is underhand, and they are people of little worth. Admittedly, it would not be without interest to meet them 'in passing', for thanks to them, when you read a book or an article, you get to know the 'inside story', can 'remove the masks'. But for all that, the wisest course is to stick to authors who are dead. The one author whom M. de Guermantes considered 'perfectly proper' was the gentleman who wrote the death notices in the Gaulois.[32] He at least contented himself with citing the name of M. de Guermantes at the head of those persons remarked 'among others' at the funerals where the Duc had signed the list. When the latter preferred that his name should not appear, instead of signing he sent a letter of condolence to the deceased person's family, assuring them of the deep sadness that he felt. Should this family then have inserted in the newspaper: 'Among the letters received, let us cite that from the Duc de Guermantes, etc.', this was not the fault of the gossip writer, but of the son, brother or father of the person deceased, whom the Duc described as arrivistes and with whom he was determined to have no further dealings (what he called, being unclear as to the meaning of these locutions, 'having a bone to pick'). The fact is that the names of Ibsen and d'Annunzio, and their uncertain survival, brought a frown from the Duc, not as yet far enough away from us not to have heard the sundry civilities of Mme Timoléon d'Amoncourt. She was a charming woman, of a quickness of mind, like her beauty, so captivating that one of these alone would have been sufficient attraction. But, born outside the circles in which she was now living and, after aspiring to start with only to a literary salon, successively and exclusively the friend – never the lover, her morals were of the purest – of each great writer who gave her all his manuscripts and wrote books for her, chance having introduced her into the Faubourg Saint-Germain, these literary privileges were of service to her there. Her situation was such now that she had no need to dispense any favours other than those bestowed by her presence. But, having got used in the old days to doing services for people, and to handling them tactfully, she had persevered, even though it was no longer necessary. She always had a state secret to reveal to you, a potentate whom you must meet, a water-colour by a master to offer you. There was an element of falsehood certainly in all these futile attractions, but they made of her life a comedy of scintillating complexity and it was a fact that she had secured the appointment of prefects and generals.

As she walked beside me, the Duchesse de Guermantes allowed the azure light of her eyes to float in front of her, but undirected, so as to avoid the people with whom she was keen not to come into contact, but whom she could sometimes make out in the distance like a menacing reef. We were advancing between a double hedge of guests who, aware that they would never get to know 'Oriane', wanted at least, as a curiosity, to point her out to their wives: 'Ursule, quick, quick, come and see Madame de Guermantes who's talking with that young man.' And you felt it would not have taken much for them to climb up on to chairs so as to have a better view, as at the 14 July parade or the Grand Prix.[33] It was not that the Duchesse de Guermantes had a more aristocratic salon than her cousin. The first was frequented by people whom the second would never have wished to invite, above all because of her husband. She would never have received Mme Alphonse de Rothschild, who, a close friend of Mme de La Trémoïlle and of Mme de Sagan, as was Oriane herself, was often to be seen at the last named's. And the same went for Baron Hirsch,[34] whom the Prince of Wales had brought to her house but not to that of the Princesse, who would not have taken to him, as well as for a number of great Bonapartist or even Republican celebrities, who interested the Duchesse but whom the Prince, a convinced Royalist, would have refused to receive. His anti-Semitism, being also a principle with him, made no concessions to the fashionable, however highly accredited, and if he received Swann, whose friend he had been from a long way back, being moreover the only one of the Guermantes who addressed him as Swann and not as Charles, it was because, knowing that Swann's grandmother, a Protestant married to a Jew, had been the mistress of the Duc de Berri,[35] he tried, from time to time, to believe in the legend which had it that Swann's father was an illegitimate son of the Prince. On this hypothesis, which was, however, false, Swann, the son of a Catholic, who had himself been the son of a Bourbon and a Catholic woman, was Christian through and through.

'What, you don't know these splendours?' the Duchesse said to me, referring to the house we were in. But having sung the praises of her cousin's 'palace', she hastened to add that she infinitely preferred her own 'humble abode'. 'It's admirable for visiting, here. But I'd die of sadness if I had to stay and sleep in rooms where so many historical events have taken place. It would have the effect on me of having remained behind after closing time, of having been forgotten, in the château of Blois or Fontainebleau or even at the Louvre, and of having as my one recourse against unhappiness to tell myself that I'm in the room where Monaldeschi was murdered.[36] As camomile tea, that wouldn't do. Hello, there's Mme de Saint-Euverte. We had dinner there just the other day. As it's tomorrow she gives her big annual shindig, I thought she'd have gone off to bed. But she can't miss a party. If this one had been taking place in the country, she'd have climbed into a delivery van rather than not have gone to it.'

In point of fact, Mme de Saint-Euverte had come there, that evening, less for the pleasure of not missing someone else's party than to ensure the success of her own, to recruit the final adherents and as it were review in extremis the troops who would the next day be manoeuvring brilliantly at her 'garden-party'. Because, for quite some years now, the guests at the Saint-Euverte parties had been no longer at all the same as in the old days. The female notabilities of the Guermantes circle, at that time very thin on the ground, had – overwhelmed with courtesies by their hostess – little by little brought their women friends. At the same time, by her progressive hard work in parallel, but in the opposite direction, Mme de Saint-Euverte had, year by year, reduced the numbers of people unknown to the fashionable world. First one, then another, had ceased to be seen there. For a time a system of 'batches' operated, which, thanks to parties over which a veil was cast, enabled the reprobates to be invited to come and be entertained among themselves, which excused her from inviting them together with the people of substance. What cause for complaint could they have? Did they not get (panem et circenses) petits fours and a fine programme of music? And so, in some sort of symmetry with the two duchesses in exile who, in the old days, when the Saint-Euverte salon made its bow, were to be seen, like two caryatids, holding up its tottering ridgepiece, in recent years, only two heterogeneous figures were to be made out, mingling with the beau monde: old Mme de Cambremer and an architect's wife with a beautiful voice whom they were often obliged to ask to sing. But no longer knowing anyone at Mme de Saint-Euverte's, in mourning for their lost companions, and feeling themselves to be in the way, they looked as though they were ready to die of cold, like two swallows that have not emigrated in time. And so the following year they were not asked; Mme de Franquetot tried to intercede on behalf of her cousin, who was so very fond of music. But since she was unable to obtain any response on her behalf more explicit than the words: 'But it's always possible to come in and listen to the music if it amuses you, there's no crime in that!', Mme de Cambremer did not consider the invitation sufficiently pressing and stayed away.

Such a transmutation having been effected by Mme de Saint-Euverte, from a salon for lepers into a salon for great ladies (the latest form, ultra-chic to all appearances, that it had taken), it might seem surprising that the person who tomorrow would be giving the season's most brilliant party should have needed to come on the eve to address a supreme appeal to her troops. But the fact was that the pre-eminence of the Saint-Euverte salon existed only for those whose social life consists merely in reading the accounts of matinées and soirées in the Gaulois or the Figaro, without ever having been to any of them. For those socialites who encounter society only by way of the newspaper, the enumeration of the Ambassadresses of England, Austria, etc., and the Duchesses d'Uzès,[37] de La Trémoïlle, etc., etc., was enough for them readily to imagine the Saint-Euverte salon to be the first in Paris, whereas it was one of the last. Not that these accounts were untruthful. The majority of the people named had indeed been present. But every one of them had come as a result of entreaties, politenesses and favours, and with a sense of doing Mme de Saint-Euverte infinite honour. Such salons, less sought-after than shunned, to which you go only in the line of duty as it were, take in only the female readers of the 'Society' column. They slide over a party, a truly fashionable one, to which the hostess, who might have had all the duchesses, who crave being 'among the chosen', has asked only two or three, and has not put the names of her guests in the newspaper. And so these women, either misunderstanding or else scorning the influence that publicity has today acquired, are fashionable for the Queen of Spain, but unrecognized by the crowd, because the first knows and the second do not know who they are.

Mme de Saint-Euverte was not among these women, but had come, like a good honey-bee, to gather all who had been invited for the following day. M. de Charlus was not invited, he had always refused to go to her house. But he had quarrelled with so many people that Mme de Saint-Euverte was able to put this down to his character.

True, if Oriane alone had been there, Mme de Saint-Euverte need not have put herself out, since the invitation had been given verbally, and accepted moreover with that charming and deceitful good grace, the triumphant practitioners of which are the academicians, from whose house the candidate emerges much moved and never doubting that he may count on their vote.[38] But others were there besides. The Prince d'Agrigente, would he be coming? And Mme de Durfort?[39] And so, in order to keep a weather eye open for squalls, Mme de Saint-Euverte had thought it more expedient to transport herself there in person; insinuating with some, imperative with others, to all she gave notice in veiled terms of unimaginable amusements, the like of which would not be seen again, and to each she promised that at her house they would find the person that they longed, or the personage they needed, to meet. And the sort of function with which she was invested on this one occasion in the year – like certain magistracies in the ancient world – of someone who will tomorrow be giving the most notable garden-party of the season, conferred on her a momentary authority. Her lists were made up and closed, so that, as she moved slowly through the Princesse's drawing-rooms in order to pour successively into each ear: 'You won't forget me tomorrow,' she experienced the ephemeral triumph of turning away, while continuing to smile, when she caught sight of some ugly duckling who was to be avoided or a country bumpkin admitted to 'Gilbert's' on the strength of having been a school-friend but whose presence would add nothing to the garden-party. She preferred not to speak to him so as to be able to say afterwards: 'I gave out my invitations verbally, and unfortunately I didn't bump into you.' So did she, a mere Saint-Euverte, her eyes darting this way and that, 'sort through' the component parts of the Princesse's soirée. And in so doing, she saw herself as a true Duchesse de Guermantes.

It has to be said that neither was the latter as liberal as one might have thought with her greetings and her smiles. On the one hand, when she refused them, it was no doubt deliberately: 'But she gets on my nerves, she would say, am I going to be obliged to talk to her about her reception for a whole hour?'

A very swarthy Duchesse was seen to go past, whose ugliness and stupidity, and certain irregularities of behaviour, had exiled her, not from society but from certain inner circles of the fashionable. 'Oh,' murmured Mme de Guermantes, with the exact, disabused glance of the connoisseur being shown a piece of paste jewellery, 'they entertain that here!' Merely at the sight of this semi-imbecile, whose face was encumbered by too many speckles of black hair, Mme de Guermantes estimated this to be a second-rate soirée. She had been brought up with, but had broken off all relations with this lady; she replied to her greeting with the curtest of nods. 'I don't understand, she said to me, as if to excuse herself, why Marie-Gilbert should invite us with all these dregs. You could say there are people here from every parish. It was far better organized at Mélanie Pourtalès's.[40] She could have the Holy Synod and the Oratorian temple[41] if the fancy took her, but at least she didn't make us go on those days.' But, in many cases, it was out of timidity, of fear of having a scene with her husband, who refused to let her entertain artists and the like (many of whom were Marie-Gilbert's protégés, you had to be careful not to be accosted by some illustrious German soprano), out of a certain fear also in respect of the nationalism which, possessing as she did, like M. de Charlus, the Guermantes spirit, she despised from the social point of view (in order to glorify the general staff, a plebeian general was now accorded precedence ahead of certain dukes), but to which, knowing herself to be adjudged a mal pensante, she nevertheless made large concessions, to the point of dreading having to hold out her hand to Swann in this anti-Semitic circle. In this respect she was very soon reassured, having learned that the Prince had not allowed Swann to enter but had had 'a sort of altercation' with him. There was no danger of her having to make conversation in public with 'poor Charles', whom she preferred to cherish in private.

'And who again is that one?' exclaimed Mme de Guermantes, on seeing a rather strange-looking short lady, in a black dress so simple you might have supposed her to have fallen on hard times, make her, along with her husband, a deep curtsy. She did not recognize her and, insolent as she was capable of being, drew herself up as if offended, and looked at her without replying: 'Who or what is that person, Basin?' she asked, with a look of astonishment, while M. de Guermantes, in order to atone for Oriane's rudeness, bowed to the lady and shook her husband's hand. 'But, it's Mme de Chaussepierre, you were very rude. – I know nothing of any Chaussepierre. – The nephew of old mother Chanlivault. – I know nothing of any of them. Who is the woman, why does she curtsy to me? – But you know only too well, it's Mme de Charleval's daughter, Henriette Montmorency. – Oh, but I knew her mother very well, she was charming, very quick-witted. Why did she marry all these people I don't know? You say her name's Mme de Chaussepierre?' she said, spelling out this last word with a questioning air, and as if she were afraid of getting it wrong. The Duc looked severely at her. 'It's not so ridiculous as you appear to think being called Chaussepierre! Old Chaussepierre was the brother of the aforenamed Charleval,[42] of Mme de Sennecour and of the Vicomtesse du Merlerault. They're out of the top drawer. – Oh, stop,' exclaimed the Duchesse, who, like an animal-tamer, never wanted to look as though she were allowing herself to be intimidated by the savage beast's voracious stare. 'Basin, you delight me. I don't know where you've dug those names up from, but I compliment you heartily. I may not have known Chaussepierre but I've read Balzac, you're not the only one, and I've even read Labiche.[43] I appreciate Chanlivault, I don't dislike Charleval, but I confess that du Merlerault is the masterpiece. Let's admit, moreover, that Chaussepierre isn't bad either. You've collected all of them, it's not possible. You who want to write a book, she said to me, you ought to hang on to Charleval and du Merlerault. You won't find any better. – He'll quite simply find himself in court and will go to prison; you're giving him very bad advice, Oriane. – I hope for his sake that he has younger people he can call on if he feels like asking for bad advice, and above all following it. But if the worst thing he means to do is to write a book!' Some little distance from us, a marvellous, proud young woman stood quietly out in a white dress, all diamonds and tulle. Mme de Guermantes looked at her, talking before a whole group magnetized by her grace. 'Your sister is the belle of the ball; she looks charming this evening,' she said, as she was taking a chair, to the Prince de Chimay, who was passing.[44] Colonel de Froberville (he had the general of the same name for an uncle) came and sat down next to us, as did M. de Bréauté, while M. de Vaugoubert (out of an excess of politeness that he maintained even on the tennis court, where, by dint of asking for permission from anyone of importance before striking the ball, he inevitably caused his own side to lose the game) went waddling back to M. de Charlus (up until now almost enveloped by the immense skirt of the Comtesse Molé, whom he professed to admire above all other women), and, by chance, at the very instant when several members of a diplomatic mission new to Paris were greeting the Baron. At the sight of a young, particularly intelligent-looking secretary, M. de Vaugoubert fixed M. de Charlus with an expansive smile that was patently asking a single question. M. de Charlus would gladly have compromised anyone else perhaps, but to feel compromised himself by this smile coming from another and which could have only one meaning, exasperated him. 'I have absolutely no idea, I must ask you to keep your curiosity to yourself. It leaves me more than cold. Moreover, in this particular instance, you are committing a blunder of the first magnitude. I believe that young man to be the exact opposite.' Here, M. de Charlus, annoyed at having been given away by a fool, was not speaking the truth. Had the Baron been speaking truthfully, the secretary would have been the exception in that embassy. It was made up, indeed, of very different personalities, several of them extremely second-rate, so that, had you been searching for what the motive might have been for the choice that had fallen on them, you could have discovered only inversion. By setting at the head of this small diplomatic Sodom an ambassador who, on the contrary, loved women with the comic exaggeration of a music-hall compère putting his battalions of transvestites through their regulation paces, they seemed to have been obeying the law of opposites. Despite the evidence of his own eyes, he did not believe in inversion. He gave instant proof of this by marrying his sister off to a chargé d'affaires whom he quite wrongly believed went after tarts. From then on he became something of an embarrassment and was soon replaced by a new Excellency who ensured the homogeneity of the whole. Other embassies sought to compete with this one, but could not dispute the prize (as at the concours général,[45] when a particular lycée always wins), and more than ten years had to pass before, heterogeneous attachés having been introduced into this very perfect whole, another embassy was finally able to snatch the fateful palm and march at the head.

Reassured as to her fear of having to talk with Swann, Mme de Guermantes now felt only curiosity concerning the conversation he had had with his host. 'Do you know what about? the Duc asked M. de Bréauté. – I did hear, replied the latter, that it was à propos a playlet that the writer Bergotte put on at their house. It was a delight, anyway. But it seems the actor was got up to look like Gilbert, whom the good Sir Bergotte may anyway have wanted in fact to portray. – I say, I'd have been amused to see Gilbert taken off, said the Duchesse, smiling wistfully. – It was about that little performance, M. de Bréauté went on, thrusting forward his rodent's jaw, that Gilbert wanted to have it out with Swann, who merely replied, which everyone thought very witty, "But not at all, it's nothing like you, you're much more ridiculous than that!" It seems, moreover, M. de Bréauté went on, that the little play was a delight. Mme Molé was there, she was vastly amused. – What, Mme Molé goes there? said the Duchesse in astonishment. Oh, it's Mémé who'll have arranged that. It's what always ends up happening in such places. One fine day all the world starts going there, and I, who have deliberately excluded myself on principle, I find myself all alone feeling bored in my little corner.' By now, after the account M. de Bréauté had just given them, the Duchesse de Guermantes had, as can be seen, adopted a fresh point of view (if not on the Swann salon, then at least on the hypothesis of meeting Swann in a few minutes' time). 'The explanation you're giving us, said Colonel de Froberville to M. de Bréauté, is a complete fabrication. I've my own reasons for knowing so. The Prince quite simply gave Swann a good talking-to, and gave him to understand, as our forefathers put it, that he needn't show himself at the house again, given the opinions that he flaunts. And so far as I'm concerned, my uncle Gilbert was right a thousand times over, not simply to tell him off like that, but should have had done with a declared Dreyfusard more than six months ago.'

Poor M. de Vaugoubert, having on this occasion gone from being a too sluggish player to being the inert tennis-ball itself, which is launched without ceremony, found himself being projected towards the Duchesse de Guermantes, to whom he presented his respects. He was none too well received, Oriane existing in the conviction that all the diplomats – or politicians – in her world were halfwits.

M. de Froberville had inevitably benefited from the favourable position in society accorded of late to military men. Unfortunately, if the woman whom he had married was a very genuine relation of the Guermantes, she was also an extremely poor one, and as he himself had lost his money, they had scarcely any connections and were among the people who got left on one side, except on big occasions, when they had the good fortune to lose or to marry off a relation. Then, they truly became part of the communion of high society, like those nominal Catholics who approach the Lord's Table only once a year. Their material situation would have been wretched even had Mme de Saint-Euverte, loyal to the affection she had had for the late General de Froberville, not helped the household out in every way, providing the two young daughters with outfits and amusements. But the Colonel, good fellow though he was held to be, was not the soul of gratitude. He was envious of the splendours of a benefactress who herself celebrated them tirelessly and unrestrainedly. For him, his wife and his children, the annual garden-party was a wonderful pleasure that they would not have wanted to miss for all the gold in the world, but a pleasure poisoned by the thought of the vainglorious delight Mme de Saint-Euverte derived from it. The announcement of this garden-party in the newspapers, which then, after a detailed account, added in Machiavellian fashion: 'We shall have more to say about this brilliant entertainment', the complementary details about the costumes, given over several successive days, all this so hurt the Frobervilles that, somewhat starved of pleasures but who knew they could rely on that of the matinée, they got to the point each year of hoping that its success might be spoilt by bad weather, of consulting the barometer and anticipating with joy the first hints of a storm that might cause the party to be a failure.

'I shan't discuss politics with you, Froberville, said M. de Guermantes, but so far as Swann is concerned, I can say frankly that his behaviour towards us has been unspeakable. He was taken up by society in the old days by ourselves and by the Duc de Chartres,[46] and they tell me he's openly Dreyfusard. I'd never have believed it of him, him, a discerning gourmet, a positive mind, a collector, a lover of old books, a member of the Jockey Club, a man highly respected on all sides, a connoisseur of good addresses who used to send us the best port you can drink, a dilettante, a family man. Oh, I've been badly let down. I'm not speaking of myself, it's agreed I'm an old fool whose opinion doesn't count, some sort of down-and-out, but, if only for Oriane's sake, he shouldn't have done that, he should have openly disowned the Jews and the condemned man's supporters.'

'Yes, after the friendship my wife has always displayed towards him,' the Duc went on, who obviously considered that to sentence Dreyfus for high treason, whatever opinion you might hold in your heart of hearts as to his guilt, constituted a form of gratitude for the way one had been received in the Faubourg Saint-Germain, 'he should have broken ranks. For, ask Oriane, she had genuine friendship for him.' The Duchesse, thinking that a calm, ingenuous tone would lend her words a more dramatic and sincere quality, said in the voice of a schoolgirl, as if simply allowing the truth to issue from her mouth, and giving her eyes alone a somewhat melancholy expression: 'But that's true, I've no reason to hide that I felt a sincere affection for Charles – There, you see, I'm not putting words into her mouth. And after that, he takes ingratitude to the point of being a Dreyfusard!'

'Talking of Dreyfusards, I said, it seems that Prince Von is one. – Ah, you do well to bring him up, exclaimed M. de Guermantes, I was about to forget that he's asked me to go and dine on Monday. But whether he's a Dreyfusard or not is all one to me, since he's a foreigner. I don't care two hoots. With a Frenchman, it's another matter. It's true Swann is a Jew. But up until today– forgive me, Froberville – I had been weak-minded enough to believe that a Jew can be a Frenchman, an honourable Jew, I mean, a man of the world. Now Swann was that in the full force of the word. Well, he's forcing me to acknowledge I was mistaken, since he's taking the side of this Dreyfus (who, guilty or not, is in no way part of his circle, and whom he can never have met) against a society that had adopted him, had treated him as one of its own. There's no getting away from it, we'd all have vouched for Swann, I'd have answered for his patriotism as for my own. And this is how he rewards us! I confess I would never have expected it, not from him. I thought better of him. He had a quick wit (in his own way, of course). I'm well aware he'd already committed the insanity of his shameful marriage. By the way, do you know someone who was greatly hurt by Swann's marriage? It was my wife. Oriane often has what I shall call an affectation of insensitivity. But deep down, she feels with an extraordinary intensity.' Mme de Guermantes, overjoyed at this analysis of her character, listened to it wearing a modest expression but did not say a word, not liking to acquiesce in the eulogy, but fearing above all to interrupt it. M. de Guermantes might have spoken for an hour on this subject and she would no more have moved than if they had been making music for her. 'Well, I recall when she heard about Swann's marriage, she felt offended; she decided it was wrong of someone to whom we had displayed so much friendship. She was very fond of Swann; she was greatly upset. Weren't you, Oriane?' Mme de Guermantes thought she must reply to so direct a challenge, on a point of fact that would enable her, without appearing to, to confirm the praises that she sensed were at an end. In a simple, diffident tone, and with an expression all the more studied for seeking to appear 'felt', she said demurely and softly: 'It's true, Basin is not mistaken. – Yet, it still wasn't the same thing. But what do you expect, love is love, although in my view it should stay within certain bounds. I might excuse a young man who's still wet behind the ears, letting himself be carried away by utopias. But Swann, an intelligent man, of a proven refinement, a shrewd connoisseur of paintings, a close friend of the Duc de Chartres, of Gilbert himself!' The tone in which M. de Guermantes had said this was yet perfectly sympathetic, with no hint of the vulgarity he too often showed. He spoke with a faintly indignant sadness, but everything about him breathed that gentle gravity which constitutes the broad and unctuous charm of certain figures in Rembrandt, the burgomaster Six[47] for example. You felt that the question of the immorality of Swann's conduct over the Affair did not even arise for the Duc, so beyond all doubt was it; he had experienced the affliction of a father seeing one of his children, for whose education he has made the greatest sacrifices, wilfully throwing away the magnificent situation he has created for him and, by indiscretions that the family's principles or prejudices can not allow, bringing dishonour on a respected name. It was true that M. de Guermantes had not manifested so profound and sorrowful an astonishment earlier on, when learning that Saint-Loup was a Dreyfusard. But for one thing he looked on his nephew as a young man who had taken the wrong path, and could do nothing that would surprise him until he had mended his ways, whereas Swann was what M. de Guermantes called 'a level-headed man, a man holding a position of the first rank'. Then again, and especially, quite some time had passed during which if, from the historical point of view, events had seemed in part to justify the Dreyfusist case, the anti-Dreyfusard opposition had become twice as violent and, from being purely political at the outset, had become social. It was now a question of militarism, of patriotism, and the waves of anger whipped up in society had had time to acquire the force they never have at the beginning of a storm. 'You see, M. de Guermantes went on, even from the point of view of his beloved Jews, since he insists absolutely on supporting them, Swann has made a blunder of incalculable import. He is proving that they are all secretly united and are somehow obliged to lend their support to someone of their own race, even if they don't know him. That is a public menace. We've obviously been too easy-going, and the gaffe Swann is committing will reverberate all the more inasmuch as he was held in high esteem, received even, and was just about the only Jew whom one knew. People will say to themselves: Ab uno disce omnes.'[48] (The satisfaction of having found in his memory, at the appointed moment, so opportune a quotation, alone caused a proud smile to illuminate the melancholy of the great nobleman betrayed.)

I had a strong desire to know what exactly had transpired between the Prince and Swann, and to see the latter, if he had not yet left the soirée. 'I must tell you, the Duchesse replied, to whom I had mentioned this desire, that I am not myself excessively anxious to see him because it seems, judging by what I was told a short while ago at Mme de Saint-Euverte's, that he would like before he dies for me to make the acquaintance of his wife and daughter. Heavens, it grieves me infinitely that he should be ill, but I hope first of all that it's not as serious as all that. And then, that's not after all a reason, because it would really be too simple. A writer devoid of talent would only have to say: "Vote for me at the Academy because my wife is going to die and I want to give her this last pleasure." There wouldn't be salons any more if one was obliged to make the acquaintance of all the dying. My coachman could use it on me: "My daughter's very ill, get me an invitation to the Princesse de Parme's."[49] I adore Charles, and it would upset me greatly to refuse him, which is why I prefer to avoid his asking me. I hope with all my heart that he's not dying, as he says he is, but truly, were that to happen, it would not be the moment for me to make the acquaintance of those two creatures who've deprived me of the most agreeable of my friends these past fifteen years, and whom he would leave on my hands at a time when I wouldn't even be able to take advantage of it to see him, since he'd be dead!'

But M. de Bréauté had not ceased to ponder the contradiction inflicted on him by Colonel de Froberville. 'I don't doubt the accuracy of your account, my dear friend, he said, but I had mine from a good source. It was the Prince de la Tour d'Auvergne who related it to me. – I'm astonished that a knowledgeable man like yourself should still say the Prince de la Tour d'Auvergne, the Duc de Guermantes broke in, you know he's nothing of the kind. There's only one member of that family left. That's Oriane's uncle, the Duc de Bouillon.[50] – The brother of Mme de Villeparisis?' I asked, recalling that the latter had been a Mlle de Bouillon. 'Exactly so. Oriane, Mme de Lambresac is wishing you good day.'

Indeed, a weak smile could be seen from time to time forming and vanishing like a shooting star, intended by the Duchesse de Lambresac for some person whom she had recognized. But instead of taking on definition as an active affirmation, in a language mute but clear, this smile was almost immediately drowned in a sort of ideal ecstasy that could discern nothing, while the head was inclined in a vacuous gesture of benediction reminiscent of that inclined towards the crowd of communicants by a somewhat doddery prelate. Mme de Lambresac was in no way doddery. But I was already familiar with this particular kind of obsolete refinement. In Combray and in Paris, all my grandmother's women friends were in the habit, at social gatherings, of greeting one another wearing as seraphic an expression as if they had just caught sight of someone of their acquaintance in church, at the moment of the Elevation or during a funeral, and were bidding them a limp good day that ended in a prayer. And some words of M. de Guermantes's were about to complete the comparison I was making. 'But you've seen the Duc de Bouillon, M. de Guermantes said to me. He was leaving my library a little while ago as you were going in, a gentleman short in stature, and white-haired.' He it was whom I had taken for some petty bourgeois from Combray but in whom I could now discern, on reflection, the resemblance to Mme de Villeparisis. The similarity between the evanescent greetings of the Duchesse de Lambresac and those of my grandmother's friends had begun to interest me, by demonstrating that in narrow and enclosed social circles, whether among the petty bourgeoisie or the high nobility, the old ways persist, enabling us to rediscover, like an archaeologist, how people may have been brought up, and the element of soul that it reflects, in the days of the Vicomte d'Arlincourt and Loïsa Puget.[51] Better still, the perfect conformity in appearance between a petty bourgeois of Combray of the same age and the Duc de Bouillon now reminded me (what had already struck me so forcibly when I saw Saint-Loup's maternal grandfather, the Duc de la Rochefoucauld, on a daguerreotype where, in dress, expression and manner, he was exactly like my great-uncle) that social, or indeed individual, differences merge over time into the uniformity of an epoch. The truth is that the similarity in dress, and the spirit of the age as it is echoed by the face, occupy so much more significant a place in someone than their caste, which occupies a large place only in the person in question's self-esteem and in the imagination of others, that, to be made aware that a great nobleman of Louis-Philippe's time differs less from a bourgeois of Louis-Philippe's time than from a great nobleman of the time of Louis XV, there is no need to walk the galleries of the Louvre.

At that moment, a long-haired Bavarian musician, a protégé of the Princesse de Guermantes, greeted Oriane. The latter replied by inclining her head, but the Duc, enraged at the sight of his wife saying good evening to someone he did not know, who had so very strange a look about him, and who, so far as M. de Guermantes thought he knew, had a very bad reputation, turned to his wife with a terrible and inquisitorial air, as if to say: 'Who is this Ostrogoth?' Poor Mme de Guermantes's situation was already somewhat complicated, and had the musician felt some pity for that martyred spouse, he would have taken himself off as quickly as possible. But, whether out of a desire not to tolerate the humiliation that had just been inflicted on him in public, in the midst of his oldest friends from the Duc's circle, whose presence may well have been in part the reason for his silent bow, and to show that it was by right, and not without knowing her, that he had greeted Mme de Guermantes, or whether in obedience to the obscure but irresistible inspiration of his gaffe, which – at a moment when he should rather have relied on his wits – urged him on to apply protocol to the letter, the musician approached Mme de Guermantes more closely still and said: 'Madame la Duchesse, I would like to solicit the honour of being presented to the Duc.' Mme de Guermantes was most unhappy. But in the end, for all that she was a deceived wife, she was still the Duchesse de Guermantes and could not appear to have been robbed of her right to introduce people whom she knew to her husband. 'Basin, she said, allow me to present M. d'Herweck.' 'I shan't ask you whether you're going tomorrow to Mme de Saint-Euverte's, said Colonel de Froberville to Mme de Guermantes, in order to dispel the uncomfortable impression produced by M. d'Herweck's untimely request. The whole of Paris will be there.' Meanwhile, turning in a single movement and as if he had no joints towards the tactless musician, the Duc de Guermantes, square on to him, monumental, unspeaking, wrathful, like Jove the Thunderer, remained thus without moving for several seconds, his eyes blazing with anger and astonishment, his frizzy hair seeming to emerge from a crater. Then, as if in the heat of an impulse that had alone enabled him to achieve the civility demanded of him, and after having seemed by his defiant posture to attest to those present that he did not know the Bavarian musician, he crossed his two white-gloved hands behind his back, tipped himself forward and dealt the musician a bow so profound, imbued with so much rage and stupefaction, so abrupt, so violent, that the trembling artist recoiled even as he leaned forward so as not to receive a formidable butt in the stomach. 'But it's just that I shan't be in Paris, replied the Duchesse to Colonel de Froberville. I must tell you (which I shouldn't admit) that I have reached my present age without having seen the stained-glass windows at Montfort-l'Amaury.[52] It's shameful but there you are. So, to make amends for this culpable neglect, I've promised myself to go and see them tomorrow.' M. de Bréauté gave a knowing smile. He understood indeed that, if the Duchesse had been able to go on not knowing the stained-glass windows of Montfort-l'Amaury up until her present age, this artistic visit had not all of a sudden taken on the urgent character of an 'emergency' operation and might, without danger, having been deferred for more than twenty-five years, been put back by twenty-four hours. The plan the Duchesse had formed was simply to decree, in the Guermantes manner, that the Saint-Euverte salon was decidedly not a truly respectable house, but a house to which you were invited so that you could be paraded in the account given in the Gaulois, a house that would confer a badge of supreme elegance on those women, or, in any event, on that woman if there were only one of them, who would not be seen there. The tactful amusement of M. de Bréauté, coupled with the poetic pleasure that society people felt when they saw Mme de Guermantes doing things that their own lesser situation did not allow them to imitate, but the mere spectacle of which produced in them the smile of the peasant tied to his glebe, who sees men freer and more fortunate than himself passing above his head, this refined pleasure bore no connection to the disguised but frenetic delight at once experienced by M. de Froberville.

The efforts M. de Froberville was making so that his laughter might not be heard had made him go as red as a rooster, in spite of which he interspersed his words with hiccups of joy as he exclaimed in a compassionate tone: 'Oh, poor aunt Saint-Euverte, what a song and dance she's going to make! No, the unfortunate woman isn't going to get her Duchesse, what a blow! It's enough to make her turn up her toes!' he added, doubled up with laughter. And in his euphoria he could not prevent himself from drumming his heels and rubbing his hands. Smiling out of one eye and only one corner of her mouth at M. de Froberville, whose friendly intentions she appreciated without finding him any less mortally tedious, Mme de Guermantes finally decided to leave him.

'Listen, I'm going to have to wish you good evening,' she said, getting to her feet with an air of melancholy resignation, as if this for her were a misfortune. Beneath the incantation of her blue eyes, her softly musical voice put one in mind of the poetic lament of a fairy. 'Basin wants me to go and see Marie for a bit.' In point of fact, she had had enough of listening to Froberville, who had not ceased envying her going to Montfort-l'Amaury, when she knew full well that this was the first he had heard of the stained-glass and, what was more, that he would not have relinquished the Saint-Euverte matinée for anything in the world. 'Goodbye, I've hardly spoken to you, that's how it is in society, we don't meet, we don't say the things we'd like to say to one another; anyway, it's the same everywhere in life. Let's hope it'll be better organized after we're dead. At least we won't always have to wear low-cut dresses. Yet who knows? Perhaps we shall show off our bones and our worms on big occasions. Why not? I say, look at old mother Rampillon, d'you see any great difference between that and a skeleton in an open dress? It's true she has every right, she's at least a hundred years old. She was already one of those sacred monsters I refused to curtsy to when I was starting out in society. I thought she'd died long since; which would as it happens be the one explanation for the spectacle she's offering us. It's impressive and liturgical. Pure "Campo Santo!" '[53] The Duchesse had left Froberville; he came closer: 'I'd like one last word with you.' A little irritated: 'What is it now?' she said haughtily. And he, having feared that she might change her mind about Montfort-l'Amaury at the last minute: 'I didn't dare mention it on account of Mme de Saint-Euverte, so as not to cause her any distress, but since you're not anticipating going, I can tell you I'm glad for your sake, because they've got measles in the house! – Oh, good Lord! said Oriane, who was afraid of diseases. But that doesn't worry me, I've already had it. You can't get it twice. – It's the doctors who say that; I know people who've had it up to four times. Anyway, you've been warned.' As for him, he would need actually to have had this fictitious measles and to be confined to his bed with it to resign himself to missing the Saint-Euverte party, looked forward to these many months. He would have the pleasure of seeing so many of the fashionable there, the greater pleasure of confirming that certain things had gone wrong, and the pleasure above all of being able to boast for a long time to come of having rubbed shoulders with the first and, by either exaggerating or inventing them, of deploring the second.

I took advantage of the fact that the Duchesse had changed her position to stand up also, so as to make my way to the smoking-room and inquire after Swann. 'Don't believe a word of what Babal's been recounting, she said to me. Never would the little Molé have gone poking her nose in there. They tell us that to lead us on. They receive no one and are invited nowhere. He himself admits it: "The two of us remain on our own by the fire." Because he always says "we", not like the King but on behalf of his wife, I don't insist. But I'm very well informed,' the Duchesse added. She and I passed two young men whose great but dissimilar beauty had its origins in the same woman. These were the two sons of Mme de Surgis, the Duc de Guermantes's new mistress. They were resplendent with their mother's perfections, but each with a different perfection. Into one there had passed, sinuous now in a male body, Mme de Surgis's regal bearing, and the same ardent, reddish, sacred pallor had flowed into the marmoreal cheeks of both the mother and this son; but his brother had received the Greek brow, the perfect nose, the statuesque neck, the boundless gaze; formed thus from the diverse gifts allotted by the goddess, their twofold beauty offered the abstract pleasure of reflecting that the cause of this beauty lay outside them; it was as if their mother's principal attributes had been incarnated in two different bodies; that one of these young men was his mother's stature and her complexion, the other her gaze, like those divine beings who were nothing more than the Strength and the Beauty of Jupiter or Minerva. Full of respect for M. de Guermantes, of whom they used to say: 'He's a great friend of our parents', the older one nevertheless thought it prudent not to come and greet the Duchesse, whom he knew, without perhaps understanding the reason, felt hostility towards his mother, and on seeing us he turned his head slightly away. The younger one, who always imitated his brother because, being stupid and short-sighted into the bargain, he did not dare have an opinion of his own, inclined his head at the same angle, and the two of them glided towards the card-room, one behind the other, like two allegorical figures.

Just as I arrived in this room, I was stopped by the Marquise de Citri, beautiful still though practically foaming at the mouth. Quite noble by birth, she had sought and made a brilliant match by marrying M. de Citri, whose great-grandmother was an Aumale-Lorraine.[54] But this satisfaction no sooner experienced, her negative character had led her to develop a deep dislike of people in high society, which did not absolutely rule out a social life. Not only, at a soirée, would she pour scorn on everyone, but this mockery had something so violent about it that even her laugh was insufficiently acerbic and turned into a guttural hissing: 'Oh! she said to me, pointing to the Duchesse de Guermantes, who had just left me and was already some little way off, what staggers me is that she can lead this sort of life.' Were these the words of an infuriated saint, astonished that the gentiles should not come to the truth of their own accord, or of an anarchist thirsting for bloodshed? At all events, such an apostrophe had no possible justification. In the first place, the 'life' that Mme de Guermantes led differed very little (indignation apart) from Mme de Citri's own life. Mme de Citri was astounded to find the Duchesse capable of this mortal sacrifice: of attending one of Marie-Gilbert's soirées. It has to be said that, in this particular instance, Mme de Citri was very fond of the Princesse, who was indeed very good-natured, and that she knew she was giving her great pleasure by attending her soirée. Thus, in order to come to this party, she had cancelled a ballerina whom she thought had genius and who was due to initiate her into the mysteries of Russian choreography. Another reason that somewhat devalued the concentrated fury felt by Mme de Citri when she saw Oriane greeting one or other guest is that, although at a much less advanced stage, Mme de Guermantes displayed the symptoms of the disease that was ravaging Mme de Citri. We have seen in any case that she had been carrying the germs of it since birth. Being more intelligent than Mme de Citri, Mme de Guermantes would have had better title than her to this nihilism (which was not only social), but it is a fact that certain virtues help us to tolerate our neighbour's failings rather than contributing to the pain that these cause us; a man of great ability will ordinarily pay less attention to other people's foolishness than would a fool. We have described the Duchesse's kind of cleverness at sufficient length to persuade anyone that, if it had nothing in common with high intelligence, it was at least cleverness, a cleverness adroit at employing (like a translator) different forms of syntax. But nothing of the sort seemed to entitle Mme de Citri to despise qualities so similar to her own. She considered everyone to be an idiot, but in her conversation, or in her letters, she showed herself inferior rather to the people whom she treated with such disdain. She had, moreover, so great a need to destroy that, once she had more or less renounced society, the pleasures she then sought after underwent, one after the other, her terrible powers of dissolution. Having abandoned soirées for musical evenings, she started saying: 'Do you like listening to that, to music? Good Lord, it depends on the moment. But it can be so very tedious! I mean, Beethoven, la barbe!'[55] With Wagner, then with Franck, and Debussy, she did not even trouble to say 'la barbe' but was content to pass her hand across her face, like a barber. Soon, what was tedious was everything. 'Beautiful things, they're so tedious! Paintings, they're enough to drive you mad… How right you are, it's so tedious, writing letters!' In the end it was life itself that she declared to us was a bore, without one quite knowing from where she was taking her term of comparison.

I do not know whether it was on account of what the Duchesse de Guermantes, on the first evening when I had dined with her, had said about this room, but the card-room or smoking-room, with its illustrated paving, its tripods, its faces of gods and animals that stared at you, the sphinxes lying along the arms of the seats, and especially the immense marble or enamelled mosaic table, covered with symbolic signs roughly copied from Egyptian or Etruscan art, had the effect on me of a veritable magician's cell. And on a seat drawn up to the sparkling augural table, M. de Charlus, touching none of the cards himself and oblivious to what was going on around him, incapable of noticing that I had just entered, seemed exactly like a magician applying the full force of his will-power and his reasoning to the casting of a horoscope. Not only were his eyes, like those of a Pythoness on her tripod, starting from his head, but, so that nothing might come to distract him from labours that required the cessation of the simplest movements, he had (like a calculator who means to do nothing else until such time as he has resolved his problem) put down beside him the cigar which, a short while before, he had had in his mouth but which he no longer had the necessary freedom of mind to smoke. On remarking the two crouched divinities borne on its arms by the chair set facing him, you might have thought that the Baron was seeking to solve the riddle of the Sphinx, had it not been rather that of a young and living Oedipus, sitting in that selfsame chair, where he had installed himself in order to play. Now the figure to which M. de Charlus was applying, and with such intensity, all his mental powers, and which was not, truth to tell, among those customarily studied more geometrico,[56] was that proposed to him by the lineaments of the young Marquis de Surgis's face; it seemed to be, so profound was M. de Charlus's absorption before it, some heraldic motto, some conundrum, some problem in algebra, the riddle or formula of which he was seeking to penetrate or reveal. In front of him, the sybilline signs and figures inscribed on this Table of the Law seemed to be the grimoire that would enable the old wizard to learn the direction in which the young man's destinies were oriented. All of a sudden, he saw that I was looking at him, raised his head as if emerging from a dream and smiled at me, blushing. At that moment, Mme de Surgis's other son came up to the one who was playing, to look at his cards. Once M. de Charlus had learned from me that they were brothers, his face could not disguise the admiration inspired in him by a family capable of creating such splendid yet such different masterpieces. And what would have added to the Baron's enthusiasm would have been to learn that the two sons of Mme Surgis-le-Duc had not only the same mother but the same father. The children of Jupiter are unalike, but that comes from the fact that he married first of all Metis, part of whose destiny it was to bring wise children into the world, then Themis, and next Eurynome, and Mnemosyne, and Leto, and Juno only last of all. But by the one father, Mme de Surgis had given birth to two sons who had each received beauties from her, but different beauties.

At last I had the pleasure of Swann's entry into the room, which was very large, so that he did not notice me straight away. A pleasure mixed with sadness, a sadness that the other guests perhaps did not feel, but which with them consisted in the sort of fascination exerted by the singular and unexpected forms of an imminent death, a death that is already, as the common people would put it, written on the face. And it was with an almost disobliging stupefaction, into which there entered a tactless curiosity, cruelty and an at once calm yet concerned moment of self-awareness (a mixture at once of suave mari magno and memento quia pulvis,[57] Robert would have said), that every gaze became fixed on that face whose cheeks had been so eroded by disease, like a waning moon, that, except from a certain angle, that no doubt from which Swann looked at himself, they stopped short, like an insubstantial stage-set to which an optical illusion alone can lend an appearance of depth. Whether because of the absence of the cheeks that were no longer there to diminish it, or whether arteriosclerosis, which is also a form of intoxication, had reddened it just as drink would have done, or deformed it, as morphine would have done, Swann's Punchinello nose, for so long reabsorbed into a pleasing face, now seemed enormous, tumid, crimson, more that of an old Hebrew than an inquisitive Valois.[58] Perhaps in any case, in recent days, the race had caused the physical type characteristic of it to reappear more pronouncedly in him, at the same time as a sense of moral solidarity with the other Jews, a solidarity that Swann seemed to have neglected throughout his life, but which the grafting, one on to the other, of a mortal illness, the Dreyfus Affair and anti-Semitic propaganda, had reawakened. There are certain Israelites, very shrewd and refined men of the world though they be, in whom a boor and a prophet remain in reserve, or in the wings, so as to make their entrance at a given moment in their lives, as in a play. Swann had arrived at the age of the prophet. Certainly, with this face from which, under the effect of his illness, whole segments had disappeared, as from a block of ice that is melting and from which entire slabs have fallen away, he was much changed. But I could not help but be struck by how much more he had changed in relation to myself. I could not manage to understand how I had been able once to inseminate this excellent, cultivated man, whom I was very far from being bored at meeting, with a mystery such that his appearance in the Champs-Elysées caused my heart to pound, to the point where I was ashamed to approach his silk-lined Inverness cape, and that at the door of the apartment where such a being lived, I could not ring without being seized by endless agitation and alarm; all this had vanished, not only from his home but from his person, and the thought of talking with him might or might not have been agreeable to me, but it had no effect whatsoever on my nervous system.

How he had changed, moreover, since that same afternoon, when I had come across him – only a few hours before after all – in the Duc de Guermantes's study! Had he really had an altercation with the Prince, which had shaken him up? The supposition was not necessary. The least effort that is demanded of someone who is very ill quickly becomes for him an excessive strain. Already tired, he need only be exposed to the heat of a soirée for his face to become distorted and to turn blue, as an overripe pear may in less than a day, or milk that is on the turn. Moreover, Swann's hair had thinned in places and, as Mme de Guermantes said, was in need of a furrier, it looked camphorated, and badly camphorated. I was about to cross the smoking-room to talk to Swann when, unfortunately, a hand came down on my shoulder: 'Hello, mon petit, I'm in Paris for forty-eight hours. I came round, I was told you were here, so it's to you my aunt owes the honour of my presence at her party.' It was Saint-Loup. I told him how beautiful I found the house. 'Yes, very much the historical monument. But I find it dreary myself. Don't let's get too close to my uncle Palamède, otherwise we'll be snapped up. As Mme Molé (for it's she who rules the roost at present) has just left, he's all at sea. It seems it was a real spectacle, he never strayed from her side, and only left her once he'd had her put into her carriage. I don't hold it against my uncle, only I find it comic that my family council, which has always come down so hard on me, should be made up of those very family members who've lived it up the most, starting with the most dissipated of the lot, my uncle Charlus, who's my surrogate tutor, who's had as many women as Don Juan, and who even at his age doesn't let up. There was a question at one time of my being made a ward of court. I imagine that when all those old lechers got together to consider the matter and sent for me to preach me a sermon and tell me I was causing distress to my mother, they can't have been able to look each other in the eye without laughing. Inspect the make-up of the council, they look to have deliberately picked the ones who've had their hands up the most skirts.' Leaving aside M. de Charlus, on the subject of whom my friend's surprise no longer seemed to me justified, but for other reasons, and ones which were as it happens to be modified later on in my mind, Robert was quite wrong to find it extraordinary that lessons in good behaviour should be given to a young man by family members who have led wild lives, or are still doing so.

Were atavism and family resemblances alone to be involved, it is inevitable that the uncle who issues the reprimand should have more or less the same failings as the nephew he has been charged with berating. This is not the uncle being hypocritical, however, deceived as he is by the capacity men possess for believing that each fresh set of circumstances means that 'things are different', a capacity that enables them to adopt artistic, political etc. errors without noticing that these are the very errors that they took to be truths ten years ago, apropos of another school of painting that they condemned, or another political affair that they thought merited their hatred, but which they have got over, and now espouse without recognizing them in their new disguise. Moreover, even if the uncle's faults are different from those of the nephew, heredity may still to a certain extent be the causal law, for the effect does not always resemble its cause, as a copy its original, and, even if the uncle's faults are worse, he may perfectly well believe them to be less serious.

When M. de Charlus had just been remonstrating indignantly with Robert, who anyway knew nothing of his uncle's true tastes in those days, and even if it had still been in the days when the Baron was denouncing his own tastes, he may perfectly well have been sincere in considering, from the point of view of a man of the world, that Robert was infinitely more blameworthy than himself. Had Robert not got himself all but ostracized from his society at the time when his uncle had been charged with making him see reason? Had he not come close to being blackballed at the Jockey Club? Was he not an object of ridicule for the sums he was lavishing on a woman of the lowest kind, for his friendships with people, authors, actors, Jews, not one of whom was a member of society, for his opinions, which were no different from those of traitors, for the pain he was causing to his whole family? How could this scandalous existence stand comparison with that of M. de Charlus, who had been able, up until now, not only to preserve but even to enhance his position as a Guermantes, being an absolutely privileged individual in society, sought after, adulated in the most select circles, and who, married to a Bourbon princess,[59] an eminent woman, had been able to make her happy, had devoted a cult to her memory that was more fervent and more exact than is customary in society, and had thus been as good a husband as he had been a son?

'But are you sure M. de Charlus has had so many mistresses?' I asked, certainly not with the diabolical intention of revealing to Robert the secret I had chanced upon, but irritated nonetheless by hearing him maintain an error with so much certainty and self-satisfaction. He merely shrugged in response to what he thought to be naïvety on my part. 'In any case, I'm not blaming him for it, I consider he's absolutely right.' And he began outlining a theory to me that would have horrified him at Balbec (where he had not been content merely to denounce seducers, death seeming to him the one punishment proportionate to the crime). But then he had been still in love, and jealous. He went so far as to sing the praises of houses of ill repute. 'It's only there you can find a shoe that fits, what in the regiment we call your own size.' He no longer felt the disgust for places of this sort that had excited him in Balbec when I alluded to them, and hearing him now, I told him that Bloch had introduced me to them, but Robert answered that the one to which Bloch went must have been 'exceedingly run-down, the poor man's paradise.' 'It depends, after all: where was it?' I avoided giving any details, for I remembered that it was there, in fact, that the Rachel with whom Robert had been so much in love used to give herself for one louis.[60] 'Anyway, I'll introduce you to far better ones, where some stunning women go.' Hearing me express the desire that he should take me as soon as possible to the ones he knew of, which had indeed to be much superior to the establishment that Bloch had pointed out to me, he evinced genuine regret at not being able to do so on this occasion as he was leaving again the following day. 'The next time I come, he said. You'll see, there are even young girls, he added with an air of mystery. There's a young Mademoiselle de…, d'Orgeville I believe, I'll tell you precisely, who's the daughter of people right out of the top drawer; the mother was born more or less a La Croix-l'Evêque, they're from the cream of society, some sort of relation, if I'm not mistaken, of my aunt Oriane's. Anyway, you've only to set eyes on the child to tell she's the daughter of people of substance (for a moment I was aware of the shadow of the Guermantes genius spreading itself over Robert's voice, which passed like a cloud, but at a great height, and did not pause). She looks to me like a marvellous prospect. The parents are always ill and can't look after her. The child is looking to amuse herself, believe me, and I rely on you to find distractions for her! – Oh, when will you be back? – I don't know; if you're not absolutely set on duchesses (that title being the only one that for the aristocracy denotes a peculiarly brilliant rank, just as among the lower orders they would say the same about princesses), in another line of country there's Mme Putbus's head lady's-maid.'

At that moment, Mme de Surgis entered the card-room to look for her sons. On noticing her, M. de Charlus went up to her with an affability by which the Marquise was all the more agreeably surprised for having expected great coldness from the Baron, he having always posed as Oriane's protector and, alone of the family – all too often indulgent of the Duc's whims because of his inheritance and out of jealousy with regard to the Duchesse – been merciless in keeping his brother's mistresses at arm's length. Thus Mme de Surgis might have well understood the motives of the attitude she feared in the Baron, but was far from suspecting those of the quite contrary welcome that she received from him. He spoke to her admiringly of the portrait that Jacquet[61] had made of her in the old days. This admiration grew even into an excitement which, if it was partly self-interested, in order to prevent the Marquise from moving away, to 'grapple' her, as Robert used to say of hostile armies whose fighting strength one wants to keep pinned down, may also have been sincere. For if everyone was pleased to admire in her sons Mme de Surgis's own queenly bearing and her eyes, the Baron was able to experience an inverse but equally keen pleasure in discovering these attractions converging once again in the mother, as in a portrait which does not itself kindle desires in us but nourishes those that it awakens with the aesthetic admiration that it inspires. These desires came retrospectively to lend a voluptuous charm to Jacquet's portrait itself, and at that moment the Baron would gladly have acquired it in order to study there the physiological genealogy of the two young Surgis. 'You can see I wasn't exaggerating, Robert said to me. Just look how attentive my uncle's being to Mme de Surgis. Yet even there, it surprises me. If Oriane knew, she'd be furious. Frankly, there are enough women without going and throwing yourself at that particular one,' he added; like all the people who are not in love, he imagined that we choose the person we love after endless deliberation and after taking account of various qualities and kinds of suitability. What was more, while being mistaken about his uncle, whom he thought was addicted to women, Robert, in his resentment, spoke of M. de Charlus too lightly. One is not always someone's nephew with impunity. It is very often by their intermediation that a hereditary habit is sooner or later handed down. A whole portrait gallery might be formed in this way, under the title of the German comedy, Uncle and Nephew,[62] in which the uncle would be seen watching to make sure, jealously if unwittingly, that his nephew ends up resembling him. I shall even add that this gallery would be incomplete if it were not made to include the uncles who are not bona fide relations, being only the uncles of the nephew's wife. The M. de Charluses of this world are so convinced indeed of being the only good husbands, the only ones what is more of whom a wife is not jealous, that generally speaking, out of affection for their niece, they make her, too, marry a Charlus. Which ravels the skein of family likenesses. And to affection for the niece is sometimes conjoined an affection for her fiancé, too. Such marriages are not uncommon, and are often what is called happy.

'What were we talking about? Oh, about that tall blonde, Mme Putbus's lady's-maid. She likes women, too, but I fancy you don't mind that; I can tell you honestly, I've never seen so lovely a creature. – I see her as somewhat Giorgione-like?[63] – Pure Giorgione! Oh, if only I had time to spend in Paris, what splendid things there are to do! And then, you move on to the next. Because love, that's just a joke, you know, I'm well and truly over all that.' I soon found, to my surprise, that he was no less over literature, too, whereas it was only with the littérateurs that he had seemed to be disenchanted at our last meeting ('They're nearly all of them thoroughly bad lots,' he had told me), which could have been explained by his justified resentment against certain of Rachel's friends. They, indeed, had convinced her that she would never have any talent if she allowed Robert, 'a man of another race', to acquire influence over her, and, along with her, they made fun of him, to his face, at the dinner-parties he gave for them. But in actual fact, Robert's love of Letters had not gone very deep, it did not emanate from his true nature, it was only a by-product of his love for Rachel, and had been erased along with it, at the same time as his abhorrence of voluptuaries and his religious respect for women's virtue.

'What a strange look those two young men have! See, Marquise, that curious passion for cards, Marquise,' said M. de Charlus, pointing her two sons out to Mme de Surgis, as if he had absolutely no idea who they were. 'They must be two Orientals, they have certain characteristic features, perhaps they're Turks,' he added, at once to further establish his feigned innocence and to attest to a vague antipathy which, when next it gave way to affability, would prove that this last was addressed purely to their status as sons of Mme de Surgis, having begun only when the Baron had learned who they were. Perhaps also M. de Charlus, whose insolence was a gift of nature that he took delight in exercising, was taking advantage of the short time during which he was supposed not to know who these young men were to amuse himself at the expense of Mme de Surgis and to indulge in his customary raillery, just as Scapin turns his master's being in disguise to profit by laying vigorously about him with a stick.[64]

'They're my sons,' said Mme de Surgis, going red, as she would not have done had she been subtler without being any more virtuous. She would then have understood that the expression of absolute indifference or raillery that M. de Charlus was exhibiting towards a young man wasn't sincere any more than the wholly superficial admiration that he evinced for a woman expressed the true depths of his nature. The woman to whom he might have gone on indefinitely making the most complimentary remarks might have been jealous of the look which, even as he talked to her, he was casting at a man whom he then pretended not to have remarked. For that particular look was a look different from those which M. de Charlus had for women; a particular look that rose from the depths, and which, even at a soirée, ingenuously, he could not prevent himself casting at young men, like the glances of a couturier, which betray his profession by the way they have of at once fastening on to the clothes.

'Oh, how strange!' replied M. de Charlus, not without insolence, while seeming to make his thoughts travel a long way to bring them back to a reality very different from that which he had pretended to assume. 'But I don't know them,' he added, afraid of having gone a little too far in expressing antipathy and of having thereby paralysed in the Marquise her intention of making them acquainted to him. 'Would you like to allow me to introduce them to you?' asked Mme de Surgis diffidently. – But, good Lord, whatever you think, I'm very willing, I'm not so very entertaining a personage perhaps for such young men,' intoned M. de Charlus, with the air of hesitation and coldness of someone allowing a politeness to be wrested from him. 'Arnulphe, Victurnien, come quickly,' said Mme de Surgis. Victurnien stood up unhesitatingly. Arnulphe, without seeing further than his brother, followed him submissively.

'It's the sons' turn now, then, Robert said to me. What a scream. Right down to the household dog, he strives to please.[65] It's all the more comic in that my uncle detests gigolos. And see how earnestly he's listening to them. If it'd been me who wanted to introduce them to him, he'd have soon sent me packing. Listen, I'm going to have to go and say hello to Oriane. I've so little time to spend in Paris that I want to try to see everyone here that otherwise I'd have to leave cards with.' 'How well brought up they seem, and what pretty manners they have, M. de Charlus was in the midst of saying. – You think so?' replied Mme de Surgis, enraptured.

Swann, having caught sight of me, came up to Saint-Loup and me. With Swann, a Jewish cheerfulness was less discriminating than the pleasantries of the man of the world. 'Good evening, he said to us. Good Lord! All three of us together, they're going to think it's a meeting of the Syndicate. In a minute they'll be looking to see where the cashbox is!' He had not noticed that M. de Beaucerfeuil was behind him and could hear him. The General gave an involuntary frown. We could hear the voice of M. de Charlus close beside us: 'What, your name's Victurnien, like in the Cabinet des Antiques?'[66] said the Baron in order to prolong the conversation with the two young men. 'By Balzac, yes,' answered the elder of the Surgis, who had never read a single line of that novelist, but whose form master had pointed out to him, a few days before, the similarity between his first name and that of d'Esgrignon. Mme de Surgis was overjoyed to see her son excelling himself and M. de Charlus in ecstasies at meeting with so much knowledge.

'It seems Loubet[67] is entirely for us, from an altogether reliable source,' Swann said to Saint-Loup, but this time dropping his voice so as not to be overheard by the General, his wife's Republican connections having become more advantageous to him since the Dreyfus Affair had been at the centre of his concerns. 'I'm telling you this because I know you're with us all the way.'

'No, not that far; you're completely mistaken, answered Robert. The whole affair began badly and I very much regret sticking my nose in. It had nothing to do with me. If I could start again, I'd keep well out of the way. I'm a soldier and for the Army above all. If you remain for a minute with M. Swann, I'll find you again in a little while, I'm going over to my aunt.' But I could see that it was with Mlle d'Ambresac that he was going to talk and I was chagrined to think that he had lied to me about their possible engagement. I felt easier in my mind when I learned that he had been introduced to her half an hour before by Mme de Marsantes, who wanted the marriage, the Ambresacs being very wealthy.

‘At last, said M. de Charlus to Mme de Surgis, I find a young man of education, who has read, who knows who Balzac is. And it gives me all the more pleasure to meet him here, where it’s become such a rarity, in the house of one of my peers, one of us,’ he added, laying stress on these words. In vain did the Guermantes make a pretence of finding all men equal, on the great occasions when they found themselves with people who were ‘well-born’, and especially less ‘well-born’, whom they desired and were able to flatter, they did not hesitate to bring out old family memories. ‘In the old days, the Baron went on, aristocrats meant the best, in intelligence, and in feeling. Yet here’s the first one amongst us that I find knows who Victurnien d’Esgrignon is. I’m wrong to say the first. There’s also a Polignac and a Montesquiou,[68] added M. de Charlus, knowing that this double assimilation could but go to the Marquise’s head. Your sons, moreover, have someone to take after, their maternal grandfather had a celebrated eighteenth-century collection. I will show you my own if you’ll do me the pleasure of coming to have lunch one day, he said to the young Victurnien. I’ll show you a curious edition of the Cabinet des Antiques with corrections in Balzac’s own hand. I shall be charmed to bring the two Victurniens face to face.’

I could not make up my mind to leave Swann. He had arrived at that degree of fatigue in which the body of a sick man is no more than a retort in which chemical reactions are to be observed. His face was marked with small specks of Prussian blue, which appeared not to belong to the world of the living, and gave off that kind of smell which, at school, after ‘experiments’, makes it so unpleasant to remain in a ‘Science’ classroom. I asked him whether he had not had a long conversation with the Prince de Guermantes and whether he did not want to recount to me what form it had taken. ‘Yes, indeed, he said, but first go for a moment with M. de Charlus and Mme de Surgis, I’ll wait for you here.’

In fact, M. de Charlus having suggested to Mme de Surgis leaving this overheated room and going to sit for a minute with her in another, had not asked her two sons to go with their mother, but me. In this way, he made it seem, having baited his hook, that he did not care about the two young men. He was, moreover, paying me a cheap compliment, Mme de Surgis-le-Duc being somewhat disapproved of.

Unfortunately, scarcely were we seated in a bay without any exit before Mme de Saint-Euverte, the target of the Baron’s jibes, chanced to come by. She, in order perhaps to dissemble, or to disregard openly the hostile feelings she inspired in M. de Charlus, but above all to show she was on intimate terms with a lady who was talking so familiarly with him, wished the celebrated beauty a disdainfully amicable good day, who replied to it, while glancing at M. de Charlus out of the corner of her eye, with a mocking smile. But so constricted was the bay that when Mme de Saint-Euverte wanted, behind us, to continue flushing out her next day’s guests, she found herself trapped and unable easily to disengage herself, a precious moment which M. de Charlus, anxious to show off his insolent verve to the watching mother of the two young men, took good care not to waste. An inane question that I put to him, without malice, furnished him with the opportunity for a triumphal diatribe of which the wretched Saint-Euverte, almost immobilized behind us, could hardly have lost a single word. ‘Would you believe that this impertinent young man, he said, indicating me to Mme de Surgis, has just asked me, with none of the care one ought to take to hide these sorts of needs, whether I was going to Mme de Saint-Euverte’s, that is, I fancy, whether I had the colic.[69] I should attempt in any case to relieve myself in some more comfortable spot than at the house of someone who, if memory serves, was celebrating her centenary when I was making my entry into society, i.e. not chez elle. Yet who would be more interesting to listen to than her? So many historical memories, seen or lived through, from the days of the First Empire and the Restoration,[70] so many intimate stories, too, with nothing “Saint-ly” about them for sure but that must have been very “vertes”,[71] to judge by how she still frisks about on those venerable hams! What would stop me from interrogating her about those exciting times is the sensitivity of my olfactory apparatus. Mere proximity to the lady is enough. I suddenly say to myself: “Oh, good God, someone’s burst my cesspit,” but it’s simply that the Marquise, with the aim of getting some invitation, has just opened her mouth. And you’ll understand that were I to have the misfortune to go to her, the cesspit would be multiplied into a fearsome barrelful of sewage. Yet she bears a mystical name that always makes me think jubilantly, though she has long since passed the date of her own jubilee, of that stupid line of so-called “deliquescent” poetry: “Ah! Verte, combien verte était mon âme ce jour-là…”[72] But I need more wholesome greenery. I’m told that this indefatigable old street-walker gives “garden-parties”, myself, I’d call them “invitations to a stroll in the sewers”. Are you going to filthy yourself there?’ he asked Mme de Surgis, who this time found herself in difficulties. For, wishing to pretend to the Baron that she wasn’t going yet knowing that she would give days of her life rather than miss the Saint-Euverte matinée, she got out of it by a compromise, by uncertainty that is. This uncertainty took so stupidly dilettantish, and so miserably wardrobe-minded a form, that M. de Charlus, unafraid of giving offence to Mme de Surgis, whom he was on the other hand anxious to please, started to laugh to show her that ‘it didn’t wash’ with him.

‘I always admire the people who make plans, she said; I often cancel at the last minute. There’s the question of a summer gown that may alter things. I shall act on the inspiration of the moment.’

For my own part, I was indignant at the abominable short speech that M. de Charlus had just delivered. I would have liked to shower the giver of garden-parties with good things. In society, alas, as in the world of politics, the victims are so cowardly that you can not hold it against their executioners for long. Mme de Saint-Euverte, who had managed to extricate herself from the bay the entrance to which we had been obstructing, brushed unintentionally against the Baron in passing and, in a reflex of snobbery that annihilated all the anger in her, perhaps even in hopes of an overture of a kind at which this cannot have been her first attempt, exclaimed: ‘Oh, forgive me, Monsieur de Charlus, I hope I didn’t hurt you,’ as if she were kneeling before her lord and master. The latter did not deign to reply other than by a bold, ironic laugh and granted her only a ‘good evening’ which, as if he had only become aware of the Marquise’s presence once she had been the first to greet him, was one insult the more. At last, with a supreme obsequiousness which made me bleed for her, Mme de Saint-Euverte came up to me, and, after taking me aside, said into my ear: ‘But how have I offended M. de Charlus? They claim he doesn’t consider me smart enough for him,’ she said, laughing uproariously. I remained serious. For one thing, I found it stupid that she should appear to think or to want it thought that no one was in actual fact as smart as she was. And for another thing, people who laugh so loudly at what they say, when it is not funny, thereby excuse us from joining in by taking all the hilarity on themselves.

‘Others assure me that he’s put out I don’t invite him. But he doesn’t give me much encouragement. He looks to be avoiding me (the expression struck me as feeble). Try to find out and come and tell me tomorrow. And if he feels remorse and wants to come with you, bring him. Mercy for all sinners. It would even quite please me, on account of Mme de Surgis, whom it’d annoy. I give you carte blanche. You’ve got the most discerning flair for all that sort of thing and I don’t want to seem to be angling for guests. At all events, on you, I count absolutely.’

I reflected that Swann must be getting tired of waiting for me. I did not want, moreover, to be too late returning home because of Albertine, and taking leave of Mme de Surgis and M. de Charlus, I went to find my invalid again in the card-room. I asked him whether what he had said to the Prince during their conversation in the garden was indeed what M. de Bréauté (whom I did not name) had retailed to us and which had to do with a playlet by Bergotte. He burst out laughing: ‘There’s not a word of truth in it, not one, it’s a complete invention and would have been totally stupid. Really, it’s unbelievable, this spontaneous generation of error. I shan’t ask you who told you that, but it would be really intriguing, in a setting as confined as this, to go back step by step and find out how it took shape. Moreover, how can what the Prince said to me be of any interest to anyone? People are very inquisitive. I’ve never been inquisitive myself, except when I’ve been in love and when I was jealous. And for all that that taught me! Are you jealous?’ I told Swann that I had never felt jealousy, that I did not even know what it was. ‘Well, I congratulate you! When you’re a little bit jealous, it’s not altogether unpleasant, from two points of view. For one thing, because it enables people who are not inquisitive to interest themselves in the lives of other people, or at least of one other person. And then, because it gives you quite a good sense of the sweetness of possession, of getting into a carriage with a woman, of not letting her go off alone. But that’s only in the very early stages of the disease or when the cure is almost complete. In between, it’s the most frightful of tortures. Moreover, I have to say that I’ve seldom experienced even the two forms of sweetness I’m referring to; the first by the fault of my nature, which is incapable of any very prolonged reflection; the second because of circumstances, by the fault of the woman, I mean of the women, of whom I've been jealous. But that doesn't matter. Even when you no longer care about things, it still means something that you did so once, because it was always for reasons that escaped other people. We feel that the memory of those feelings is only in us; it's into ourselves we must return in order to look at it. Don't make too much fun of the idealist jargon, but what I mean is that I've loved life and have loved the arts. Well, now that I'm a bit too tired to live with other people, these old feelings that I've had, so personal to myself, seem very precious to me, which is the obsession of every collector. I open up my heart to myself like a sort of showcase, and I look one by one at so many loves that other people won't have known. And, about this collection, to which I'm now even more attached than to other people, I tell myself, a little like Mazarin with his books,[73] but without any anguish as it happens, that it will be very tiresome to leave it all behind. But let's get on to my conversation with the Prince, I'm only going to tell one person about it, and that person shall be you.' My hearing him was made harder by the conversation that, right beside us, M. de Charlus, who had returned to the card-room, was prolonging indefinitely. 'And do you read, too? What do you do?' he asked the Comte Arnulphe, who did not know even the name of Balzac. But his short-sightedness, because he saw everything very small, made him appear to be seeing from a long way off, so that, a rare touch of poetry in a statuesque Greek god, remote and mysterious stars were as if inscribed in his pupils.

'Suppose we take a short turn in the garden, Monsieur,' I said to Swann, while the Comte Arnulphe, in a lisping voice that seemed to indicate that his mental development at least was incomplete, answered M. de Charlus with an artless and obliging precision: 'Oh, with me it's more golf, tennis, football, running, polo especially.' Just so, having subdivided herself, did Minerva, in a certain city, cease from being the goddess of Wisdom and incarnate one part of herself in a purely sporting, hippic divinity, 'Athena Hippia'. He also went to Saint-Moritz to ski, for Pallas Tritogeneia frequents the high peaks and outruns horsemen.[74] 'Ah!' replied M. de Charlus, with the transcendent smile of the intellectual who does not even take the trouble to hide that he is making fun, but who anyway feels so superior to other people, and so despises the intelligence of those who are the least stupid, that he hardly differentiates between them and those who are the most stupid, as soon as they can be agreeable to him in some other fashion. By the mere act of talking to Arnulphe, M. de Charlus considered that he was conferring on him a superiority that the whole world must envy and acknowledge. 'No, Swann replied, I'm too tired to walk, let's rather sit down in some corner, I can't stand any longer.' This was true, yet starting to talk had already given him back a certain animation. The fact is that, even in the most genuine fatigue, especially among the nervous, there is an element that depends on our awareness and is preserved only by the memory. We are suddenly weary the moment that we fear being so, and to overcome our fatigue it is enough to forget it. True, Swann was not quite one of those exhausted indefatigables who, having arrived drained, wilting, ready to drop, revive in conversation like a flower in water and can, for hours on end, draw, from their own words, a strength that they cannot, alas, transmit to those who are listening to them, who appear more and more dejected the more wide awake the speaker feels. But Swann belonged to that strong Jewish race, in whose vital energy and resistance to death its individuals themselves seem to share. Struck down by their particular illness, as it itself has been by persecution, they each struggle indefinitely in a terrible death agony that may be prolonged beyond any probable term, when all that can now be seen is a prophet's beard crowned by an immense nose, dilated in order to draw the final breaths, before the time comes for the ritual prayers and the punctual file-past to begin, of distant relatives, moving mechanically forward, as on an Assyrian frieze.

We went to sit down, but before moving away from the group formed by M. de Charlus, the two young Surgis and their mother, Swann could not help fixing the latter's corsage with the lengthy, dilated, lustful glances of a connoisseur. He put in his monocle so as to have a better view and, even as he was talking to me, he would now and again cast a glance in that lady's direction. 'Here, word for word, is my conversation with the Prince, he said to me once we were seated, and if you recall what I told you just now, you'll see why I have chosen you as a confidant. And then for another reason, too, as you'll find out one day. "My dear Swann, the Prince de Guermantes said to me, you'll forgive me if I've seemed to be avoiding you for some little time. (I'd noticed nothing of the kind, being ill and myself avoiding company.) In the first place, I'd heard, and could indeed foresee, that you held, in this unfortunate affair that is dividing the country, opinions wholly opposed to my own. Now it would have been pained me exceedingly had you professed them in my presence. So great was my nervousness that, the Princesse having heard her brother-in-law, the Grand-Duke of Hesse,[75] say two years ago that Dreyfus was innocent, she didn't simply pick up on the remark very promptly, she didn't repeat it so as not to annoy me. At almost the same time, the Swedish Crown Prince[76] had come to Paris and, having probably heard that the Empress Eugénie was a Dreyfusiste,[77] got her confused with the Princesse (an odd confusion, you'll admit, between a woman of my wife's rank and a Spaniard, far less well born than they say and married to a mere Bonaparte) and said to her: "Princesse, I'm doubly glad to meet you, because I know you have the same ideas as I do about the Dreyfus Affair, which doesn't surprise me since your Highness is from Bavaria." Which earned the Prince this reply: "Monseigneur, I'm nothing more than a French princess, and I think as all my compatriots do." Now, my dear Swann, about a year and a half ago, a conversation I had with General de Beaucerfeuil gave me to suspect that, not an error, but grave illegalities had been committed in the conduct of the trial." '

We were interrupted (Swann was anxious that his account should not be overheard) by the voice of M. de Charlus, who (without concerning himself with us) was on his way past, escorting Mme de Surgis out, and stopped in order to try and detain her further, either on account of her sons, or from that desire which the Guermantes had not to see the present moment brought to an end, which plunged them into a sort of anxious inertia. In which connection, Swann told me something a little later on that removed from the name of Surgis-le-Duc all the poetry I had been finding in it. The Marquise de Surgis-le-Duc had a far higher place in society, and far better connections by marriage, than her cousin, the Comte de Surgis, who was poor and lived on his estates. But the word that ended the title, 'le Duc', was far from having the origin I had been lending to it, which had led me to compare it, in my imagination, to Bourg l'Abbé, Bois-le-Roi and the like.[78] Quite simply, during the Restoration, a Comte de Surgis had married the daughter of an extremely wealthy industrialist, M. Leduc, or Le Duc, himself the son of a manufacturer of chemical products, the wealthiest man of his day, and who was a peer of France.[79] For the male issue of this marriage, King Charles X had created the marquisate of Surgis-le-Duc, the marquisate of Surgis existing already in the family. The addition of the bourgeois name had not prevented this branch, on account of its enormous fortune, from marrying into the first families of the realm. And the present Marquise de Surgis-le-Duc, with her high birth, might have had a position of the first rank. A demon of perversity had driven her, despising a ready-made position, to flee the conjugal home, and to live in the most scandalous fashion. Then, the world she had despised as a twenty-year-old, when it was at her feet, failed her cruelly at thirty, when, for the last ten years, no one, bar a few faithful woman friends, any longer acknowledged her, and she had undertaken painstakingly to reconquer, bit by bit, what she had possessed at her birth (a not uncommon return journey).

As for the great noblemen, her kinsfolk, disowned of old by her and who had disowned her in their turn, she excused herself for the delight she would take in getting them back by the childhood memories she would be able to evoke with them. In saying which, in order to disguise her snobbery, she was perhaps being less untruthful than she thought. 'Basin, it's my whole youth!' she said on the day when he returned to her. And indeed, there was some truth in this. But she had miscalculated in choosing him for a lover. For all the Duchesse de Guermantes's woman friends would be taking her side, and Mme de Surgis would thus descend for a second time the slope she had had so much difficulty in reascending. 'Well,' M. de Charlus was in the midst of saying to her, anxious to keep the conversation going, 'you must lay my tribute at the feet of the beautiful portrait. How is it? What's become of it? – But you know, I no longer have it, replied Mme de Surgis, my husband wasn't happy with it. – Not happy! With one of the masterpieces of the age, the equal of Nattier's Duchesse de Châteauroux[80] and which aspired, moreover, to capture a goddess no less murderous and majestic! Oh, that little blue collar! That's to say, never did Vermeer paint a fabric with greater mastery, let's not say that too loudly so Swann doesn't attack us with the intention of avenging his favourite painter, the master of Delft.' The Marquise, turning round, addressed a smile and held out her hand to Swann, who had risen to greet her. But, almost without disguising it, the advancing years having perhaps deprived him, either of the moral will, out of an indifference to public opinion, or else of the physical capability, out of a heightening of desire and a weakening of the mechanisms that help to conceal it, the moment Swann had, as he shook the Marquise's hand, seen her bosom from close to and from above, he plunged an attentive, serious, absorbed, almost anxious, gaze into the depths of her corsage, and his nostrils, intoxicated by the woman's perfume, quivered like a butterfly ready to go and settle on the half-glimpsed flower. Abruptly, he tore himself free from the vertigo that had gripped him, and, so contagious at times is desire, Mme de Surgis herself, though embarrassed, suppressed a deep sigh. 'The painter was put out, she said to M. de Charlus, and took it back. People have said it's now at Diane de Saint-Euverte's. – I shall never believe, answered the Baron, that a masterpiece could have such poor taste.'

'He's talking to her about her portrait. I could talk to her about that portrait as well as Charlus, Swann said, affecting a drawling, louche tone and following the retreating couple with his eyes. And it would surely give me more pleasure than Charlus,' he added. I asked him whether what was said about M. de Charlus was true, in which I lied twice over, for if I did not know whether anything had ever been said, I knew very well on the other hand, from a little earlier, that what I had meant was true. Swann shrugged, as if I had proffered an absurdity. 'That's to say he's a delightful friend. But do I need to add that it's purely Platonic. He's more sentimental than others, that's all; on the other hand, because he never goes very far with women, that's given a sort of credibility to the nonsensical rumours you want to talk about. Charlus is very fond of his friends perhaps, but take my word for it, that has never happened anywhere except in his head and in his heart. Anyway, we're perhaps going to get a couple of seconds' peace and quiet. So, the Prince de Guermantes went on: "I'll admit to you that this notion, of a possible illegality in the conduct of the trial, was extremely painful to me because, as you know, of the reverence I have for the Army; I raised it again with the General, and I no longer had any doubts on that score, alas! I shall tell you frankly that the idea that in all this an innocent man might have suffered the most ignominious of punishments had never even crossed my mind. But, tormented by this idea of illegality, I set to studying what I had refused to read, and that was when I became haunted by doubts, not just about the illegality this time but about his innocence. I didn't think I should mention it to the Princesse. God knows she's become as French as I am. After all, I'd made such a point, from the day I married her, of showing her our France in all her beauty, and what for me is the most splendid thing about her, her Army, that it was too cruel for me to let her into my suspicions, which only affected, it's true, a few officers. But I'm from a family of soldiers, I refused to believe that officers could be wrong. I raised it yet again with Beaucerfeuil, he confessed to me that guilty machinations had been set on foot, that the bordereau wasn't perhaps by Dreyfus, but that there existed glaring proof of his guilt. This was the Henry document.[81] And a few days later, we learnt it was a forgery. From then on, on the sly from the Princesse, I started reading Le Siècle and L'Aurore[82] every day; soon I was no longer in any doubt, I could no longer sleep. I unburdened myself of my moral sufferings to our friend, the Abbé Poiré, whom I was astonished to find had the same conviction, and I had Masses said by him for Dreyfus, for his unfortunate wife and his children. At which juncture, one morning when I went in to the Princesse, I saw her lady's-maid hiding something she'd had in her hand. I laughed and asked her what it was, she went red and wouldn't tell me. I had the utmost confidence in my wife, but this incident greatly disturbed me (the Princesse, too, no doubt, her lady's-maid must have told her about it), because my dear Marie hardly spoke to me during the lunch that followed. That was the day when I asked the Abbé Poiré if he could say my Mass for Dreyfus the next day." Oh no!' exclaimed Swann in a low voice, breaking off. I looked up and saw the Duc de Guermantes coming towards us. 'Forgive my disturbing you, mes enfants. Young fellow, he said, addressing himself to me, I am delegated to speak to you by Oriane. Marie and Gilbert have asked her to stay and have supper at their table with five or six people only: the Princesse de Hesse, Mme de Ligne, Mme de Tarente, Mme de Chevreuse and the Duchesse d'Arenberg.[83] Unfortunately, we can't stay, because we're going to a small costume ball of sorts.' I was listening, but whenever we have something to do at an appointed moment, we depute a certain personage inside us accustomed to this sort of task to keep an eye on the clock and give us due warning. This internal servant reminded me, as I had asked him to a few hours earlier, that Albertine, at that moment very far from my thoughts, was to come round straight after the theatre. So I turned down the supper. It was not that I was not enjoying myself at the Princesse de Guermantes's. Men may thus have several sorts of pleasures. The true pleasure is that for which they give up another. But this last, if it is apparent, or is alone apparent even, may act as a decoy for the first one, may reassure the jealous or throw them off the scent, may lead the world astray. And yet, a little happiness or a little suffering is all it takes for us to sacrifice it to the other pleasure. Sometimes a third order of pleasures, more serious but more essential, does not yet exist for us, whose virtuality betrays itself only by arousing regrets or discouragement. It is to these pleasures, however, that we shall give ourselves later on. To give an altogether minor example, a soldier in time of peace will sacrifice his social life to love, but once war is declared (and without there being any need even to introduce the notion of a patriotic duty), love to the passion, stronger than love, for fighting. For all that Swann had said he was glad to be recounting his history to me, I felt strongly that, because of the lateness of the hour, and because he was too unwell, his conversation with me was one of those exertions for which those who know that they are killing themselves by late nights, and by excess, feel an exasperated regret on returning home, like that felt by prodigals at the huge sums they have once again spent, yet who will be unable to prevent themselves on the morrow from tossing money out of the window. Once past a certain degree of weakness, whether it be caused by age or by sickness, any pleasure indulged at the expense of sleep, outside our habits, any disruption, becomes a worry. The talker continues to talk out of politeness, or of excitement, but he knows that the hour when he might still have been able to get to sleep has already passed, and knows, too, the reproaches he will be directing at himself during the insomnia and tiredness that will ensue. Already, moreover, even the momentary pleasure has come to an end, mind and body are too drained of their energies to welcome with pleasure what to your interlocutor seems like a distraction. They resemble an apartment on a day of departure or removal, when the visits we receive sitting on trunks, our eyes glued to the clock, are such drudgery. 'Alone at last, he said to me; I no longer know where I'd got to. I told you, didn't I, that the Prince had asked the Abbé Poiré if he could have his Mass said for Dreyfus. "No," was the Abbé's reply to me (I say me, Swann said, because it's the Prince talking to me, you understand?), "because I've another Mass I've been instructed to say for him also this morning." – What, I said to him, there's another Catholic besides myself who's convinced of his innocence? – So it would seem. – But this other supporter's conviction must be more recent than my own. – But this supporter was already making me say Masses when you still thought Dreyfus to be guilty. – Oh, I can tell it's not someone from our circle. – On the contrary! – Really, there are Dreyfusistes among us? You intrigue me; I'd like to unburden myself to this rara avis, if I know them. – You do know them. – Their name? – The Princesse de Guermantes." While I had been afraid of upsetting nationalist opinions, the French faith of my dear wife had been afraid on the other hand of alarming my religious opinions, my patriotic sentiments. But on her side, she'd been thinking as I had, though for longer than me. And what her maid had been hiding on entering her room, what she went out to buy her every day, was L'Aurore. There and then, my dear Swann, I thought of the pleasure I'd give you by telling you how closely akin my ideas on the matter were to your own; forgive me for not having done so sooner. If you go back to the silence I had maintained vis-à-vis the Princesse, you won't be surprised that being of the same mind as you should then have kept me away from you even more than thinking differently from you. For I found the subject infinitely painful to broach. The more I believe that an error, that crimes even have been committed, the more I bleed in my love for the Army. I'd have thought that opinions similar to mine were far from filling you with the same sadness, when I was told the other day that you had strongly condemned the insults to the Army and that the Dreyfusistes should have agreed to ally themselves with the insulters. That decided me, I'll admit I found it cruel to confess to you what I think of certain officers, few in number happily, but it's a relief for me not to have to keep my distance from you any longer and especially that you should feel that, if my feelings may have been other, it was because I was in no doubt at all as to the soundness of the verdict. As soon as I felt any doubt, I could wish for only one thing, for the error to be put right." I confess to you that these words of the Prince de Guermantes moved me profoundly. If you knew him as I do, if you knew from where he had had to return to get to this point, you would feel admiration for him, and he deserves it. Not that his opinion surprises me, he's so upright a character!' Swann was forgetting that, that same afternoon, he had said to me on the contrary that opinions in the Dreyfus Affair were governed by atavism. At most, he had made an exception for intelligence, since in Saint-Loup's case it had succeeded in getting the better of atavism and making him into a Dreyfusard. But he had just found that this victory was of short duration and that Saint-Loup had gone over to the enemy. So the role devolved a little earlier on to intelligence was now given to uprightness of heart. In point of fact, we always discover after the event that our adversaries had a reason for taking the side they do take, and one that does not depend on the degree to which that side is in the right, and that those who think as we do have been constrained to do so by, if their moral nature is too contemptible to be invoked, intelligence, and if they have no great acumen, uprightness.

Swann now found those who were of his opinion to be uniformly intelligent, his old friend the Prince de Guermantes and my school-fellow Bloch, whom he had hitherto kept at arm's length but whom he invited to lunch. Swann interested Bloch greatly by telling him that the Prince de Guermantes was a Dreyfusard. 'We must ask him to sign our lists for Picquart;[84] with a name like his, that would have a tremendous effect.' But Swann, tempering the burning conviction of the Israelite with the diplomatic moderation of the man about town, whose habits he had imbibed too deeply to be able this belatedly to shed them, refused to sanction Bloch's sending the Prince a round-robin to sign, even a seemingly spontaneous one. 'He can't do that, one mustn't ask for the impossible, repeated Swann. Here we have a charming man who has travelled thousands of miles to get to where we are. He can be very useful to us. Were he to sign your list, he would simply be compromising himself with his own people, would be castigated on our account, would perhaps repent of his confidences and not give us any more.' What was more, Swann withheld his own name. He thought it too Hebraic not to have the wrong effect. And besides, although he approved of everything where the review was concerned, he wanted no part in the anti-militarist campaign. He was wearing, which he had never done up until now, the decoration he had won as a very young militiaman in '70,[85] and he added a codicil to his will asking that, contrary to his previous dispositions, he should be granted the military honours due to his rank as a Chevalier of the Légion d'Honneur.[86] This assembled around the church at Combray a whole squadron of those troopers for whose future Françoise used to weep when she contemplated the prospect of a war. In short, Swann refused to sign Bloch's round-robin, so that, though he passed in the eyes of many for a fanatical Dreyfusard, my school-fellow considered him lukewarm, infected with nationalism, and a jingo. Swann left me without shaking me by the hand so as not to be obliged to make his farewells in a room where he had too many friends, but he said to me: 'You ought to come and see your friend Gilberte. She has really grown up and changed, you wouldn't recognize her. She'd be so happy!' I no longer loved Gilberte. She was for me like a dead person whom one has long mourned, but then oblivion has set in, and, were she to be resurrected, she would no longer be able to insert herself into a life no longer made for her. I had no desire to see her any more, nor the desire even to show her that I was not keen to see her which every day, when I loved her, I promised myself I would display once I no longer loved her.

And so, seeking now only to make it look, where Gilberte was concerned, as if I had wished with all my heart to see her again, but had been prevented from doing so by so-called circumstances 'outside my control', which in fact occur, in any coherent way at least, only once our will does not go against them, very far from giving a cautious welcome to Swann's invitation, I did not leave him until he had promised me to explain in detail to his daughter the untoward events that had deprived me, and would deprive me still, from going to visit her. 'Anyway, I shall write to her in a minute when I get home, I added. But do tell her it will be a letter of threats, for in a month or two, I shall be completely free, and then let her tremble, for I shall be round as often as in the old days even.'

Before leaving Swann, I had a word with him about his health. 'No, it's not as bad as all that, he replied. At all events, as I told you, I'm rather tired and I'm resigned in advance to accepting what may happen. Only, I confess it would be very irritating to die before the end of the Dreyfus Affair. Those scum have more than one trick up their sleeves. I don't doubt they'll be beaten in the end, but they're very influential, they've got support everywhere. Just when it's going best, everything gives way. I'd like to live long enough to see Dreyfus rehabilitated[87] and Picquart a colonel.'

Once Swann had left, I returned into the large drawing-room where the Princesse de Guermantes was, with whom I did not then know I was one day to be such good friends. The passion that she felt for M. de Charlus did not at first reveal itself to me. I merely observed that the Baron, from a certain time on, and without breaking out into any of that hostility towards the Princesse de Guermantes that with him was never a surprise, while continuing to have as much, or perhaps even more affection for her, seemed irritated and displeased whenever anyone mentioned her to him. He no longer ever put her name down on the list of people with whom he wished to dine.

It is true that before this, I had heard a very malicious member of society say that the Princesse was altogether changed, that she was in love with M. de Charlus, but this slander had seemed to me absurd and made me indignant. I had certainly been surprised to observe that, when I was recounting something concerning myself, should M. de Charlus be introduced into the middle of it, the Princesse's attention was at once drawn a notch tighter, to become that of an invalid who, listening to us talking about ourselves, and consequently in a casual and distracted fashion, suddenly recognizes a name to be that of the illness he is suffering from, which both interests and delights him. Thus, were I to say to her: 'M. de Charlus was in fact telling me…', the Princesse would gather up the slackened reins of her attention. On one occasion, having said in her presence that at that moment M. de Charlus was quite drawn to a certain person, I was astonished to see insert itself into the Princesse's eyes the different, momentary line that traces something like the wake of a fissure in the pupils and which originates in a thought that our words have, without our knowing, stirred up in the person to whom we are speaking, a secret thought that will not betray itself by words but will rise up from the depths we have disturbed to the momentarily impaired surface of the eyes. But if my words had affected the Princesse, I did not suspect in what way.

A little time later, she began anyway talking to me about M. de Charlus, and almost openly. If she made allusion to the rumours that a few people were circulating concerning the Baron, it was only as though to absurd and infamous inventions. On the other hand, she said: 'I consider that any woman who lost her heart to a man of Palamède's immense worth should have a sufficiently high outlook, and sufficient devotion, to accept and understand him as a whole, just as he is, to respect his freedom, his fancies, to seek only to smooth out his difficulties and console him for his sorrows.' By which remarks, vague though they were, the Princesse de Guermantes revealed what she was seeking to magnify, in just the same way as M. de Charlus himself sometimes did. Have I not heard the latter say on more than one occasion to people who up until then had been unsure whether he was being traduced or not: 'I, who have had many ups and many downs in my life, who have known all sorts of people, thieves as well as kings, and even, I have to say, with a slight preference for the thieves, who have pursued beauty in all its forms, etc.', and by these words, which he thought clever, and by denying rumours that they did not suspect had been circulating (or to make an allowance for the truth, out of an inclination, or a sense of proportion, or a concern for verisimilitude, that he alone adjudged to be minimal), he removed the last doubts concerning him of some, and inspired the first doubts in those who had not as yet felt any. For the most dangerous of all forms of concealment is that of the fault itself in the mind of the guilty person. His own permanent awareness of it prevents him from imagining how general ignorance of it is, how readily a complete falsehood would be believed and, in return, from appreciating at what degree of truthfulness confession begins for others, in words that he believes to be innocent. Moreover, he would in any case have been quite wrong to seek to suppress it, for there are no vices that in high society cannot find complaisant support, and the domestic arrangements of a château have been known to be turned upside down so that a sister may sleep next to her sister, the moment it was known that she did not have a merely sisterly love for her. But what suddenly revealed the Princesse's love to me was a particular fact that I shall not dwell on here, for it forms part of the quite different story in which M. de Charlus allowed a queen to die rather than miss the hairdresser who was to use the curling tongs on him for the sake of a bus conductor by whom he found himself prodigiously intimidated.[88] However, in order to have done with the Princesse's love, let me say what the trifle was that opened my eyes. On the day in question, I was alone with her in her carriage. Just as we were going past a postbox, she made it stop. She had not brought a footman with her. She half drew a letter out from her muff and made as if to descend in order to put it in the box. I tried to stop her, she put up a slight struggle, and we both of us now realized that our first movement had been, hers compromising for seeming to be protecting a secret, mine tactless for opposing itself to that protection. She was quickest regaining possession of herself. Suddenly going very red, she gave me the letter, I no longer dared not take it, but, as I put it into the box I saw, without wanting to, that it was addressed to M. de Charlus.

To go back in time and to that first soirée at the Princesse de Guermantes's, I went to take my leave of her, for her cousins were driving me home and were in a great hurry. M. de Guermantes wanted, however, to say good-bye to his brother. Mme de Surgis having had the time, in a doorway, to tell the Duc that M. de Charlus had been charming to both her and her sons, this great kindness on his brother's part, the first in this connection that the latter had shown, touched Basin deeply and reawoke in him family feelings that were never dormant for long. Just as we were taking our leave of the Princesse, he insisted, without declaring his gratitude to M. de Charlus in so many words, on expressing his fondness for him, whether because he in fact found it hard to contain, or else so that the Baron might remember that the kind of action he had performed that evening had not gone unobserved by the eyes of a brother, just as, with the object of creating salutary associations of memories for the future, we give a lump of sugar to a dog that has sat up and begged. 'Well, well, young brother, said the Duc, stopping M. de Charlus and taking him affectionately under his arm, so that's how we walk past our older brother without so much as a small hello. I never see you any more, Mémé, and you don't know how much I miss you. Looking for some old letters I in fact found some from poor Mama that were all so full of affection for you. – Thank you, Basin,' replied M. de Charlus in a strained voice, for he could never speak of their mother without emotion. 'You ought to make up your mind to let me fix up a cottage for you at Guermantes,' the Duc went on. 'It's nice to see the two brothers so affectionate with one another, said the Princesse to Oriane. – Oh, indeed, I don't think you can find many brothers like that. I shall invite you with him, she promised me. You're not in his bad books?… But what can they have to say to each other?' she added, in an anxious tone, for she could hear their words only imperfectly. She had always felt a certain jealousy at the pleasure M. de Guermantes experienced in talking with his brother about a past which he rather kept from his wife. She sensed that, when they were glad to be in one another's company like this and when she, no longer able to restrain her impatient curiosity, came to join them, her arrival did not please them. But this evening, a second jealousy was added to this habitual one. For if Mme de Surgis had recounted to M. de Guermantes the kindnesses his brother had shown, so that he might thank him, devoted woman friends of the Guermantes couple had at the same time thought they should warn the Duchesse that her husband's mistress had been seen deep in conversation with his brother. And Mme de Guermantes agonized over that. 'Remember how happy we were in the old days at Guermantes, the Duc went on, addressing himself to M. de Charlus. If you were sometimes to come there in the summer, we could resume our good life. Do you remember old father Courveau: "Why is Pascal troublant? Because he is trou… trou…" – "blê",' pronounced M. de Charlus, as if he were still answering his teacher. ' "And why is Pascal troublé? Because he is trou… because he is trou…" – blanc[89] – "Very good, you will pass, you will certainly get a distinction, and Mme la Duchesse will present you with a Chinese dictionary." – Because you remember, Basin, at that time, Basin, I had a thing about Chinese. – Do I not remember, my dear Mémé! And that old porcelain vase that Hervey de Saint-Denis[90] brought you back, I can see it now. You'd been threatening us you'd go and spend the whole of your life in China, so smitten were you by the country; you already loved going off on long jaunts. Oh, you were someone out of the ordinary, for it can be said that in nothing did you have the same tastes as everyone else…' But hardly had he spoken these words before the Duc went red as a beetroot, as they say, for he knew, if not of his brother's habits, then at least of his reputation. As he never spoke about it to him, he was all the more embarrassed at having said something that might seem to refer to it, and even more so at having appeared embarrassed. After a second's silence: 'Who knows, he said, in order to erase his last words, perhaps you were in love with a Chinese girl before loving so many white ones and finding favour with them, if I'm to judge by a certain lady to whom you have certainly given pleasure this evening by talking to her. She found you enchanting.' The Duc had promised himself not to talk about Mme de Surgis but, in the midst of the disarray into which the gaffe he had made had just thrown his thoughts, he had snatched at the nearest one, which was the very one that ought not to have appeared in the conversation, even if it had led to it. But M. de Charlus had noticed his brother go red in the face. And, like a guilty man not wishing to appear embarrassed by having the crime he is supposed not to have committed discussed in front of him, and who thinks that he should prolong a perilous conversation: 'I'm charmed, he replied, but I insist on returning to what you said before that, which strikes me as profoundly true. You said that I have never had the same ideas as other people, you didn't say ideas, you said tastes. How right that is! I've never had the same tastes as other people in anything, how right that is! You said I had particular tastes. – No, no,' protested M. de Guermantes, who in fact had not used those words and perhaps did not believe in the reality they denoted in his brother's case. Did he think he had the right, moreover, to harass him on account of singularities which had in any case remained sufficiently doubtful or sufficiently secret as in no way to harm the Baron's immense position? What was more, sensing that this position of his brother's was going to be of service to his mistresses, the Duc told himself that this was well worth a few kindnesses in return; had he had knowledge at that time of any 'special' liaison of his brother's, M. de Guermantes, in the hope of the support the latter would lend him, a hope allied to the pious memory of days gone by, would have overlooked it, closing his eyes to it, and if need be lending a hand. 'Come, Basin; good evening, Palamède,' said the Duchesse, who, gnawed at by rage and curiosity, could stand no more, 'if you've decided to spend the night here, we'd do better to stay to supper. You've been keeping Marie and me standing here for the last half-hour.' The Duc left his brother after a meaningful embrace and we all three descended the immense staircase of the Princesse's hôtel.

On either side, on the topmost steps, couples were spread out waiting for their carriages to be brought up. Erect, isolated, having at her side her husband and myself, the Duchesse stood on the left of the staircase, already wrapped in her Tiepolo cloak, the collar fastened by the clasp of rubies, being devoured by the eyes of women and of men, seeking to chance upon the secret of her elegance and her beauty. Waiting for her carriage on the same stair as Mme de Guermantes, but at the opposite end, Mme de Gallardon, who had long since lost all hope of receiving her cousin's visit, had turned her back so as not to appear to have seen her, and above all so as not to present proof that the latter had not acknowledged her. Mme de Gallardon was in a very spiteful mood because some gentlemen who were with her had thought they should bring up the subject of Oriane: 'I'm not in the least anxious to see her, she had replied, I caught sight of her just now, in any case, she's beginning to age; it seems she can't come to terms with it. Basin himself says so. And I can well understand that, because, since she's not intelligent, is a thoroughly nasty piece of work, and has a bad way with her, she certainly feels that, once she's no longer beautiful, she'll have nothing left at all.'

I had put on my overcoat, for which M. de Guermantes, who was afraid of catching a chill, reproved me as he went down with me, because of how warm it was. And the generation of noblemen who have more or less passed through the hands of Monseigneur Dupanloup[91] speak such bad French (the Castellanes[92] excepted), that the Duc expressed his thought thus: 'It's better not to be covered up before going outside, at least as a general thesis.' I can still see that whole departure, still see, if I am not mistaken in placing him on that staircase, a portrait removed from its frame, the Prince de Sagan,[93] whose last society soirée this was to be, uncovering himself in order to pay his respects to the Duchesse, with so sweeping a revolution of his top-hat in his white-gloved hand, which matched the gardenia in his buttonhole, that you were surprised it was not a felt hat with a feather from the Ancien Régime, several ancestral faces from which were reproduced exactly in that of the great nobleman. He remained beside her for only a short time, but his attitudes, however momentary, sufficed to compose a whole tableau vivant, a scene from history as it were. Moreover, as he has since died, and as I hardly did more than catch sight of him in his lifetime, he has become for me so much a character out of history, of the history of society at least, that I sometimes feel astonishment when I reflect that a woman and a man whom I know are his sister and his nephew.

As we were going down the stairs, there came up them, with an air of lassitude that suited her, a woman who looked to be about forty though she was more than that. This was the Princesse d'Orvillers, a natural daughter, it was said, of the Duc de Parme, whose soft voice was marked by a vague Austrian accent. She advanced, tall, stooped, in a dress of flowered white silk, allowing her delectable bosom to beat, palpitating and exhausted, through a harness of diamonds and sapphires. Tossing her head like a royal mare encumbered by its halter of pearls, of inestimable value but an uncomfortable weight, she rested her gentle, charming gaze first here, then there, of a blue which, as it began to weaken, became more caressing still, and gave a friendly nod of the head to the majority of the departing guests. 'A fine time to be arriving, Paulette! said the Duchesse. – Oh, I'm so very sorry! But truly, there wasn't the physical possibility,' answered the Princesse d'Orvillers, who had got this sort of expression from the Duchesse de Guermantes, but who brought to it her natural gentleness and the air of sincerity lent by the vigour of a remotely Teutonic accent in so affectionate a voice. She seemed to be alluding to complications in her life too lengthy to be spoken of, and not to common or garden soirées, though she was at that moment returning from several. But it was not these that had forced her to arrive so late. Since the Prince de Guermantes had for long years prevented his wife from receiving Mme d'Orvillers, the latter, once the ban was lifted, contented herself with replying to the invitations, so as not to appear to be craving them, simply by leaving a card. After two or three years of this method, she came in person, but very late, as if after the theatre. In this way, she made it seem as if she cared nothing about the soirée, or about being seen there, but was simply coming to pay a visit to the Prince and the Princesse, for their sake alone, out of sympathy, at the time when, three-quarters of the guests having left, she would 'enjoy them more'. 'Oriane has really sunk as low as you can go, grumbled Mme de Gallardon. I don't understand Basin letting her talk to Mme d'Orvillers. M. de Gallardon wasn't the man to have let me do that.' For my part, I had recognized in Mme d'Orvillers the woman who, near the Guermantes hôtel, had cast long, languorous looks at me, had turned round and had stopped in front of shop windows. Mme de Guermantes introduced me, Mme d'Orvillers was charming, neither too friendly nor prickly. She looked at me as at everyone else, out of her gentle eyes… But never again was I to receive from her, when I met her, a single one of those overtures in which she had seemed to be offering herself. There are particular looks which appear to recognize you, that a young man only ever receives from certain women – or certain men – up until the day when they get to know you and learn that you are the friend of people with whom they, too, are connected.

They announced that the carriage had been brought up. Mme de Guermantes gathered up her red skirt as if to go downstairs and get into the carriage, but, seized perhaps by remorse, or by the desire to give pleasure and above all to take advantage of the brevity that the physical impediment to prolonging it imposed on so tiresome an action, she looked at Mme de Gallardon; then, as if she had only just noticed her, taken with an inspiration, she retraversed the whole length of the stair, before descending, and, having reached her delighted cousin, held out her hand to her. 'How long it has been!' the Duchesse said, and then, so as not to have to expand on all that this formula purported to contain by way of regrets and legitimate excuses, she turned with an expression of alarm towards the Duc, who had, in fact, gone down with me to the carriage, and was furious on finding that his wife had set off towards Mme de Gallardon and was holding up the movement of the other carriages. 'Oriane is still very beautiful all the same! said Mme de Gallardon. People amuse me when they say there's no love lost between us; we may, for reasons we have no need to divulge to others, go for years without seeing one another, we have too many memories in common to be able ever to be separated, and, deep down, she knows very well that she loves me more than so many of the people she sees every day and who are not of her blood.' Mme de Gallardon indeed was like those spurned lovers who want at all costs to make you believe that they are better loved than those whom their fair one dotes on. And (by the praises with which, untroubled by any contradiction with what she had been saying just before, she was so lavish when speaking of the Duchesse de Guermantes) she proved indirectly that the latter had a thorough command of the maxims that should guide a woman of high fashion in her career, who, at the very moment when the most wonderful of her outfits is exciting, as well as admiration, envy, knows how to cross a whole staircase in order to disarm it. 'At least take care not to get your shoes wet' (there had been a brief downpour), said the Duc, who was still furious at having waited.

On the way back, so exiguous was the coupé, the red shoes necessarily found themselves in close proximity to my own, and Mme de Guermantes, afraid they might even have touched them, said to the Duc: 'This young man is going to be obliged to say to me, like in some cartoon or other: "Madame, tell me here and now that you love me, but don't tread on my feet like that."[94] My thoughts as it happens were at some remove from Mme de Guermantes. Ever since Saint-Loup had spoken to me of a high-born girl who went into a brothel and of the Baronne Putbus's lady's maid, it was in these two individuals that, formed into a single whole, were now subsumed the longings inspired in me daily by so many beauties of two classes, the vulgar and magnificent on the one hand, the majestic lady's-maids from great houses, puffed up with pride, who say "we" when speaking of duchesses, and on the other hand, the girls whose names it was enough at times that I should have read in the account of a ball, without even having seen them go past in a carriage or on foot, for me to fall in love with them, and having searched painstakingly through the Annuaire des châteaux[95] for where they were spending the summer (allowing myself very often to be led astray by a similarity in the names), I would dream of going by turns to inhabit the plains of the West, the sand dunes of the North or the pine woods of the Midi. But for all that I had fused together all the most exquisite carnal substance so as to constitute, following the ideal traced out for me by Saint-Loup, the dissolute young girl and Mme Putbus's lady's-maid, my two possessible beauties lacked what I could not know until I had once set eyes on them: an individual character. I was to tire myself out seeking vainly to imagine, during the months when my desire turned rather to young girls, what the one whom Saint-Loup had talked to me about was like in her person, or who she was, and during the months when I would have preferred a lady's-maid, that of Mme Puthbus. But how restful, after being perpetually troubled by my anxious longings for so many fugitive creatures whose names even I often did not know, who were in any case so hard to find, even more so to get to know and impossible perhaps to conquer, to have selected from out of all this scattered, fugitive and anonymous beauty, two choice specimens complete with their descriptions, whom I was at least sure of procuring for myself when I wanted! I deferred the moment of starting on this twofold pleasure, as I did that of working, but the certainty of enjoying it whenever I wanted excused me almost from taking it, like the sleeping pills that it is enough to have within reach of our hand for us no longer to need them but to fall asleep. I now desired only two women in the world, whose faces, it is true, I could not manage to picture to myself, but whose names Saint-Loup had given me and whose compliance he had guaranteed. So that, if by his words of a little earlier he had imposed an arduous task on my imagination, he had, in return, procured a considerable relaxation and a lasting respite for my will.

'Well, the Duchesse said to me, apart from balls, can I not be of any use to you? Have you found a salon where you'd like me to introduce you?' I replied that I was afraid that the only one which tempted me might be too unfashionable for her. 'Who is it?' she asked in a husky, threatening tone, almost without opening her mouth. 'The Baronne Putbus.' This time she feigned genuine anger. 'Oh, no, not her, I think you're having me on. I don't even know by what mischance I know the name of that cow. She's the dregs of society. It's like asking me to introduce you to my haberdasher. Or then again, no, because my haberdasher is charming. You're a little mad, my poor boy. In any case, I ask you as a favour to be polite to the people I've introduced you to, to leave cards with them, to go and call on them and not to mention the Baronne Putbus, who is not known to them.' I asked whether Mme d'Orvillers was not a little loose. 'Oh, not at all, you're muddling her up, she's prudish if anything. Isn't she, Basin?' – Yes, at any event I don't think she's ever given rise to any talk,' said the Duc.

'You won't come with us to the costume ball? he asked me. I'd lend you a Venetian cloak, and I know someone it'd damn well give pleasure to, to Oriane for one, but that's not worth saying, no, the Princesse de Parme. She's forever singing your praises, she swears only by you. You're lucky – since she's on the mature side – that her morals are impeccable. Otherwise she'd have certainly taken you for her sigisbeo, as they used to say in my youth, a sort of cavaliere servente.'

It was not the costume ball I wanted, but my rendez-vous with Albertine. Thus I refused. The carriage had stopped, the footman asked for the porte cochère, the horses pawed the ground until it had been opened to its full width and the carriage entered into the courtyard. 'Toodle-oo, the Duc said to me. – I've sometimes regretted living so near Marie, the Duchesse said to me, for I may be very fond of her, but I'm less fond of seeing her. But I've never regretted the proximity so much as this evening, because it means my remaining so short a time with you. – Come on, Oriane, no speeches.' The Duchesse would have liked me to go in with them briefly. She gave a loud laugh, as did the Duc, when I said I could not because in fact a girl was due to come and call on me. 'You receive your calls at a very strange hour, she said. – Come on, mon petit, let's get a move on, said M. de Guermantes to his wife. It's a quarter to midnight and time to get our costumes on…' In front of his door he came up against its stern guardians, the two ladies with sticks who had not been afraid to come down from their mountain-top by night in order to avert a scandal. 'Basin, we were anxious to warn you, in case you were to be seen at that costume ball: poor Amanien has just died, an hour ago.' The Duc felt a momentary alarm. He could see the famous costume ball foundering for him from the moment when, via these accursed mountain-dwellers, he had been warned of M. d'Osmond's death. But he very soon recovered himself and into the remark that he hurled at the two cousins, he put, along with the determination not to renounce a pleasure, his inability to assimilate accurately the locutions of the French language: 'He's died! No, no, they're exaggerating, they're exaggerating!'[96] And paying no further attention to his two kinswomen, who, alpenstocks at the ready, were about to make their ascent into the night, he hurried off to learn the latest by questioning his valet: 'Has my helmet come? – Yes, Monsieur le Duc. – Is there a little hole to breathe through? I don't want to be asphyxiated, damn it all! – Yes, Monsieur le Duc. – Oh, hell's teeth, I'm having a bad evening. Oriane, I forgot to ask Babal whether the poulaine slippers were for you! – But the wardrobe master from the Opéra-Comique is here, he'll tell us, dearest. I don't myself think they can go with your spurs. – Let's go and find the wardrobe master, said the Duc. Goodbye, my boy, I'd certainly say come in with us while we're trying them on, you'd be amused. But we'd talk, it's coming up to midnight and we mustn't arrive late if the party's to be complete.'

I, too, was in a hurry to leave M. and Mme de Guermantes as soon as I could. Phèdre had finished around half-past eleven. Having had time to come, Albertine must have arrived. I went straight to Françoise: 'Is Mlle Albertine here? – No one has come.' Good God, did that mean that no one would be coming? I was in torment, Albertine's visit now seeming all the more desirable for being less certain. Françoise, too, was annoyed, but for quite another reason. She had just sat her daughter down at the table for a succulent meal. But hearing me arrive, and finding there was no time to remove the dishes and lay out needles and thread, as if it were a matter of needlework and not of supper: 'She's just had a spoonful of soup, Françoise said to me, and I forced her to suck on a bit of the carcass,' so as thus to reduce her daughter's supper to nothing, as though it would have been wrong for it to be plentiful. Even at lunch or at dinner, if I made the mistake of going into the kitchen, Françoise would make as if they had finished and even apologize by saying: 'I just wanted a bite of something', or 'a mouthful'. But you were soon reassured on seeing the multitude of dishes littering the table, which Françoise, taken by surprise by my sudden entry, like the malefactor that she was not, had not had time to make disappear. Then she added: 'Come on, off to bed, you've done enough work as it is today (for she wanted her daughter to appear not only not to be costing us anything, to live by going without, but also to be working herself to death on our behalf). You're only cluttering up the kitchen and above all getting in Monsieur's way, who's expecting a visit. Come on, upstairs,' she went on, as if she were obliged to exert her authority to send her daughter to bed, who, the moment her supper had misfired, was there purely for effect and who, had I remained five minutes longer, would have decamped of her own accord. And turning to me, in that beautiful, uneducated yet slightly individual French of hers: 'Monsieur can't see she's got sleep written all over her face.' I remained, overjoyed at not having to talk to Françoise's daughter.

She came, as I have said, from a small village which was right next door to that of her mother, yet different by the nature of the soil, the cultivation, the patois and certain peculiarities of the inhabitants above all. Thus 'the butcher's wife' and Françoise's niece got on very badly, but had this much in common, that, when going off on an errand, they would linger for hours 'at the sister's' or 'at the cousin's, being incapable of ending a conversation of their own accord, a conversation in the course of which the reason that had led them to go out vanished, to the point where, if you said to them on their return: 'Well, will M. le Marquis de Norpois be at home at a quarter to six?', they wouldn't even slap their foreheads and say 'Oh, I've forgotten,' but 'Oh, I didn't realize Monsieur had asked that, I thought I was only to wish him good day.' But although they might 'go haywire' in this way concerning something said one hour earlier, it was impossible in return to rid their heads of what they had once heard the sister or the cousin say. Thus, if the butcher's wife had heard it said that the English had made war on us in '70 at the same time as the Prussians (and it was no good my explaining that this was not the case), every three weeks the butcher's wife would repeat to me in the course of a conversation: 'It's 'cos of that war the English made on us in '70 at the same time as the Prussians. – But I've told you a hundred times you're mistaken.' She would reply, which implied that her conviction was in no way shaken: 'That's no reason to hold a grudge against them in any case. A lot of water's flowed under the bridge since '70,' and so on. On another occasion, advocating a war with England, of which I disapproved, she said: 'Of course, no war's always better; but since we must, better to get on with it right away. As the sister explained just now, since that war the English made on us in '70, the trade agreements have been ruining us. After we've beaten them, they won't let a single Englishman enter France without paying three hundred francs for admission, like us now to go to England.'

Such, apart from a great deal of honesty and, when they spoke, a stubborn determination not to let themselves be interrupted, to take up again twenty times over at the point where they had been interrupted, which ended by lending to their remarks the unshakable solidity of a Bach fugue, was the character of the inhabitants of this small locality, who numbered barely five hundred and which was bounded by its chestnut trees, its willows, and its fields of potatoes and beetroot.

Françoise's daughter, on the other hand, looking on herself as a modern woman who had abandoned the well-worn paths, spoke the argot of Paris and avoided none of the jokes that went with it. Françoise having told her that I had just come from a princess's: 'Ah, a bargain-basement princess no doubt.' Seeing that I was expecting a visit, she pretended to believe that my name was Charles. I replied innocently that it was not, which enabled her to get in: 'Oh, I thought it was! And I'd been saying to myself Charlatan (Charles attend)'. It was not in very good taste. But I was less indifferent when, as consolation for Albertine's lateness, she said to me: 'I fancy you can wait for her till you're blue in the face. She won't come. Oh, our good-time girls today!'

Thus her way of talking differed from that of her mother; but what is more intriguing is that her mother's way of talking differed from that of her grandmother, a native of Bailleau-le-Pin,[97] which was so close to Françoise's village. Yet the patois differed slightly, like the two landscapes. Françoise's mother's village, on a slope and descending into a ravine, was frequented by willow trees. And a long way from there, on the other hand, there was in France a small region where they spoke almost exactly the same patois as in Méséglise. I made this discovery simultaneously with experiencing the nuisance of it. In fact, I once found Françoise deep in conversation with one of the housemaids, who came from that area and spoke its patois. They almost understood one another, I understood them not at all, they knew this but did not for that reason desist, being excused, so they thought, by the joy of being fellow-countrywomen though born so far away from one another, to go on speaking this alien tongue in my presence, as when we do not want to be understood. These colourful studies in linguistic geography and its attendant camaraderie were pursued each week in the kitchen, without my deriving any pleasure from them.

As, each time the porte cochère was opened, the concierge pressed an electric button which lit the staircase, and as none of the tenants had not now returned, I at once left the kitchen and went back to sit in the ante-room, to keep watch, at the point where the curtain, slightly too narrow to cover completely the glazed door to our apartment, let through the dark vertical strip made by the semi-blackness on the stairs. Should this strip suddenly turn pale gold, it would mean that Albertine had just come in down below and would be with me in a couple of minutes; no one else could any longer be arriving at that hour. And there I stayed, unable to take my eyes off the strip, which persisted in remaining dark; I leaned right over so as to be sure of seeing properly; but my looking was in vain, the vertical black line, for all my passionate longing, did not yield me the intoxicating happiness I would have felt had I seen it change, by some sudden, meaningful magic, into a luminous bar of gold. All this anxiety for that same Albertine to whom I had not given three minutes' thought during the Guermantes soirée! But, by reawakening the feelings of expectancy I had felt of old in connection with other girls, with Gilberte above all, when she was late in arriving, the possible deprivation of a simple physical pleasure caused me cruel moral suffering.

I had to go back into my room. Françoise came in after me. Since I had returned from my soirée, she considered it pointless that I should keep the rose I had in my buttonhole, and came over to remove it. By reminding me that Albertine might no longer be coming, and by obliging me also to admit that I wanted to look smart for her, her action produced an irritation in me which was renewed by the fact that, in tearing myself violently free, I crumpled the flower and that Françoise said to me: 'It'd have been better to let me take it away rather than spoil it like that.' Her every least word exasperated me, moreover. When we are waiting, so much do we suffer by the absence of what we desire that we cannot tolerate another presence.

Françoise having left the room, I reflected that, if now it had come down to my fussing over my appearance with regard to Albertine, it was very unfortunate that I had so many times appeared before her ill-shaven, with several days' growth of beard, on the evenings when I had let her come to renew our caresses. I felt that, neglectful of me, she had been leaving me alone. To improve my room a little, were Albertine still to arrive, and because it was one of the prettiest things I possessed, I put back, for the first time in years, on the table that stood beside my bed, the turquoise-studded slip-cover Gilberte had had made for me to hold Bergotte's little volume, and which I had for a long time wanted to keep with me while I slept, next to the agate marble. At any event, as much perhaps as Albertine, who had still not come, her presence at that moment in an 'elsewhere' that she had evidently found more agreeable, and that I did not know, produced in me a painful feeling which, despite what I had said, scarcely an hour before, to Swann, as to my inability to feel jealousy, might perhaps, had I seen my loved one at less distant intervals, have turned into an anxious need to learn where, and with whom, she was spending her time. I did not dare send round to Albertine's, it was too late, but in the hope that, having supper perhaps with friends, in a café, she might take it into her head to telephone me, I turned the selector switch and, by restoring the connection to my room, cut it off between the post office and the concierge's lodge, to which it was ordinarily linked at that hour. To have had a receiver in the narrow corridor on to which Françoise's room opened would have been simpler and less of a disturbance, but useless. The progress of civilization enables each one of us to manifest unsuspected virtues or new vices, which make us either dearer or more unbearable to our friends. Thus it was that Edison's discovery[98] had enabled Françoise to acquire one more defect, which was to refuse, whatever its utility, however urgent it might be, to make use of the telephone. Whenever you tried to teach her, she found a means of escape, as others do on the point of being vaccinated. And so the telephone had been placed in my room and, so that it should not inconvenience my parents, the bell had been replaced by a simple rotary sound. For fear of not hearing it, I did not move. So unmoving was I indeed that, for the first time in months, I noticed the ticking of the clock. Françoise came in to put things away. She talked with me, but I detested the conversation, beneath the uniformly trite continuity of which my feelings were changing minute by minute, passing from fear to anxiety, and from anxiety to total disappointment. Unlike the vaguely contented words I felt obliged to address to her, I sensed my face to look so unhappy that I pretended I was suffering from a rheumatism in order to account for the disparity between my feigned indifference and this pained expression; and then I was afraid that the words uttered by Françoise, albeit in a low voice (not on account of Albertine, for she considered the hour of her possible arrival to have long passed), risked preventing me from hearing the saving call that would not now be coming. Finally, Françoise went off to bed; I dismissed her roughly but quietly, so that the noise she made going off should not drown that of the telephone. And I began once again to listen, and to suffer; when we are waiting, the double trajectory, from the ear that gathers in the sounds to the mind which processes and analyses them, and from the mind to the heart to which it transmits its results, is so rapid that we are unable even to perceive its duration, and we seem to be listening directly with our hearts.

I was tortured by the ceaseless recurrence of my longing, ever more anxious but never fulfilled, for the sound of a call; having arrived at the culminating point of a harrowing ascent within the spirals of my solitary anguish, from the depths of a populous, nocturnal Paris, brought suddenly close to me, next to my bookcase, I all of a sudden heard, mechanical and sublime, like the brandished scarf or the shepherd's pipe in Tristan,[99] the spinning-top sound of the telephone. I dashed to it, it was Albertine. 'I'm not disturbing you ringing at this hour? – No, no…' I said, containing my delight, for what she had said about the untoward hour was no doubt her apology for being on the point of arriving, this late, not because she was not going to come. 'Are you coming? I asked, in an indifferent voice. – Well… no, if you don't absolutely need me.'

One part of me, which the other part was seeking to rejoin, was in Albertine. She had to come, but I did not tell her so at first; since we had made contact, I told myself I could always force her, at the last minute, either to come to me, or to let me hurry round to her. 'Yes, I'm close to home, she said, and quite a way from where you are; I didn't read your note properly. I've just found it again and I was afraid you might be expecting me.' I sensed that she was lying, and it was now, in my fury, more from a need to inconvenience her than to see her, that I wanted to force her to come. But first I was anxious to refuse what I would try to obtain in a minute or two. But where was she? Other sounds were mixed in with her words: a cyclist's horn, the voice of a woman singing, a brass band in the distance, sounded as distinctly as the cherished voice, as if to prove that it was indeed Albertine in her present surroundings who was close to me at that moment, like a clod of earth with which you have carried off all the grasses round about it. The same sounds that I could hear were striking her ear also and hindering her from attending: truthful details, unconnected with the subject, futile in themselves, but all the more necessary to reveal to us the evidence of the miracle; prosaic, charming features, descriptive of some Parisian street, yet cruel, sharp-pointed features also of an unknown evening which, on leaving after Phèdre, had prevented Albertine from coming to see me. 'I must start by warning you that it's not so that you'll come, because at this hour you'll inconvenience me greatly…, I said to her, I can't keep my eyes open. Besides, well, a whole host of complications. I have to tell you that there was no possible misunderstanding in my letter. You answered that it was agreed. So then, if you didn't understand, what did you mean by that? – I said it was agreed, only I couldn't really remember what was agreed. But I can tell you're cross, and that bothers me. I regret having gone to Phèdre. If I'd known it was going to lead to such a fuss…,' she added, like all those people who, in the wrong over one thing, make a pretence of believing it is for another that they are being criticized. 'Phèdre has nothing to do with my displeasure, since it was I who asked you to go to it. – Then, you're annoyed with me, it's a nuisance it's so late this evening, otherwise I'd have come round, but I'll come tomorrow or the day after to make my excuses. – Oh, no, Albertine, please, having made me waste an evening, at least leave me in peace on the days following. I shan't be free before a fortnight or three weeks. Listen, if it bothers you that we should be left with an impression of anger, and perhaps basically you're right, then I'd much prefer, it can't make me any more tired, since I've waited until this hour for you and you're still out, if you came right away, I'll have some coffee to wake me up. – Wouldn't it be possible to put it off till tomorrow, because the difficulty…' Hearing these words of excuse, uttered as if she were not going to come, I felt that a very different element was attempting painfully to unite itself with the desire to set eyes once again on that velvet face which already, at Balbec, had directed all my days towards the moment when, in front of the mauve September sea, I would be beside that pink flower. I had learned to recognize this terrible need for another human being in Combray, in connection with my mother, to the point of wanting to die if she got Françoise to tell me she could not come upstairs. This effort of the old feeling to combine and form but a single element with the other, more recent one, whose voluptuous object was nothing more than the coloured surface, the carnation pink of a flower of the sea-shore, such an effort often eventuates only in the formation (in the chemical sense) of a new body, which may endure for a few moments only. On that evening, at least, and for a long time to come, the two elements remained dissociated. But already, from the last words heard on the telephone, I had begun to realize that Albertine's life was located (not physically, of course) at so great a distance from me that it would still have required wearisome investigations to lay my hand on it, organized, furthermore, like battlefield fortifications and, for greater surety, of the kind we later acquired the habit of referring to as 'camouflaged'. Albertine was part, moreover, at a more elevated level of society, of that class of persons to whom the concierge promises your messenger she will give the letter when she returns – up until the day when you realize that it is none other than her, the person met with outside and to whom you have taken the liberty of writing, who is the concierge, so that she does indeed live – if only in the porter's lodge – at the house she had indicated (which is, on the other hand, a small brothel, of which the concierge is the madam), or else who gives as her address a building where she is known by accomplices who will not betray her secret, from which your letters will be forwarded to her, but where she does not live, where she has at most only left some of her belongings. Existences disposed across five or six lines of retreat, so that when you try to visit, or find out about, this woman, you strike too far to the right, or too far to the left, or too far in front or too far behind, and you may, for months or years on end, learn nothing. With Albertine, I felt that I would never learn anything, would never succeed in unravelling this tangled multiplicity of authentic details and untruthful facts. And that it would always be thus, unless I were to put her in prison (but people escape) up until the end. On the evening in question, this conviction caused no more than a misgiving to pass through me, though in it I could sense that there quivered something like an anticipation of drawn-out suffering.

'No, no, I replied, I've already told you I wouldn't be free before three weeks, tomorrow any more than any other day. – All right, then… I'll run round… It's a nuisance, because I'm at a girl friend's who…' I sensed that she hadn't thought I would accept her suggestion that she should come, which was not genuine therefore, and I wanted to make things difficult for her. 'Your friend's no concern of mine. Come or don't come, that's your affair, it's not I who am asking you to come, it was you who suggested it. – Don't get angry, I'll jump into a cab and be with you in ten minutes.' And so, out of that Paris from whose nocturnal depths there had already emanated, all the way into my room, measuring the radius of action of a distant being, the invisible message, what was about suddenly to materialize and to appear, following this first annunciation, was the Albertine I had known of old beneath the skies of Balbec, when the waiters at the Grand-Hôtel, as they laid the tables, were blinded by the light of the setting sun, when, the windows having been drawn all the way back, the imperceptible evening breezes were free to enter from the beach, where the last strollers still lingered, into the vast dining-room, where the first diners were not yet seated, and when, in the mirror set behind the bar, the red reflection of the hull went past, and there long lingered the grey reflection of the smoke, of the last boat for Rivebelle. I no longer asked myself what might have caused Albertine to be late, and when Françoise entered my room to tell me: 'Mademoiselle Albertine is here', if I answered without even moving my head, this was only in order to dissemble: 'What's Mademoiselle Albertine doing coming this late?' But then, looking up at Françoise, as if out of curiosity to get her response, which would corroborate the apparent sincerity of my question, I saw, with admiration and with fury, that, capable of rivalling Berma herself in the art of getting inanimate garments and the features of her face to speak, Françoise had been able to teach their lines to her blouse, to her hair, the whitest of which had been brought to the surface and put on display like a birth certificate, and to her neck, bowed by tiredness and by obedience. They pitied her for having been dragged from her sleep and the fug of her bed, in the middle of the night, at her age, and forced to get dressed at high speed, at the risk of catching pneumonia. And so, afraid of having appeared to be apologizing for Albertine's tardy arrival: 'Anyway, I'm very glad she's come, it's all for the best,' and I let my profound joy burst forth. It did not go long unalloyed, once I had heard Françoise's reply. She, without proffering any complaint, looking even as if she were doing her best to suppress an irresistible cough, and merely drawing her shawl about her as if she were cold, began by retailing all that she had said to Albertine, not having failed to ask her for news of her aunt. 'That's just what I was saying, Monsieur must've been afraid Mademoiselle's no longer coming, because this is no hour to arrive, it'll soon be morning. But she must've been in places where she was having a good time because she didn't even say she was upset at having kept Monsieur waiting, she answered me as if she didn't give a fig for anyone: "Better late than never!" ' Then Françoise added the words that cut me to the quick: 'She gave herself away, talking like that. She might well have wanted to hide perhaps, but…'

I had no call to be greatly surprised. I have just said that, on the errands she was sent on, Françoise rarely gave any account, if not of what she had said, on which she gladly expounded, then at least of the expected answer. But if, exceptionally, she did repeat what our friends had said, however short it might be, she usually contrived, thanks if need be to the expression or tone by which, she assured us, they had been accompanied, to make them seem somehow hurtful. At a pinch, she would accept having suffered a snub, probably imaginary as it happens, from a tradesman to whom we had sent her, provided that, having been addressed to her as our representative, she having spoken in our name, this snub hit us on the rebound. You needed only to reply that she had misunderstood, that she was suffering from a persecution mania and that the tradespeople were not all in league against her. Their feelings mattered little to me in any case. The same did not go for those of Albertine. And by repeating those ironic words, 'Better late than never!' Françoise at once evoked for me the friends in whose company Albertine had ended her evening, finding more pleasure there than in my own. 'She's comical, she's got a little flat hat, with her big eyes, it gives her a funny look, especially with her coat that she'd have done well to send to the invisible amender's because it's all mangy. She amuses me,' added, as though making fun of Albertine, Françoise, who rarely shared my impressions but felt a need to let her own be known. I did not even want to appear as if I understood that this laugh denoted disdain and mockery, but, in order to return blow for blow, I answered Françoise, though I did not know the little hat she had been referring to: 'What you call a "little flat hat" is something quite simply ravishing… – Like nothing at all, you mean,' said Françoise, expressing, openly this time, her genuine contempt. Then (in a quiet, more deliberate tone, so that my untruthful reply might seem to be expressing not my anger but the truth, but wasting no time on the other hand, so as not to keep Albertine waiting), I addressed these cruel words to Françoise: 'You're an excellent person, I said smarmily, you're kind, you've a thousand good qualities, but you're no further on than the day you arrived in Paris, either in knowing about women's clothes or in how to pronounce words properly and not commit howlers.' This was a particularly stupid criticism, because the French words we are so proud of pronouncing accurately are themselves only 'howlers' made by Gallic mouths in mispronouncing Latin or Saxon, our language being simply the defective pronunciation of a few others. The genius of the language in its living state, and the future and past of French, that is what should have interested me in Françoise's mistakes. Was her 'amender' for 'mender' not equally as curious as those animals surviving from remote epochs, such as the whale or the giraffe, which demonstrate to us the stages through which animal life has passed? 'And, I added, seeing that in all these years you haven't managed to learn, you'll never learn. But you can take consolation, that doesn't stop you from being a good soul, or making a wonderful boeuf à la gelée and countless other things besides. The hat you think is simple was copied from one of the Princesse de Guermantes's hats which cost five hundred francs. Moreover, I expect very soon to offer Mlle Albertine an even better one.' I knew that what was best able to annoy Françoise was that I should spend money on people she did not like. She answered me by a few words rendered almost unintelligible by a sudden breathlessness. When I later learned that she had a heart condition, how remorseful I felt at never having denied myself the ferocious and barren pleasure of answering her back in this way! Françoise loathed Albertine, in any case, because Albertine, being poor, could not add anything to what Françoise saw as my advantages. She smiled benevolently each time I got an invitation from Mme de Villeparisis. She was indignant in return that Albertine did not practise reciprocity. I had reached the point of being forced to invent purported presents I had received from her, in whose existence Françoise placed not the faintest credence. This lack of reciprocity shocked her above all in the matter of food. That Albertine should accept dinners from Mama, if we had not been invited to Mme Bontemps's (who was not, however, in Paris for half the time, her husband accepting 'posts', as in the old days when he had had enough of the Ministry), seemed to her indelicate on the part of my loved one, whom she condemned indirectly by reciting the saying current in Combray:

Let's eat my bread.

– All right, come on.
– Let's eat yours instead.
– My hunger's gone.

I made a pretence of being busy writing. 'Who were you writing to? Albertine said on entering – To a pretty friend of mine, to Gilberte Swann. Do you know her? – No.' I forbore to put any questions to Albertine about her evening, I felt I would be reproaching her and, given the hour, that we would no longer have time to be sufficiently reconciled to move on to kisses and fondlings. So it was with these that I wanted to begin, from the very first moment. Moreover, if I had calmed down somewhat, I did not feel happy. The loss of one's bearings, of all sense of direction, that characterizes waiting, persists even after the arrival of the person awaited, and, having taken the place in us of the calm by virtue of which we had been picturing that arrival to ourselves as so great a pleasure, prevents us from deriving any pleasure from it at all. Albertine was here: my ravaged nerves, their agitation continuing, were still waiting for her. 'Can I have a nice one, Albertine? – As many as you like,' she said, all kindness. Never had I seen her looking so pretty. 'Another one? You know what great, great pleasure it gives me. – And me ever so many times greater, she replied. Oh, what a pretty slip-case you've got there – Take it, I give it to you as a memento. – You're so kind…' We should be forever cured of our romanticism were we willing, in order to think of the one we love, to try to be the person we shall be once we no longer love them. The slip-case, Gilberte's agate marble, all that had once derived its importance from a purely internal state, since now, for me, they were just any old slip-case, any old marble.

I asked Albertine whether she wanted a drink. 'I fancy I see some oranges and some water over there, she said. That would be just the thing.' I was thus able to enjoy, along with her kisses, the coolness that had seemed to me superior to them at the Princesse de Guermantes's. And squeezed now into the water, the orange seemed, as I drank, to yield up the secret life of its ripening, of its fortunate action against certain states of that human body which belongs to a very different kingdom, which it is powerless to make live, but which in return it was able to favour by its irrigatory effects, innumerable mysteries disclosed by the fruit to my senses, not at all to my intellect.

Albertine having left, I recalled that I had promised Swann to write to Gilberte and I thought it kinder to do so right away. It was without emotion and as if adding the final line to some tedious piece of classwork, that I traced on the envelope the name of Gilberte Swann, with which in the old days I had covered my exercise-books so as to give myself the illusion of corresponding with her. The fact is that if, once, it had been I who wrote that name, the task had now been devolved by habit on to one of the numerous secretaries on whom it can call. The latter was able to write Gilberte's name all the more calmly because, found a place with me recently by habit, having recently entered my employ, he had not known Gilberte and knew only, without putting any reality underneath the words, because he had heard me speak of her, that she was a girl with whom I had been in love.

I could not accuse her of being unfeeling. The person that I was now with regard to her was the 'witness' best qualified to understand what she herself had been. The slip-case and the agate marble had simply become for me, with regard to Albertine, what they had been for Gilberte, what they would have been for anyone who had not allowed the glow from an inner flame to play on them. But now there was a new agitation inside me which had impaired in its turn the true power of words and things. And as Albertine was saying, to thank me once again: 'I do so love turquoises!', I replied: 'Don't let these ones die,' thus entrusting to them, as if to precious stones, the future of our friendship, which, however, was no more capable of inspiring a sentiment in Albertine than it had been of preserving that which had once united me to Gilberte.

At this time there occurred a phenomenon which deserves mention only because it is to be found in all significant periods of history. At the very moment when I was writing to Gilberte, M. de Guermantes, only just returned from the costume ball and still crowned by his helmet, was reflecting that the following day he would certainly be obliged to go into official mourning, and decided to bring forward by a week the cure that he was due to take. When he returned from it three weeks later (to anticipate, since I have only just finished my letter to Gilberte), the Duc's friends, who had watched him, originally so indifferent, become a fanatical anti-Dreyfusard, were left speechless with surprise when they heard him reply (as if the cure had acted on more than just his bladder): 'Well, the proceedings will be reviewed and he'll be acquitted; you can't condemn a man against whom there's nothing. Have you ever seen anyone as gaga as Froberville? An officer preparing Frenchmen for the slaughter (for war, that is) ! Strange times!' Now, in the interim, the Duc de Guermantes had got to know three charming ladies at the spa (an Italian princess and her two sisters-in-law). On hearing them comment briefly on the books they were reading and on a play being performed at the Casino, the Duc had at once realized that he was dealing with women of superior intellect, and with whom, as he put it, he could not keep up. He had been all the happier to be invited to play bridge by the princess. But hard on his arrival there, as he was saying, with all the fervour of his unqualified anti-Dreyfusism, 'Well, there's no more talk of the famous Dreyfus getting his review,' great had been his stupefaction to hear the princess and her sister-in-law say: 'We've never been so close to it. You can't keep someone in the penal colony who hasn't done anything. – Oh, ah, what?' the Duc had stammered to begin with, as if on discovering some bizarre nickname employed in this household in order to make someone he had hitherto thought intelligent appear ridiculous. But after a few days, just as, out of cowardice and a spirit of imitation, we cry 'Hallo there, Jojotte',[100] without knowing why, to a great artist we have heard being called that, in this house, as yet much embarrassed by the new custom, the Duc was nevertheless saying: 'Indeed, if there's nothing against him!' The three charming ladies considered he was not moving fast enough and were quite hard on him: 'But basically, no one of intelligence can have believed there was anything.' Each time a 'crushing' fact was produced against Dreyfus and the Duc, believing that this was going to convert the three charming ladies, came to announce it, they laughed uproariously and had no difficulty in demonstrating to him, with great dialectical subtlety, that the argument was without value and altogether ridiculous. The Duc had returned to Paris a rabid Dreyfusard. And indeed we shall not pretend that the three charming ladies were not, in this instance, the harbingers of the truth. But it should be remarked that every ten years, when you have left a man filled with a real conviction, it happens that an intelligent couple, or simply one charming lady, enter his society and that after a few months he has been led to hold opposite opinions. And in this regard, there are many countries which behave like the man of sincerity, many countries that have been left filled with hatred for a people and which, six months later, have changed their views and reversed their alliances.

I did not see Albertine again for some time, but continued, failing Mme de Guermantes, who no longer spoke to my imagination, to see other fairies and their dwellings, no more separable from them than the mother-of-pearl or enamel valve, or the crenellated turret of its shell, from the mollusc that manufactured it and finds shelter there. I would not have known how to classify these ladies, the difficulty of the problem being that, as well as lacking all significance, it was impossible not only to resolve but to pose. Before the lady herself the fairy hôtel had to be approached. Now, one of them, 'at home' always after lunch during the summer months, even before arriving there, you had to have had the hood of the cab lowered, so fiercely was the sun beating down, the memory of which, without my being aware of it, would form part of the total impression. I thought I was simply going to the cours-la-Reine;[101] in reality, before arriving at the gathering, which a practical man would perhaps have made fun of, I had, as though on a journey across Italy, known both bedazzlement and extreme pleasure, from which the house would never again be separated in my memory. Moreover, because of the warmth of the season and of the time of day, the lady had hermetically closed the shutters in the vast rectangular drawing-rooms on the ground floor in which she entertained. I had difficulty at first in recognizing my hostess and her visitors, even the Duchesse de Guermantes, who, in her husky voice, asked me to go and sit beside her, in a Beauvais armchair figuring the Rape of Europa.[102] Then I made out on the walls the vast eighteenth-century tapestries representing ships with flowering hollyhocks for masts, beneath which I found myself in a palace not of the Seine but of Neptune, beside the river Oceanus, where the Duchesse de Guermantes had become like a divinity of the waters. I should never finish were I to enumerate all the salons different from this one. This example will suffice to demonstrate that into my judgments of society I introduced poetic impressions, of which I never took any account when drawing up the total, with the result that, when I assessed a salon's merits, my addition was never correct.

Admittedly, these sources of error were far from being the only ones, but I no longer have time, before my departure for Balbec (where, to my misfortune, I am going to stay for a second, which will also be the last, time), to start on depictions of society that will find their place much further on. Let me simply say that to this first false reason (my relatively frivolous life, which gave people to assume that I was a lover of society) for my letter to Gilberte and the return to the Swanns that it seemed to indicate, Odette might have added, just as inaccurately, a second. Up until now I have been imagining the different aspects that society may take for the same person only by assuming that society does not change: if the same lady who used not to know anyone is now received everywhere, and another, who had a dominant position, has been abandoned, we are tempted to see in this the purely personal ups and downs that now and again lead, in the one society, consequent on speculation on the Bourse, to a resounding bankruptcy or an unhoped-for enrichment. But they are not only that. To a certain extent, social manifestations (greatly inferior to artistic movements, to political crises and to the evolution that carries public taste towards the theatre of ideas, then towards Impressionist painting, then towards complicated German music, then towards simple Russian music, or towards social ideas, ideas of justice, religious reaction, an outburst of patriotism) are nevertheless the distant, broken, uncertain, cloudy, shifting reflection of them. So that even the salons cannot be portrayed in the static immobility that may have been suitable hitherto for the study of characters, which must also be as it were swept along in a quasi-historical movement. The taste for novelty which leads those men of the world more or less genuinely desirous of keeping abreast of intellectual developments to frequent the circles where they can follow them, will normally cause them to prefer some hostess, previously unheard-of, who represents the still fresh hopes of a superior quality of mind, so withered and faded among the women who have long held sway over society, whose strengths and weaknesses they know and who no longer speak to their imagination. Thus each age finds itself personified in new women, in a new group of women, who, closely identified with the very latest objects of curiosity, seem, by their dress, to appear only now, at this moment, like an unknown species born of the last flood, the irresistible beauties of each new Consulate, each new Directory.[103] But very often the new hostesses are quite simply, like certain statesmen whose first ministry it is but who had been knocking at all the doors for the last forty years without seeing them open, women who were not known to society but who had nevertheless, for a long time past and faute de mieux, been receiving a 'few close friends'. Admittedly, this is not always the case, and when, with the prodigious efflorescence of the Ballets Russes, revealing of, one after the other, Bakst, Nijinsky, Benois, and the genius of Stravinsky, the Princess Yourbeletieff,[104] the young godmother to all these new great men, appeared wearing on her head an immense, quivering aigrette unfamiliar to the women of Paris and which they all sought to copy, one might have thought that this marvellous creature had been brought with them, in their innumerable baggage and as their most precious treasure, by the Russian dancers; but when, beside her, in her stage-box, we shall see installed, at every performance of the 'Russes', like a veritable fairy, unknown before today to the aristocracy, Mme Verdurin, we will be able to answer to those members of society who easily suppose Mme Verdurin to be newly disembarked with Diaghilev's troupe, that this lady had already existed in different times, and passed through various avatars, from which this one differed only in being the first finally to bring her the success, henceforth assured and progressing ever more rapidly, for which the Patronne had waited for so long, and in vain. In the case of Mme Swann, it is true, the novelty that she represented did not have the same collective character. Her salon had crystallized around a man, a dying man, who had passed almost overnight, at a time when his talent was running dry, from obscurity to great fame. The infatuation with the works of Bergotte was immense. He spent the whole day, on display, at Mme Swann's, who would whisper to a man of influence: 'I'll speak to him, he'll write you an article.' He was, indeed, in a position to write one, and even a short playlet for Mme Swann. Closer now to death, his health was a little better than in the days when he came to ask after my grandmother. The fact was that severe physical pain had imposed a regimen on him. Illness is the best heeded of doctors: to kindness or to knowledge, we only make promises; suffering we obey.

Certainly, the Verdurins' little clan was currently an altogether livelier source of interest than the mildly nationalist, even more literary and above all Bergottian salon of Mme Swann. The little clan was the active centre indeed of a long political crisis that had reached its maximum intensity: Dreyfusism. But society people were for the most part so anti-revisionist, that a Dreyfusian salon seemed something as impossible as, in another age, a Communard salon.[105] The Princesse de Caprarola, who had made the acquaintance of Mme Verdurin in connection with a large exhibition she had been organizing, had indeed paid the latter a lengthy visit, in hopes of debauching a few interesting elements of the little clan and adding them to her own salon, a visit in the course of which the Princesse (playing a cut-price version of the Duchesse de Guermantes) had argued against received opinions and declared those in her own world to be idiots, which Mme Verdurin had thought showed great courage. But this courage was not to extend so far later on as to dare, with the gaze of nationalist ladies trained on her, to acknowledge Mme Verdurin at the Balbec races. In the case of Mme Swann, on the other hand, the anti-Dreyfusards were grateful to her for being a 'bien-pensante', which, married as she was to a Jew, was doubly meritorious. Nonetheless, those who had never been there imagined she entertained only a few obscure Israelites and pupils of Bergotte. So it is that women far better qualified than Mme Swann are ranked at the very bottom of the social scale, either on account of their origins, or because they do not like dining out or the soirées at which they are never seen, which is wrongly supposed to be due to their not having been invited, or because they never talk about their friendships in society but only about literature or art, or because people keep quiet about having visited them, or they, so as not to show impoliteness to others, keep quiet about having entertained them, in short for a thousand reasons which end by making one or other of them, in the eyes of some, the woman one does not receive. So it was with Odette. Mme d'Epinoy, looking at the time for a contribution to the 'Patrie française',[106] having had to go and call on her, as if she were going into her haberdasher's, convinced moreover she would find only faces not despised even but unknown, remained as if transfixed when the door opened, not on the drawing-room she had imagined, but on a magic chamber in which, as if thanks to a change of lighting in a fairy-play, she recognized in the dazzling female extras, half reclining on divans or sitting on armchairs, addressing their hostess by her first name, the Highnesses and duchesses that she, the Princesse d'Epinoy, had the greatest difficulty in luring to her own house, and to whom, at that moment, beneath the benevolent gaze of Odette, the Marquis du Lau, the Comte Louis de Turenne, the Prince Borghese and the Duc d'Estrées[107] were acting as pantlers and as cup-bearers, carrying the orangeade and the petits-fours. Since, without her being aware of it, the Princesse d'Epinoy saw people's place in society as internal to them, she was obliged to disincarnate Mme Swann and reincarnate her in a fashionable woman. Ignorance of the life actually led by women who do not exhibit it in the newspapers thus casts a veil of mystery over the social standing of some (thereby helping to diversify the salons). In Odette's case, at the outset, a few men of the very best society, curious to meet Bergotte, had been to dine at her house privately. She had had the tact, recently acquired, not to advertise the fact; there they had found – a memory perhaps of the little nucleus whose traditions Odette had preserved since the schism – the table laid, and so forth. Odette had taken them, together with Bergotte, the death of whom this in fact finally proved to be, to the interesting 'first nights'. They spoke of her to a few women of their own world capable of taking an interest in all this novelty. They were convinced that Odette, an intimate of Bergotte's, had more or less collaborated in his works, and thought her a thousand times more intelligent than the most remarkable women of the Faubourg, for the same reason as they had placed all their political hopes in certain staunch Republicans such as M. Doumer and M. Deschanel,[108] whereas they would have seen France as headed for the abyss had it been entrusted to the monarchist personnel whom they entertained to dinner, to the Charettes, the Doudeauvilles, etc.[109] This change in Odette's standing had been achieved on her part with a discretion that made it surer and more rapid, but allowed no inkling of it to reach a public inclined to depend on the columns of Le Gaulois for the advance or decline of a salon, with the result that one day, at the dress rehearsal of a play by Bergotte, given in one of the most fashionable auditoria in aid of charity, it was a veritable coup de théâtre when they saw, in the front box, which was that of the author, coming to sit next to Mme Swann, Mme de Marsantes and the woman who, thanks to the progressive effacement of the Duchesse de Guermantes (sated with honours, and annihilating herself by putting up no resistance), was on the way to becoming the 'lioness', the queen of the hour, the Comtesse Molé. 'We hadn't even suspected she'd started to climb,' it was said of Odette just as the Comtesse Molé was seen entering her box, 'and now she's reached the top rung.' With the result that Mme Swann was able to believe I was making it up with her daughter out of snobbery. Despite her brilliant woman friends, Odette nevertheless listened to the play with an extreme attentiveness, as though she were there purely in order to hear it, just as in the old days she had crossed the Bois for her health's sake and to get some exercise. Men who, in the old days, had paid her less attention came to the balcony, disturbing all and sundry, so as to hang on her hand and come close to the imposing circle by whom she was surrounded. She, with a smile still more friendly than ironic, replied patiently to their questions, affecting a greater calm than one would have credited and which was perhaps genuine, this exhibition being only the belated exhibition of a habitual and discreetly concealed intimacy. Behind the three ladies attracting all the stares was Bergotte, surrounded by the Prince d'Agrigente, the Comte Louis de Turenne and the Marquis de Bréauté. And it is easy to understand that, for men who were received everywhere and could no longer expect further elevation save by seeking out originality, this demonstration of their worth that they thought to be giving, by allowing themselves to be lured by a hostess known for her high intellectuality, in whose company they expected to meet all the playwrights and novelists who were in vogue, was livelier and more exciting than the soirées at the Princesse de Guermantes's, which, lacking any programme or fresh attraction, had succeeded one another these many years past, more or less similar to that which we have described at such length. In this exalted world of the Guermantes, from which curiosity had somewhat turned away, the new intellectual fashions were not embodied in amusements in their own image, as in the skits written for Mme Swann by Bergotte, or those veritable meetings of the Committee of Public Safety[110] (had society been able to take an interest in the Dreyfus Affair) when there gathered at Mme Verdurin's, Picquart, Clemenceau, Zola, Reinach and Labori.[111]

Gilberte, too, was of service to her mother's position, for an uncle of Swann's had just left the girl nearly eighty million francs, which meant that the Faubourg Saint-Germain was beginning to take notice of her. The obverse of which medal was that Swann, who was anyway dying, held Dreyfusist views, but even this did his wife no harm and was even of service to her. It did her no harm because they said: 'He's senile, an idiot, no one pays him any attention, only his wife counts and she's charming.' But even Swann's Dreyfusism was useful to Odette. Left to her own devices, she would perhaps have gone and made overtures to smart women that would have destroyed her. Whereas, on the evenings when she dragged her husband out to dine in the Faubourg Saint-Germain, Swann, remaining unsociably in his corner, did not hesitate, should he see Odette getting herself introduced to some nationalist lady, to say in a loud voice: 'Come, Odette, you're mad. Calm down, I beg you. It would be ignominious on your part to get yourself introduced to anti-Semites. I forbid it.' The society people after whom everyone runs are unaccustomed either to so much pride or to such lack of breeding. For the first time they had found someone who thought himself 'more' than them. These grumbles of Swann's were retailed and Odette was showered with turned-down visiting cards. When she called on Mme d'Arpajon, there was a keen and sympathetic stir of curiosity. 'It didn't annoy you my introducing her to you, said Mme d'Arpajon. She's very nice. I got to know her through Marie de Marsantes. – No, no, on the contrary, it seems she's as intelligent as could be, she's charming. On the contrary, I longed to meet her; tell me where she lives.' Mme d'Arpajon told Mme Swann that she had enjoyed herself greatly at her house two days before and had been delighted to give up Mme de Saint-Euverte for her sake. Which was true, for to prefer Mme Swann was to prove that you were intelligent, like going to the concert rather than a tea-party. But when Mme de Saint-Euverte came to Mme d'Arpajon's at the same time as Odette, since Mme de Saint-Euverte was a great snob and Mme d'Arpajon, even though she rather looked down on her, was keen on her receptions, Mme d'Arpajon did not introduce Odette so that Mme de Saint-Euverte should not know who it was. The Marquise imagined that it must be some princess or other who very seldom went out for her never to have seen her, and prolonged her visit, replying indirectly to what Odette said, but Mme d'Arpajon was unyielding. And when the defeated Mme de Saint-Euverte was leaving: 'I didn't introduce you, her hostess said to Odette, because people don't much like going to her and she invites on the grand scale; you wouldn't have been able to extricate yourself. – Oh, that doesn't matter,' said Odette, with some regret. But she retained the idea that people did not like going to Mme de Saint-Euverte's, which was to a certain extent true, and concluded from that that her own standing was much superior to that of Mme de Saint-Euverte, even though the latter had a very grand standing and Odette as yet none at all.

She was unaware of this, and although all Mme de Guermantes's woman friends were friendly also with Mme d'Arpajon, when the latter invited Mme Swann, Odette would say, with a scrupulous air: 'I'm going to Mme d'Arpajon's, but you're going to think me very vieux jeu, it shocks me, on account of Mme de Guermantes' (whom she did not as it happens know). Men of distinction thought that the fact that Mme Swann knew few people in high society was because she must be a superior woman, probably a great musician, and that to go there would be a sort of extra-social qualification, as for a duke to be a Doctor of Science. Women who were complete nobodies were drawn to Odette for a contrary reason; learning that she went to the Colonne concerts[112] and declared herself to be a Wagnerian, they concluded that she must be a 'practical joker' and were much excited by the thought of getting to know her. But, being themselves none too secure socially, they were afraid of compromising themselves in public by seeming to be friendly with Odette, and, should they catch sight of Mme Swann at a charity concert, they looked the other way, deeming it out of the question, under the gaze of Mme de Rochechouart, to acknowledge a woman who was quite capable of having been to Bayreuth – which meant of committing all manner of excess.

Everyone, when they visited someone else, became different. To say nothing of the miraculous metamorphoses achieved in this way among the fairies, in Mme Swann's drawing-room, M. de Bréauté, lent a sudden prominence by the absence of the people who customarily surrounded him, by the air of satisfaction he wore at finding himself as much at ease there as if, instead of going to a party, he had donned his spectacles in order to shut himself away and read the Revue des Deux-Mondes,[113] and by the mysterious ritual he appeared to be fulfilling by coming to see Odette, M. de Bréauté himself seemed like a new man. I would have given a lot to see how much the Duchesse de Montmorency-Luxembourg might have changed for the worse in this new setting. But she was one of those people to whom Odette could never be introduced. Mme de Montmorency, who was much more kindly disposed towards Oriane than the latter was towards her, had greatly astonished me by saying to me, apropos of Mme de Guermantes: 'She knows clever people, everyone likes her, I think that if she'd stuck at it more, she'd have managed to create a salon. The truth is she wasn't keen on it, she's quite right, she's happy as she is, sought after by all.' If Mme de Guermantes did not have a 'salon', what then was a 'salon'?

The stupefaction into which these words threw me was no greater than that which I caused Mme de Guermantes by telling her I much liked going to Mme de Montmorency's. Oriane thought her an old cretin. 'Me, yes, she said, I'm forced to, she's my aunt; but you! She doesn't even know how to attract agreeable people.' Mme de Guermantes did not realize that the agreeable people left me cold, that when she said 'the Arpajon salon' I saw a yellow butterfly, and 'the Swann salon' (Mme Swann was 'at home' in the winter from 6 till 7) a black butterfly, its wings felted with snow. Although inaccessible to her, she adjudged this latter salon, which was not one, to be excusable in my own case, because of the 'clever people'. But Mme de Luxembourg! Had I already 'produced' something that had been noticed, she would have concluded that talent may co-exist with an element of snobbery. And to crown her disappointment, I admitted to her that I did not go to Mme de Montmorency's (as she thought) to 'take notes' or 'make a study'. Mme de Guermantes was no more mistaken, however, than those society novelists who analyse the actions of a snob, or a purported such, cruelly from the outside, but never place themselves inside him, at the time when a whole social springtime is coming into flower in his imagination. When I tried to find what the great pleasure was that I felt on going to Mme de Montmorency's, I was myself somewhat disappointed. She lived in an old place in the Faubourg Saint-Germain, filled with detached houses divided by small gardens. Under the archway, a statuette, said to be by Falconet,[114] represented a spring, from which, indeed, there welled a perpetual moisture. A little further on, the concierge, her eyes permanently red, whether from grief, or neurasthenia, or a migraine, or a cold, never answered you, but gestured vaguely to indicate that the Duchesse was in and allowed a few drops to fall from her eyelids over a bowl filled with 'forget-me-nots'. The pleasure I got from seeing the statuette, putting me in mind as it did of a small plaster gardener that had stood in a garden in Combray, was as nothing compared with that produced in me by the great, damp, resonant staircase, full of echoes, like that in certain bathing establishments of old, from the vases filled with cinerarias – blue against blue – in the anteroom, and above all from the tinkling of the bell, which exactly matched that in Eulalie's room. This tinkling raised my enthusiasm to new heights, but seemed too humble for me to be able to explain it to Mme de Montmorency, so that that lady always saw me in a state of euphoria whose source she never divined.

THE INTERMITTENCES OF THE HEART [115]

My second arrival in Balbec was very different from the first. The manager had come in person to wait for me at Pont-Couleuvre, repeating how much he valued his titled clientèle, which made me fear that he had ennobled me until I realized that in the darkness of his grammatical memory, titré, or 'titled', meant simply attitré, or 'regular'. For the rest, as he proceeded to learn new languages, he grew worse at the old ones. He announced that he had put me right at the top of the hotel. 'I hope, he said, that you won't see that as a lack of discourtesy, I was worried about giving you a room you're unworthy of, but I did it with regard to the noise, because that way you won't have anyone overhead assailing your eardrops (for "eardrums"). Rest assured, I'll have the windows closed so they don't bang. I'm intolerable where that's concerned,' (these words expressing not his own thought, which was that he would always be found inexorable on that subject, but very possibly that of his garçons d'étage). The rooms were in any case those of my first stay. They were no lower down but I had risen in the manager's esteem. I could have a fire lit if I liked (for on doctors' orders I had left straight after Easter), but he was afraid there might be 'crocks' (for 'cracks') in the ceiling. 'Above all, always wait when lighting a blaze until the one before's been consummated (for "consumed"). For the important thing's to avoid not setting fire to the fireplace, all the more because, to brighten things up a bit, I've had a big old Chinese porcelain postiche placed above it, which might get ruined.'

He informed me with much sadness of the death of the bâtonnier[116] from Cherbourg: 'He was a woolly one,' he said (probably for 'wily'), and gave me to understand that his end had been hastened by a life of 'débâcles', which meant 'debauchery'. 'I'd been noticing for some time how after dinner he used to have a sneeze (no doubt for a "snooze") in the lounge. Just lately, he was so much altered that if you hadn't known it was him, to look at he was barely recognisant' (for 'recognizable', no doubt).

In happy compensation, the First President[117] from Caen had just received the 'ensign' of a Commander in the Légion d'Honneur. 'He has abilities, that's for sure, but it seems he was given it above all on account of his great impotence.' Much had been made of this award moreover in the previous day's Écho de Paris,[118] of which the manager had as yet read only the first 'paraph' (for 'paragraph'). M. Caillaux's[119] policies had been given a good going-over there. 'I think they're right, what's more, he said. He's putting us too much under the thimble (instead of the "thumb") [120] of Germany.' Since this sort of topic as treated by a hotelier struck me as tedious, I stopped listening. I thought of the mental images that had decided me to return to Balbec. They were very different from those of the other time, the vision that I had come in search of was as brilliant as the earlier one had been hazy; they were to be no less of a disappointment. The images chosen by memory are as arbitrary, as confined and as elusive as those which imagination had formed and that reality had destroyed. There is no reason why, outside of us, a real place should possess the pictures painted by memory rather than those of our dreams. Besides, a new reality will perhaps make us forget, or even detest, the desires on whose account we had come away.

Those which had made me come away to Balbec stemmed in part from the fact that the Verdurins (of whose invitations I had never taken advantage, and who would certainly be glad to entertain me, were I to go to the country to apologize for never having been able to visit them in Paris), knowing that several of the faithful would be spending their holidays along this coast, and having for that reason rented for the whole season one of M. de Cambremer's châteaux (La Raspelière), had invited Mme Putbus. On the evening when I had learned of this (in Paris), I sent, like a veritable madman, our young footman to inquire whether that lady would be taking her lady's-maid to Balbec. It was eleven o'clock at night. The concierge was a long time opening up and by some miracle did not send my messenger packing, nor summon the police, but was content merely to give him a rough reception, while supplying him with the desired information. He said that the head lady's-maid would indeed be accompanying her mistress, first of all to take the waters in Germany, then to Biarritz, and lastly, to Mme Verdurin's. From that moment on, I had felt calm and glad to have this prospect in store. I had been able to dispense with those pursuits in the street, when I was not armed with the letter of introduction to the beauties I encountered that my having dined that same evening, at the Verdurins, with her mistress, would represent to the 'Giorgione'. Moreover, she would perhaps think even better of me on learning that I knew not only the bourgeois tenants of La Raspelière, but its owners, and especially Saint-Loup, who, unable to recommend me to the lady's-maid from a distance (she not knowing Robert's name), had written an enthusiastic letter to the Cambremers on my behalf. He thought that, aside from the great usefulness they might have for me, I would find Mme de Cambremer, the daughter-in-law, née Legrandin, interesting to talk to. 'She's an intelligent woman, he had assured me. Within limits, of course. She won't say anything definitive ("definitive" things had taken the place of "sublime" ones with Robert, who, every five or six years, would modify some of his pet expressions, while preserving the main ones), but she's got character, she has a personality, intuition, she comes out with just what needs saying. She can get on your nerves now and again, she throws out silly remarks so as to seem "upper crust", which is all the more ridiculous since no one could be less fashionable than the Cambremers, she isn't always "up to the minute" but, all in all, she's still one of the people it's most bearable to associate with.'

As soon as Robert's recommendation had reached them, the Cambremers, whether snobbery, which led them to want to make themselves indirectly agreeable to Saint-Loup, or gratitude for what he had done for one of their nephews in Doncières, or more probably mainly out of kindness and a tradition of hospitality, had written long letters demanding that I should stay with them, or, if I preferred to be more independent, offering to look for lodgings. When Saint-Loup had pointed out that I would be staying at the Grand-Hôtel in Balbec, they replied that they would at least expect a visit from me straight after I arrived and, if it were too long delayed, would not fail to come and badger me with invitations to their garden-parties.

Nothing of course connected Mme Putbus's lady's-maid in any essential way to the neighbourhood of Balbec; she would not be for me there like the peasant girl whom, alone on the Méséglise road, I had so often summoned up in vain, with all the strength of my longing.

But I had long since ceased trying to extract from a woman the square root of her unknown as it were, which did not often survive a simple introduction. At least in Balbec, where I had not been for a long time, I should have the advantage, for want of the necessary connection that did not exist between the neighbourhood and the woman, that my sense of reality would not be suppressed for me by habit as it was in Paris where, whether in my own house, or in some familiar bedroom, pleasure with a woman was unable to give me for a single moment the illusion, in the midst of everyday objects, that it was opening the way for me to a new life. (For if habit is a second nature, it prevents us from knowing the first, of which it has neither the cruelties nor the enchantments.) But I would perhaps have this illusion in a new landscape, where, before a ray of sunlight, the sensibility is reborn, and where the lady's-maid whom I desired would indeed finally inflame me; but we shall see circumstances so decree not only that this woman should not come to Balbec, but that I dreaded nothing so much as that she might come, with the result that this principal object of my journey was neither attained nor even pursued. True, Mme Putbus was not due to go to the Verdurins so early in the season; but the pleasures that we have chosen can be a long way off if their advent is certain and if, while we await them, we can give ourselves over in the meantime to an idle seeking to attract and to an incapacity for love. For the rest, I was not going to Balbec in as impractical a spirit as the first time; there is always less egotism in the pure imagination than in the memory; and I knew that I was going to find myself as it happens in one of those places teeming with beautiful women whom I did not know; a seaside resort displays no fewer of them than a ball, and I thought in advance of those strolls in front of the hotel, along the esplanade, with the same sort of pleasure that Mme de Guermantes would have procured for me if, instead of getting me invited to brilliant dinner-parties, she had more often given my name, for their lists of male partners, to the hostesses where there was dancing. To make female acquaintances in Balbec would be as easy as it had been awkward for me in the old days, for I now had as many connections and supports there as I had been devoid of them on my first trip.

I was aroused from my reverie by the voice of the manager, to whose political dissertation I had not been listening. Changing the subject, he told me of the delight of the First President on learning of my arrival and that he would be coming to call on me in my room, that very evening. The prospect of this visit so alarmed me, for I was starting to feel tired, that I begged him to obstruct it (which he promised to do) and, for added security, for this first evening, to get his staff to mount guard on my floor. He did not seem overfond of them. 'I'm obliged all the time to run after them because they lack too much inertia. If I wasn't there, they wouldn't budge. I'll put the liftboy on sentry-go at your door.' I asked whether he was at last 'head chasseur'. 'He's not yet senior enough in the house, he replied. He's got workmates older than him, there'd be an outcry. There need to be granulations in everything. I allow he has a good aptitude (for "attitude") there in front of his lift. But he's still a bit young for such positions. It would show up against others, who are too old. He's a bit lacking in responsibility, which is the primitive quality (no doubt the "primordial", the most important, quality). He needs to have his brains (my interlocutor meant "head") screwed on a bit more. Anyway, he need only trust me. I know the ropes. Before winning my stripes as manager of the Grand-Hôtel, I first saw action under M. Paillard.'[121] This comparison impressed me and I thanked the manager for having come himself all the way to Pont-à-Couleuvre. 'Oh, don't mention it! It made me waste only an infinite (for "infinitesimal") amount of time.' We had in any event arrived.

A convulsion of my entire being. On the very first night, as I was suffering from an attack of cardiac fatigue, trying to overcome the pain, I bent down slowly and cautiously to remove my boots. But hardly had I touched the first button of my bottine, before my chest swelled, filled with an unknown, divine presence, I was shaken by sobs, tears streamed from my eyes. The person who had come to my assistance, who was rescuing me from my aridity of soul, was the one who, several years before, at an identical moment of distress and loneliness, a moment when I no longer had anything of myself, had entered, and who had restored me to myself, for it was both me and more than me (the container which is more than the content, and had brought it to me). I had just glimpsed, in my memory, bent over my fatigue, the tender, concerned, disappointed face of my grandmother, such as she had been on that first evening of our arrival; the face of my grandmother, not that of the one whom I had been surprised and self-reproachful at having missed so little, who had nothing of her but her name, but of my true grandmother, the living reality of whom, for the first time since the Champs-Elysées, where she had suffered her stroke, I had rediscovered in a complete and involuntary memory. This reality does not exist for us until such time as it has been recreated in our minds (otherwise the men who have been involved in some titanic battle would all be great epic poets); thus, in a wild desire to hurl myself into her arms, it was only at this instant – more than a year after her funeral, on account of the anachronism which so often prevents the calendar of facts from coinciding with that of our feelings – that I had just learned she was dead. I had spoken of her often since that time and thought of her also, but beneath the words and thoughts of an ungrateful, selfish and cruel young man there had never been anything that might resemble my grandmother, for, in my frivolity, my love of pleasure, and accustomed as I was to seeing her as an invalid, I contained within me the memory of what she had been only in a virtual state. At whatever moment we may consider it, our total soul has an almost fictitious value only, for all its great wealth of assets, for now some, and now others of these are unavailable, whether indeed they be real assets, as well as those of the imagination, and in my own case, for example, fully as much as that of the ancient name of Guermantes, those, so very much more solemn, of the true memory of my grandmother. For to the disturbances of memory are linked the intermittences of the heart. It is no doubt the existence of our body, similar for us to a vase in which our spirituality is enclosed, which induces us to suppose that all our inner goods, our past joys, all our sorrows, are perpetually in our possession. Perhaps this is as inaccurate as to believe that they escape or return. At all events, if they do remain inside us, it is for most of the time in an unknown domain where they are of no service to us, and where even the most ordinary of them are repressed by memories of a different order, which exclude all simultaneity with them in our consciousness. But if the framework of sensations in which they are preserved be recaptured, they have in their turn the same capacity to expel all that is incompatible with them, to install in us, on its own, the self that experienced them. Now, since the self that I had suddenly re-become had not existed since that far-off evening when my grandmother had undressed me on my arrival in Balbec, it was quite naturally, not after the day we were living, of which that self knew nothing, but – as if there were, in time, different and parallel series – without any break in continuity, immediately after that first evening in the past, that I adhered to the moment when my grandmother had leaned towards me. The self that I was then and which had vanished all that time ago, was once again so close to me that I seemed to hear still the words that had come immediately before, yet which were no more than a dream, just as a man not properly awake thinks he can perceive close beside him the sounds of his receding dream. I was nothing more than the being who had sought refuge in his grandmother's arms, to erase the traces of her sorrows by giving her kisses, the being I would have had as great difficulty in imagining to myself, when I was one or other of those who had been succeeding one another inside me for some time past, as the efforts it would now have required, sterile in any case, to re-experience the desires and joys of one of those beings that, for a time at least, I no longer was. I recalled how, an hour before the moment when my grandmother had thus leaned over, in her dressing-gown, towards my boots, wandering in the stiflingly hot street, in front of the pâtissier, I had thought I could never, such was the need I had to embrace her, wait for the hour I had still to spend without her. And now that this same need was reborn, I knew that I could wait for hour upon hour, that never again would she be beside me, I had made the discovery only now because I had just, on being aware of her for the first time, alive, real, swelling my heart to bursting, on meeting her again that is, realized that I had lost her for ever. Lost for ever; I could not understand and I applied myself to suffering the pain of this contradiction: on the one hand, an existence, a tenderness, surviving in me such as I had known them, that is to say created for me, a love in which everything so much found in me its complement, its object, its constant direction, that the genius of great men, all the geniuses who may have existed since the world began, would have counted for less with my grandmother than a single one of my faults; and on the other hand, as soon as I had relived, as though present, that felicity, to feel it traversed by the certainty, springing up like a repeated physical pain, of a nothingness that had erased my image of that tenderness, which had destroyed that existence, abolished retrospectively our mutual predestination, made of my grandmother, at the moment when I had found her again as if in a mirror, a mere stranger whom chance had led to spend a few years with me, as it might have been with anyone at all, but for whom, before and after, I was nothing, would be nothing.

Instead of the pleasures I had been enjoying for some time past, the only pleasure it would have been possible for me to enjoy at this moment would have been, by retouching the past, to lessen the sorrows my grandmother had once experienced. I did not remember her only in that dressing-gown, a garment appropriate, to the extent of becoming almost symbolic of them, to the pains, unhealthy no doubt yet comforting also, she took on my behalf; little by little, I now remembered all the opportunities I had seized, by letting her see my sufferings, by, if need be, exaggerating them, of causing her a grief that I then imagined being expunged by my kisses, as if my affection were as capable as was my happiness of making hers; and what was worse, I, who could conceive of no other happiness now than of being able to find it once again extended in my memory across the planes of that face, moulded and bowed by tenderness, I had once shown a senseless fury in trying to extirpate from it even the smallest pleasures, as on the day when Saint-Loup had taken my grandmother's photograph and when, finding it hard to conceal from her the almost ridiculously childish coquettishness she was putting into posing, with her broad-brimmed hat, in a fetching half-light, I had allowed myself to murmur a few impatient and hurtful words, which, I had sensed from the way her face contracted, had struck home, had wounded her; it was me whom they were lacerating now that the consolation of a thousand kisses was forever impossible.

But never again would I be able to erase that contraction from her face, or that suffering from her heart, or rather from my own; for since the dead exist only in us, it is ourselves that we strike unrelentingly when we persist in remembering the blows we have dealt them. I clung to these sorrows, however cruel they might be, with all my strength, for I felt indeed that they were the effect of my memory of my grandmother, the proof that this memory which I had was indeed present in me. I felt that I truly remembered her only through sorrow, and would have wished the nails to be driven yet more firmly home that had riveted her memory inside me. I had not sought to make the suffering any easier, to embellish it, to pretend that my grandmother was only absent and momentarily invisible, by addressing words and entreaties to her photograph (the one that Saint-Loup had taken and which I had with me) as though to a being separated from us but who, having remained an individual, knows us and remains joined to us by an indissoluble harmony. I never did this, for I was anxious not to suffer only, but to respect the originality of my suffering such as I had suddenly endured it against my will, and I wanted to continue to endure it, in accordance with its own laws, each time this strange contradiction between survival and oblivion, intersecting within me, returned. I knew, not, certainly, whether I might one day isolate some element of truth in this painful and at present incomprehensible impression, but that, if I were ever able to extract that element of truth, it could only be from this same impression, so particular, so spontaneous, which had been neither traced by my intellect, nor inflected or attenuated by my pusillanimity, but which death itself, the abrupt revelation of death, had hollowed out in me, like a thunderbolt, in accordance with some inhuman, supernatural diagram, like a double and mysterious furrow. (As for the forgetfulness of my grandmother in which I had been living up until now, I could not even think of attaching myself to that so as to draw some truth from it; for in itself it was nothing more than a negation, an enfeeblement of the mind, incapable of re-creating an actual moment of life and obliged to substitute for it conventional and indifferent mental images.) Perhaps, however, now that the instinct for self-preservation, or the intellect's ingenuity in shielding us against sorrow, was beginning to build on the still smoking ruins, to lay the first foundations of its useful but ill-starred building-work, I had been finding too much comfort in recalling one or other of the beloved being's judgments, in recalling them as if she were still able to pass them, as if she existed, as if I continued to exist for her. But as soon as I came to fall asleep, at that more truthful hour when my eyes were closed to the things without, the world of sleep (on the threshold of which, my intellect and my will, momentarily paralysed, could no longer contend with the cruelty of my genuine impressions) reflected, refracted the painful synthesis of survival and nothingness, in the organic depths, now become translucid, of the mysteriously illuminated viscera. World of sleep, where our inner knowledge, held in subjection by the disturbances in our organs, quickens the rhythm of our heart or of our breathing, for the same dosage of alarm, of sadness, of remorse, is a hundred times more potent when thus injected into our veins; as soon as, in order to travel along the arteries of the subterranean city, we have embarked on the dark waves of our own blood, as if on the sixfold meanders of some internal Lethe,[122] tall, solemn forms appear to us, accost us and then go from us, leaving us in tears. I searched in vain for that of my grandmother the moment I touched land beneath the gloomy porticos; yet I knew she existed still, but with a diminished life, as pale as that of memory; the darkness was increasing, and the wind; my father did not come, who was to conduct me to her. Suddenly my breath failed, I felt my heart as if hardened, I had just remembered that for long weeks I had forgotten to write to my grandmother. What must she be thinking of me? 'Dear God, I said to myself, how unhappy she must be in that small room that they've rented for her, as small as for some former maidservant, where she's all alone with the nurse they've sent in to look after her, and where she can't stir, for she's still partly paralysed and hasn't once wanted to get up! She must think I've forgotten her since she died, how alone and abandoned she must feel! Oh! I must run and see her, this very minute, I can't wait for my father to come, but where is it? How can I have forgotten the address? If only she still recognizes me! How can I have forgotten her all these months?' It's dark, I shan't find her, the wind is stopping me advancing; but here is my father walking in front of me; I cry out to him: 'Where's grandmother? Tell me the address. Is she all right? Is it quite certain she's got all she needs? – No, no, my father says to me, you can rest assured. Her nurse is an orderly person. We send a very small sum from time to time so they can buy her the little she has need of. She sometimes asks what's become of you. She's even been told you were going to write a book. She seemed pleased. She wiped away a tear.' Then I thought I remembered that shortly after she died, my grandmother had said to me, sobbing, with a humble expression, like an old servant who has been dismissed, like a stranger: 'You'll allow me to see you sometimes all the same, don't let me go too many years without visiting me. Remember that you were my grandson and that grandmothers don't forget.' And seeing once again the face, so submissive, so unhappy, so gentle, that she wore, I wanted to run immediately and say what I ought then to have replied to her: 'But grandmother, you'll see me as much as you want, I have only you in the world, I shall never leave you again.' How my silence must have made her sob during all these months when I haven't been to where she's in bed! What may she have said to herself? And it was sobbing that I, too, said to my father: 'Quick, quick, her address, take me.' But he: 'The fact is… I don't know if you'll be able to see her. Besides, she's very weak, you know, very weak, she's not herself any more, I think you'd find it rather upsetting. And I don't recall the exact number in the avenue. – But tell me, you who know, it's not true that the dead are no longer alive. It just can't be true, despite what they say, since grandmother still exists.' My father gave a sad smile: 'Oh, very little, you know, very little. I think you'd do better not to go. She lacks for nothing. They come and keep everything tidy. – But she's often alone? – Yes, but that's better for her. It's better that she shouldn't think, that could only cause her pain. Thinking often causes people pain. Anyway, you know, she's very low. I'll leave you exact directions so that you can go there; I can't see what you'd be able to do and I don't think the nurse would let you see her. – You know very well though that I shall always live near her, stags, stags, Francis Jammes, fork.'[123] But already I had recrossed the river with its gloomy meanders, I had come back to the surface, where the world of the living opens out; so if I was still repeating 'Francis Jammes, stags, stags', this sequence of words no longer held the limpid, logical meaning they had expressed so naturally for me only a moment before and which I could no longer recall. I could no longer understand even why the word Aias,[124] spoken to me just now by my father, had at once signified 'Take care not to catch cold,' beyond any possible doubt. I had forgotten to close the shutters and the broad daylight had no doubt woken me up. But I could not bear to look out on those waves that my grandmother had once been able to contemplate for hours on end; the new image of their indifferent beauty was at once completed by the idea that she could not see them; I would have liked to block my ears against their sound, for now the luminous plenitude of the beach was hollowing out a void in my heart; everything seemed to be saying to me, like the paths and the lawns in the public gardens where I had once lost her, when I was very young: 'We haven't seen her,' and beneath the roundness of the pale, heavenly sky I felt oppressed, as if beneath an immense blue bell-jar, shutting off a horizon where my grandmother was not. So as no longer to see, I turned towards the wall, but alas, against me was the partition that had served of old between us as a morning messenger, that partition which, docile as a violin in rendering all the nuances of a feeling, spoke so exactly to my grandmother of my fear both of waking her up, or, if she was already awake, of not being heard by her and of her not daring to move, then at once, like a second instrument taking it up, announcing her coming and exhorting me to stay calm. I no more dared to approach that partition than a piano on which my grandmother had been playing and that was vibrating still from her touch. I knew that now I could knock, more loudly even, that nothing could again wake her, that I would not hear any response, that my grandmother would never again come. And I asked nothing more of God, if there is a Paradise, than to be able to give there the three little taps on that partition that my grandmother would recognize anywhere, and to which she would respond with those other taps that meant: 'Don't fret yourself, little mouse, I realize you're impatient, but I'm just coming', and that he should let me remain with her for all eternity, which would not be too long for the two of us.

The manager came to ask me whether I did not want to go down. Just in case, he had taken care of my 'placement' in the dining-room. Not having seen me, he had been afraid that I might have had a recurrence of my breathless attacks from the old days. He hoped that it would be only some minor 'throat troubles' and assured me that he had heard they could be eased with the aid of what he called 'calyptus'.

He handed me a brief note from Albertine. She had not been due to come to Balbec this year but, having changed her plans, had been for the last three days, not in Balbec itself, but ten minutes away by tram, at a neighbouring resort. Afraid that I might be tired from the journey, she had stayed away on the first evening, but was now sending to know when I might be able to see her. I inquired whether she had come in person, not so as to see her, but so as to arrange not to see her. 'She did indeed, the manager replied. But she'd like it to be as soon as possible, unless you have absolutely necessitous reasons. You can see, he concluded, that, when all's done and said, everyone here wants you.' I, however, did not want to see anyone.

Yet the day before, when I arrived, I had felt captured once more by the indolent charm of life in a seaside resort. The same silent 'lift', out of respect this time, not disdain, and flushed with pleasure, had set the lift in motion. And as I rose along the ascending column, I traversed once more what had once been for me the mystery of an unfamiliar hotel, where, when you arrive, a tourist without either protection or prestige, every habitué returning to his room, every young girl going down to dinner, every maid passing down the strangely configured corridors, and the girl come from America with her chaperon going down to dinner, give you a look in which you can read nothing of what you would have wished for. This time, on the contrary, I had experienced the too restful pleasure of making the ascent of a hotel known to me, where I felt at home, where I had once more accomplished that operation having always to be begun afresh, longer and more difficult than the turning inside-out of an eyelid, which consists of imposing on objects the soul that is familiar to us in place of their own soul, which had alarmed us. Would I now, I had said to myself, unsuspecting of the abrupt change that lay in wait for my soul, have to go into yet other hotels, where I would dine for the first time, where habit would not yet have slain, on each floor, before each door, the terrifying dragon that had seemed to stand watch over an enchanted existence, where I would have to go up to those unknown women that grand hotels, casinos and beach resorts serve merely to bring together and cause to live in common, like so many vast polyparies?

I had derived pleasure even from the fact that the tiresome First President should have been in such a hurry to call on me; I had seen, for the first day, waves, the azure mountain ranges of the sea, its glaciers and its waterfalls, its elevation and its careless majesty – merely by smelling, for the first time in so long, as I washed my hands, the distinctive odour of the too highly scented Grand-Hôtel soap – which, seeming to belong simultaneously to the present moment and to my past stay, floated between them like the real charm of a particular way of life in which you return home only to change your tie. The sheets on the bed, too fine, too light, too vast, impossible to tuck in, to hold in place, and which remained puffed up around the blankets in shifting scrolls, would once have saddened me. On the unwieldy, billowing roundness of their sails, they merely cradled the glorious, hope-filled sunshine of early morning. But the sun did not have time to appear. During that same night, the dreadful, divine presence had been resurrected. I begged the manager to go, to ask that no one should come in. I told him I should be staying in bed and rejected his offer of sending to the chemist's for his excellent preparation. He was overjoyed by my refusal for he was afraid that the guests might be incommoded by the smell of 'calyptus'. Which earned me this compliment: 'You're in the swim' (he meant to say 'in the right'), and this piece of advice: 'Mind you don't dirty yourself on the door, for, relating to the locks, I've had it "coasted" with oil; if one of the staff were to dare knock at your room, he'd get a "threshing". And that can be taken as read, for I don't like "recitations" (which evidently meant: "I don't like having to recite things twice"). Only, for a pick-me-up wouldn't you like a drop of the old wine I've got a bust of downstairs (no doubt for "butt"?). I shan't bring it to you on a silver dish like the head of Jonathan,[125] and I must warn you it's not Château-Lafite, but it's more or less equivocal (for "equivalent"). And because it's light, they could fry you a small sole.' I refused everything, but was surprised to hear the name of the fish (sole) pronounced like the word for a willow tree (saule), by a man who must have ordered so many of them in his lifetime.

Despite the manager's promises, a little later on I was brought the turned-down visiting-card of the Marquise de Cambremer. Having come to see me, the old lady had sent to ask whether I was there, and when she learned that my arrival dated only from the previous day, and that I was indisposed, she had not insisted, but (doubtless not without stopping off at the chemist's or the haberdasher's, where the footman had jumped from his seat to go in and pay some account or lay in supplies) the Marquise had left again for Féterne, in her ancient eight-spring calash and pair. Quite often indeed, its rumble was to be heard, and its pomp admired, in the streets of Balbec and of several other small localities along the coast, situated between Balbec and Féterne. Not that these stops at suppliers' were the object of these outings. This, on the contrary, would be a tea-party, or garden-party, at the house of some squireen or bourgeois quite unworthy of the Marquise. But the latter, although, by her birth and fortune, she lorded it over the minor nobility of the district, was so afraid, in her perfect kindness and simplicity, of letting someone down who had invited her that she went to the most insignificant social gatherings in the neighbourhood. Admittedly, rather than travel such a long way to come and hear, in the heat of some stifling small drawing-room, a soprano generally devoid of talent and to whom, in her capacity as great lady of the district and a musician of repute, she would then have to offer her exaggerated congratulations, Mme de Cambremer would have preferred to go for a drive or to remain in her wonderful gardens at Féterne, at the foot of which the drowsy waves of a small bay come to expire amidst the flowers. But she knew that her probable coming had been announced by the host, whether he were a nobleman or a freeman of Maineville-la-Teinturière or Chattoncourt-l'Orgeuilleux. Now, if Mme de Cambremer had left home that day without putting in an appearance at the festivity, one or other of the guests coming from one of the small resorts along the sea could have heard and seen the Marquise's calash, which would have robbed her of the excuse of having been unable to leave Féterne. On the other hand, for all that these hosts had often seen Mme de Cambremer going to concerts given in the houses of people where they considered it was not her place to be, the slight lowering that, as they saw it, this fact inflicted on the standing of the too good-natured Marquise, vanished as soon as it was they who were entertaining, and it was feverishly that they asked themselves whether they would or would not be getting her at their small tea-party. What relief, for anxieties felt for several days past, if, after the first piece sung by the hosts' daughter or by some amateur holidaying locally, a guest announced (an infallible sign that the Marquise would be coming to the matinée) that they had seen the horses of the famous calash halted in front of the watchmaker or the druggist! Then Mme de Cambremer (who indeed would not be long in making her entry, followed by her daughter-in-law and by guests she currently had residing with her, and whom she had asked permission, granted with what delight, to bring with her) would recover all her lustre in the eyes of the hosts, for whom the reward of her hoped-for coming had perhaps been the determining but unacknowledged reason for the decision they had taken a month earlier: to inflict on themselves the bother and expense of giving a matinée. Seeing the Marquise present at their tea-party, they no longer remembered her willingness to attend those of ill-qualified neighbours, but the antiquity of her family, the luxury of her château, and the rudeness of her daughter-in-law, née Legrandin, who, by her arrogance, threw into relief the somewhat mawkish good nature of the mother-in-law. They already fancied they could read, on the society page of the Gaulois, the paragraph that they would themselves concoct en famille, behind locked doors, about 'the little corner of Brittany where they know how to enjoy themselves, the ultra-select matinée from which no one tore themselves away without having made their hosts promise to repeat it without delay.' Each day they would await the newspaper, concerned at not yet having seen any mention of their matinée, and fearing that they had got Mme de Cambremer for their guests alone and not for the multitude of readers. At last the blessed day arrived: 'The season is exceptionally brilliant this year in Balbec. The fashion is for small afternoon concerts, etc.' Lord be praised, Mme de Cambremer's name had been spelt correctly and 'cited at random', but in first place. All that remained was to appear annoyed by this indiscretion on the part of the newspapers, which might lead to a falling-out with the people one had been unable to invite, and to ask hypocritically, in front of Mme de Cambremer, who could have been so perfidious as to send in this item of gossip, of which the Marquise, ever the benevolent grande dame, said: 'I can understand it annoying you but for my own part I'm only too happy for it to be known that I came to you.'

On the card I was handed, Mme de Cambremer had scribbled that she was giving a matinée in two days' time. And certainly, only two days before, however tired of socializing I might have been, it would have been a real pleasure to sample it transplanted into those gardens where, thanks to Féterne's exposure, fig trees, palms and rose bushes grew out in the open, all the way down to a sea often of a Mediterranean calm and blue, across which the owners' small yacht would go, before the party began, to fetch the more important guests from the resorts on the far side of the bay, and serve, its awnings spread against the sun, once everyone had arrived, as a dining-room for the tea, and set off again in the evening to take back those whom it had brought. A charming luxury, but so costly that it was partly in order to offset the expense it entailed that Mme de Cambremer had sought to increase her income in various ways, and notably by letting, for the first time, one of her properties, very different from Féterne: La Raspelière. Yes, two days ago, what a change such a matinée, populated by unfamiliar minor nobility, in a new setting, would have made from the 'high life' of Paris! But now pleasures no longer had any meaning for me. I wrote therefore to Mme de Cambremer to make my excuses, just as an hour earlier I had sent Albertine away: sorrow had abolished the possibility of desire in me as completely as a high fever takes away the appetite. My mother was to arrive the following day. It seemed to me that I was less unworthy of living beside her, that I would understand her better, now that a whole alien and degrading existence had made way for the resurgence of heart-rending memories that had garlanded and ennobled my soul, like hers, with their crown of thorns. Or so I believed; in reality there is every difference between genuine grief like that of Mama – which literally takes away your life for long periods, sometimes for ever, the moment you have lost the person that you love – and that other grief, ephemeral in spite of everything, as mine was to be, which goes away quickly just as it is late in coming, which we experience only long after the event because in order to feel it we needed to 'understand' that event; grief such as so many people experience and from which the grief that was now torturing me differed only in its modality, of involuntary memory.

As for a grief as deep as that of my mother, I was to know that one day, as will be seen in due course in this narrative, but it was not now, nor thus that I pictured it to myself. Nevertheless, just as a narrator, who ought to know his lines and have taken up his place long before, but has arrived only at the last second and having read what he is to say only once, is able to disguise the fact skilfully enough when the time comes to respond to his cue, so that no one is made aware of his late arrival, my new-found grief enabled me, when my mother arrived, to talk to her as if it had always been the same. She merely thought that the sight of the places where I had been with my grandmother (though this was not in fact it) had reawoken it. Then for the first time, and because I felt a sorrow that was nothing in comparison with her own, but which had opened my eyes, I realised with terror what she might be suffering. I understood for the first time that the fixed, tearless gaze (which meant that Françoise felt little pity for her) which she had had since my grandmother's death, had been dwelling on this incomprehensible contradiction between memory and nothingness. Moreover, though still in her black veils, but more dressed-up in this new place, I was the more struck by the transformation that had taken place in her. It is not enough to say that she had lost all her gaiety; having melted and become congealed into a sort of imploring image, she seemed to be afraid, by too abrupt a movement, too loud a tone of voice, of giving offence to the sorrowful presence that never left her. But above all, the moment I saw her enter in her crêpe coat, I realized – what had eluded me in Paris – that it was no longer my mother I saw in front of me, but my grandmother. Just as, in royal or ducal families, when the head of the family dies the son takes his title, and, from having been the Duc d'Orléans, Prince de Tarente or Prince des Laumes, becomes King of France, Duc de la Trémoïlle, or Duc de Guermantes,[126] so, frequently, by an accession of a different order, and of a more profound origin, the dead man seizes hold of the living one, who becomes his successor in his own likeness, the perpetuator of his interrupted life. Perhaps all that the great grief does which, in a daughter such as Mama was, ensues on the death of her mother, is to break open the chrysalid a little sooner, to hasten the metamorphosis and the appearance of a being that we bear within us and which, but for this crisis, which misses out the intermediate stages and covers long periods at a single bound, would only have supervened more slowly. Perhaps, in the regret for the one who is no more, there is a sort of suggestion which in the end produces on our own features similarities that were already latent in us, and that above all arrests our more particularly individual activities (in my mother's case, her common sense, and the mocking high spirits she had got from her father), which, for as long as the person greatly loved was alive, we were not afraid to exercise, be it at their expense, and which counter-balanced the character that we had got exclusively from them. Once she is dead, we would feel qualms about being other, we now admire only what she was, what we already were, but mixed in with something else, and what henceforth we shall be alone. It is in this sense (and not in that very vague, very false sense in which it is generally understood) that we can say that death is not without its use, that the dead person continues to exercise an influence on us. They influence us more even than the living because, the true reality being set free only by the mind, being the object of a mental process, we truly know only what we are obliged to re-create by thought, what everyday life keeps hidden from us… Finally, in this cult of regret for our dead, we make idols of that which they loved. Not only could my mother not be parted from my grandmother's bag, more precious for her now than if it had been of sapphires and diamonds, from her muff, from all the garments that brought out still more strongly how alike the two of them were in appearance, but even from the volumes of Mme de Sévigné[127] that my grandmother was never without, copies that my mother would not have exchanged for the manuscript of the Letters itself. She had teased my grandmother in the old days, who never once wrote to her without quoting a sentence from Mme de Sévigné or Mme de Beausergent.[128] In each of the three letters I received from Mama before her arrival in Balbec, she quoted Mme de Sévigné at me, as if these three letters had been, not addressed by her to me, but addressed by my grandmother to her. She wanted to go down on to the esplanade to see the beach that my grandmother spoke of every day when writing to her. Holding her mother's en-tout-cas in her hand, I saw her from the window, advancing all in black, with timid, pious steps, across the sand that cherished feet had trodden before her, and she seemed to be going in search of a dead body that the waves were to bring back to her. So as not to let her dine alone, I had to go downstairs with her. The First President and the widow of the bâtonnier had themselves introduced to her. And she was so sensitive to everything connected with my grandmother that she was infinitely touched, and preserved ever afterwards the memory and her gratitude for what the First President said to her, just as she felt hurt and indignant at the fact that, on the other hand, the bâtonnier's wife spoke not one word in remembrance of the dead woman. In point of fact, the First President felt no more concern for her than did the bâtonnier's wife. The emotional words of the one and the silence of the other were only, although my mother set so great a distance between them, different ways of expressing the indifference that the dead inspire in us. But I believe that my mother took comfort above all from the words into which, against my will, I allowed a little of my pain to pass. It could but make Mama happy (despite all the affection she had for me), like everything that ensured my grandmother's survival in our hearts. On each of the days following, my mother went down to sit on the beach, to do exactly as her mother had done, and read her two favourite books, the Memoirs of Mme de Beausergent and the Letters of Mme de Sévigné. She, or any of us, could not bear the last-named being referred to as the 'witty Marquise', any more than La Fontaine as 'le Bonhomme' or 'good old La Fontaine'.[129] But when in the letters she read the words 'my daughter', she thought she heard her mother speaking to her.

She had the ill luck, on one of these pilgrimages when she did not want to be disturbed, to meet on the beach a lady from Combray, followed by her daughters. I believe her name was Mme Poussin. But among ourselves we only ever used to call her 'We'll see how you like that', for it was by this phrase, constantly repeated, that she warned her daughters of the evils they were storing up for themselves, saying to the one who was rubbing her eyes, for example: 'Once you've got a nice ophthalmia, we'll see how you like that.' She addressed long, tearful greetings to my mother from a distance, not as a sign of condolence, but because such had been her upbringing. Even had we not lost my grandmother and had reason only to be happy, she would have done the same. Living a somewhat withdrawn life in Combray, in an immense garden, she considered that nothing was ever soft enough and subjected the words and even the names of the French language to a softening process. She considered it too harsh to call the item of silverware that poured out her syrups a cuiller and would say in consequence, cueiller;[130] she would have been afraid of giving offence to the gentle songster of Télémaque by calling him, crudely, Fénelon[131] – as I did myself, with good reason, having for my dearest friend the best, most intelligent, and bravest of human beings, unforgettable for all who knew him, Bertrand de Fénelon – and only ever said 'Fénélon', considering that the acute accent added a certain mellowness. The not so soft son-in-law of this Mme Poussin, whose name I have forgotten, when he was a notary in Combray, ran off with the cash-box and caused my uncle, notably, to lose quite a considerable sum. But most of the people of Combray were so well disposed towards the other members of the family that no coldness resulted and all they did was to feel sorry for Mme Poussin. She did not entertain, but every time you passed in front of her railings you stopped to admire the admirable shade under the trees, without being able to make out anything more. She hardly troubled us in Balbec, where I met her only once, at a moment when she was saying to her daughter, busy gnawing at her fingernails: 'When you've got a nice whitlow, we'll see how you like that.'

While Mama was reading on the beach I remained in my room on my own. I recalled the last days of my grandmother's life and everything connected with them, the staircase door that had been kept open when we went out for her last walk. In contrast to all of which, the rest of the world seemed scarcely real and my suffering poisoned it in its entirety. Finally, my mother demanded that I go out. But at each step, some forgotten aspect of the casino, of the street in which, as I waited for her, that first evening, I had gone as far as the statue of Duguay-Trouin,[132] prevented me, like a wind against which you can not battle, from going any further; I looked down so as not to see. And having recovered some of my strength, I went back towards the hotel, towards the hotel where I knew it was henceforth impossible that, however, long I might wait, I should find my grandmother again, my grandmother whom I had once found, on the first evening of our arrival. Since this was the first time I had gone out, many of the servants that I had not yet seen looked at me curiously. On the actual doorstep of the hotel a young chasseur took off his cap to salute me and promptly put it back on again. I imagined that Aimé had, to use his own expression, 'passed on the order' that I was to be shown respect. But I saw in that same instant that, for someone else who was coming back in, he removed it again. The truth was that all this young man knew in life was how to take off and replace his cap, and this he did to perfection. Having realized that he was incapable of anything else but excelled at this, he performed it the greatest number of times he could each day, which earned for him a discreet but general sympathy on the part of the clientele, great sympathy, too, on the part of the porter, to whom fell the task of engaging the chasseurs and who, up until this rara avis, had been unable to find one who did not get himself dismissed within the week, to the great astonishment of Aimé, who used to say: 'Yet in that trade little more's asked of them than to be polite, that shouldn't be so hard.' The manager insisted also that they should look 'present' as he put it, meaning that they should remain there, or rather having failed to retain the word 'presentable'. The appearance of the lawn that stretched behind the hotel had been modified by the creation of a few flowerbeds and the removal, not only of an exotic shrub, but of the chasseur who, the first year, had adorned the entrance externally with the supple stem of his body and the curious colour of his hair. He had followed a Polish countess who had taken him on as a secretary, imitating in this his two elder brothers and his typist sister, snatched from the hotel by personalities of various countries and gender, who had been smitten by their charms. The youngest alone remained, whom no one wanted because he had a squint. He was very happy when the Polish countess and the patrons of the other two came to spend some time at the hotel in Balbec. For, although he envied his brothers, he loved them and was thus able for a few weeks to cultivate family feelings. Was the Abbess of Fontevrault not in the habit, for which she used to abandon her nuns, of going to share in the hospitality offered by Louis XIV to the other Mortemart, his mistress, Mme de Montespan?[133] As for him, this was the first year he had been in Balbec; he did not yet know me, but having heard his longer-serving fellows follow the word Monsieur when they were speaking to me by my name, he imitated them from the very first occasion with an air of satisfaction, either at displaying his training in relation to a personality he adjudged to be well known, or else at conforming to a usage of which he had been unaware five minutes previously but from which it seemed to him indispensable not to depart. I understood very well the attraction this grand hotel might have for certain people. It was arranged like a theatre, and a numerous cast of extras gave life to it all the way up into the flies. Although the guest was only a sort of spectator, he was constantly involved in the spectacle, not even as in those theatres where the actors perform one scene in the auditorium, but as if the spectator's own life were unfolding amidst the sumptuousness of a stage-set. The tennis player might re-enter in a white flannel jacket, but the porter would have put on a blue dress-coat with silver braid to hand him his letters. If this tennis player did not want to walk up, he was no less involved with the actors for having at his side, to take the lift up, the equally richly costumed 'lift'. The upstairs corridors secreted an escape of chambermaids and guests' maids, as lovely against the sea as the frieze of the Panathenaea,[134] all the way to the little bedrooms to which the connoisseurs of ancillary female beauty would come by knowing detours. Downstairs, it was the masculine element that dominated and turned this hotel, thanks to the extreme and indolent youthfulness of its servants, into a sort of Judeo-Christian tragedy that had become flesh and was in continuous performance. Thus I could not help repeating to myself, on seeing them, not, for sure, the lines of Racine that had come into my head at the Princesse de Guermantes's as M. de Vaugoubert was watching the young secretaries from the embassy greeting M. de Charlus, but some other lines from Racine, no longer from Esther this time, but from Athalie: for, starting in the hallway, what in the seventeenth century was known as the portico, there stood 'un peuple florissant'[135] of young chasseurs, especially at tea-time, like the young Israelites of Racine's choruses. But I do not believe a single one of them would have been able to supply even the vague answer that Joas finds for Athalie when the latter asks the child prince: 'Quel est donc votre emploi?',[136] for they had none. At the very most, had any one of their number been asked, like the old queen: 'Mais tout ce peuple enfermé dans ce lieu,/A quoi s'occupe-t-il?',[137] he might have been able to say: ' "Je vois l' ordre pompeux de ces cérémonies",[138] and have my part in them.' From time to time, one of these young extras would move towards some more important character, then the young beauty would rejoin the chorus, and, unless it were a moment of contemplative respite, all would interweave in their futile, respectful, decorative, everyday manoeuvres. For except on their day off, 'loin du monde élevés',[139] and never going beyond the parvis, they led the same ecclesiastical existence as the Levites in Athalie, and, faced by this 'troupe jeune et fidèle',[140] playing at the foot of stairs covered in magnificent carpets, I was able to wonder whether I was making my way into the Grand-Hôtel in Balbec or the Temple of Solomon.

I went directly up to my room. My thoughts had become habitually fixed on the last days of my grandmother's illness, on the sufferings that I was reliving, while increasing them by the element, even harder to endure than the actual suffering of others, added to them by the cruelty of our compassion; when we believe we are merely re-creating the pain of a beloved being, our compassion exaggerates it; yet perhaps it is the compassion that is right, rather than the awareness which those who are suffering have of their pain, from whom the sadness of their life is hidden, whereas compassion sees it, and despairs. Even so, my compassion would have gained fresh impetus and exceeded my grandmother's sufferings had I known then what I was long unaware of, that, on the eve of her death, in a conscious moment and after making sure that I was not there, she had taken Mama's hand and, after pressing her fevered lips to it, had said to her: 'Good-bye, daughter, good-bye for ever.' And it was perhaps this memory also that my mother never again ceased to gaze at so fixedly. Then the sweet memories came back to me. She was my grandmother and I was her grandson. The expressions of her face seemed written in a language that was for me alone; she was everything in my life, others existed only in relation to her, to the judgment she would pass on them; but no, our relations were too fleeting not to have been accidental. She no longer knows me, I shall never see her again. We had not been created solely for one another, she was a stranger. I was busy looking at Saint-Loup's photograph of that stranger. Mama, who had met Albertine, had insisted that I see her because of the kind things she had said to her about grandmother and about myself. I had arranged to meet her therefore. I warned the manager so that he would make her wait in the lounge. He told me he had known her from a long way back, she and her friends, well before they had attained 'the age of purity', but that he resented things they had said about the hotel. 'They can't be so very "illustrated" to talk like that. Unless they've been slandered.' I understood easily enough that he had said 'purity' for 'puberty'. While waiting for it to be time to go and find Albertine, I kept my eyes fixed, as if on a drawing that in the end you are unable to see by dint of having stared at it, on the photograph Saint-Loup had taken, when all of a sudden I again thought: 'It's grandmother, I am her grandson,' just as an amnesiac rediscovers his name, or as an invalid changes personality. Françoise entered, to tell me that Albertine was there and, on seeing the photograph: 'Poor Madame, it's her all over, right down to the beauty spot on her cheek; the day the Marquis photographed her, she'd been very ill, she'd had two bad turns. "Above all, Françoise, she says to me, my grandson mustn't know." And she hid it so well, she was always cheerful in company. Alone, mark you, I thought she seemed at times as if her spirits were a bit monotonous. But it soon passed. And then she'd say to me right out: "If anything were ever to happen to me, he'd need to have a portrait of me. I've never had a single one done." Then she sent me to say to Monsieur the Marquis, advising him not to tell Monsieur it was her who'd asked him, whether he couldn't take her photograph. But when I came back to tell her yes, she wouldn't any more because she thought she looked so poorly. "It'd be even worse, she says to me, than no photograph at all." But as she wasn't stupid, she finally arranged things very well by putting on a big turned-down hat so it no longer showed when she wasn't in the full daylight. She was very pleased with her photograph, because at that moment she didn't think she'd be returning from Balbec. It was no good my saying: "You mustn't talk that way, Madame, I don't like hearing Madame talking that way", she'd got it into her head. And, good Lord, there were several days when she wasn't able to eat. That's why she urged Monsieur to go and dine a long way off with Monsieur le Marquis. Then instead of going to the table she pretended to read and as soon as the Marquis's carriage had gone, she went up to bed. Some days she wanted to warn Madame to come so she'd see her again. And then she was afraid it would surprise her, as she hadn't said anything to her. "It's better she stays with her husband, you know, Françoise." ' Françoise, her eyes on me, asked all of a sudden if I felt 'indisposed'. I told her no; and she: 'And then you keep me tied up here talking to you. Perhaps your visit's arrived already. I must go down. She's not a person for here. And always on the move as she is, she may have left again. She doesn't like to wait. Oh, now, Mademoiselle Albertine, she's quite a one. – You're wrong, Françoise, she's quite respectable, too respectable for here. But go and warn her I shan't be able to see her today.'

What pitying declamations I should have aroused in Françoise had she seen me crying! I carefully hid it from her. Otherwise I should have had her sympathy. But I gave her mine. We do not put ourselves sufficiently often into the hearts of these poor servants who cannot see us cry, as if crying were harmful to us; or perhaps harmful to them, Françoise having said to me when I was small: 'Don't cry like that, I don't like seeing you cry like that.' We do not like high-flown phrases or attestations, and we are wrong, we thereby close our hearts to the pathos of the countryside, to the legend which the poor serving-woman, having been dismissed, perhaps unjustly, for stealing, white-faced, become suddenly humbler as if to be accused were a crime, unfolds in invoking her father's honesty, her mother's principles, her grandmother's good advice. Admittedly, these same servants who can not endure our tears, will not hesitate to make us catch pneumonia because the housemaid downstairs likes draughts and it would not be polite to prevent them. For the very ones who are right, like Françoise, have also to be wrong, so that Justice becomes an impossibility. Even the humble pleasures of women servants provoke either a refusal or the mockery of their employers. For it is always some trifle, foolishly sentimental and unhygienic. Thus they may say: 'What, it's the one thing I ask for all year, and I'm not granted it.' Yet the employers would grant far more, were it not stupid or dangerous for them – or for themselves. True, there is no withstanding the humility of the poor housemaid, trembling, ready to confess to what she has not committed, saying 'I'll go this evening if I have to.' But we must be able also not to remain insensitive, for all the solemn, threatening banality of the things she says, to her maternal heritage and the dignity of the 'close', faced by an old cook draped in an honourable life and ancestry, clutching her broom like a sceptre, playing her role for tragedy, interspersing it with tears, drawing herself majestically up. On the day in question I recalled or imagined such scenes, and I linked them to our old servant, after which, despite all the harm she was able to do Albertine, I loved Françoise with an affection, intermittent it is true, but of the strongest kind, that which is founded on compassion.

Certainly, I suffered all that day by remaining in front of my grandmother's photograph. It tormented me. Less, however, than did the manager's evening visit. As I was talking to him of my grandmother and he was renewing his condolences, I heard him say (for he loved using the words he mispronounced): 'It's like the day when Madame your grandmother had that suncopy, I wanted to warn you, because on account of the clientele, you know? It might have been bad for the establishment. It would've been better for her to leave that same evening. But she begged me not to say anything and promised me she wouldn't have any more suncopies or that she'd leave at the first one. The chef de l'étage reported to me, however, that she'd had another one. But, good Lord, you were old patrons we were trying to please, and given that no one had complained…' So my grandmother had had syncopes and had kept them from me. Perhaps at the very time when I was being least nice to her, and when she was obliged, unwell though she was, to be careful to remain good-humoured so as not to annoy me and to appear to be healthy so as not to be shown the door of the hotel. 'Suncopy' is a word that, so pronounced, I would never have imagined, which would perhaps, applied to others, have struck me as absurd, but which, by the strange novelty of its sound, similar to that of an original dissonance, long remained what was capable of evoking the most painful sensations in me.

The next day I went at Mama's request to stretch out on the sand for a while, or rather in the dunes, at a point where you are hidden by their folds, and where I knew that Albertine and her friends would not be able to find me. My lowered eyelids let through only one, pink, light, that of the internal walls of my eyes. Then they closed altogether. And now my grandmother appeared to me sitting in an armchair. She was so weak she seemed less alive than other people. Yet I could hear her breathing; now and again, a sign showed that she had understood what we were saying, my father and I. But it was in vain that I embraced her, I could not succeed in arousing a look of affection in her eyes or a spot of colour in her cheeks. Absent from herself, she appeared not to love me, not to know me, perhaps not to see me. I could not guess the secret of her indifference, her dejection, her silent displeasure. I drew my father aside. 'You can tell all the same, I said, there's no denying it, she's taken everything in perfectly. It's a complete illusion of life. If only we could get your cousin to come who claims that the dead aren't alive! It's more than a year now since she died yet all in all she's still alive. But why won't she embrace me? – Look, her poor head is falling back. – But she'd like to go to the Champs-Elysées in a little while. – That's madness! – Really, you think it could do her any harm, that she could die any more? It's not possible she no longer loves me. It'll be no good my embracing her, will she never smile at me again? – What do you expect, the dead are the dead.'

A few days later I found comfort in looking at the photograph Saint-Loup had taken; it did not reawaken the memory of what Françoise had told me because that had not left me again and I had become used to it. But in contrast to the idea I had formed of how serious and painful her condition was that day, the photograph, profiting still from the stratagems my grandmother had employed, which succeeded in deceiving me even now that they had been uncovered, showed her looking so elegant, so carefree, beneath the hat that partly hid her face, that I saw her as less unhappy and in better health than I had imagined. And yet, her cheeks having, without her knowing it, an expression of their own, something leaden and haggard, like the look of an animal that feels itself already chosen and marked down, my grandmother wore the air of someone under a death sentence, an involuntarily sombre, unconsciously tragic air that had eluded me but which stopped Mama from ever looking at this photograph, a photograph that seemed to her a photograph not so much of her mother as of the latter's illness, of an insult delivered by that illness to Grandmother's brutally abused face.

Then one day I made up my mind to let Albertine know that I would receive her shortly. The fact was that, one morning of great and premature heat, the innumerable shouts of the children playing, of the bathers as they joked, of the newspaper sellers, had described to me, in lines of fire, in a latticework of sparks, the scorching hot beach, which the ripples were coming one by one to sprinkle with their coolness; then the symphony concert had begun, mixed in with the lapping of the water, in which the violins vibrated like a swarm of bees strayed over the sea. I had at once longed to hear Albertine's laugh once more, to see her friends again, the young girls, outlined against the waves, who had remained in my memory as the inseparable charm, the characteristic flora of Balbec; and I had resolved to send word to Albertine by Françoise, for the following week, as, gently rising, at each unfurling of a wave, the crystalline flux of the sea completely drowned the melody, whose phrases seemed separated one from the next, like those angels with their lutes who, on the roof-ridge of the Italian cathedral, rise up between the crests of blue porphyry and foaming jasper. But on the day when Albertine came, the weather had deteriorated again and grown cooler, and I had no opportunity in any case of hearing her laugh; she was in a very bad mood. 'Balbec's a bore this year, she said. I shall try not to stay long. You know I've been here since Easter, that's more than a month. There's no one. If you think that's a lot of fun.' Despite the recent rain and the sky that was changing from minute to minute, after going with Albertine as far as Epreville, since Albertine, to use her own term, was 'ferrying' between the small resort where Mme Bontemps's villa was, and Incarville, where she had been taken in 'en pension' by Rosemonde's parents, I left to take a walk on my own towards the main road that Mme de Villeparisis's carriage had taken when we went out with my grandmother; puddles of water that the bright sunshine had not dried out had turned the ground into a real quagmire, and I thought of my grandmother who, in the old days, could not go two steps without getting mud on her. But the moment I reached the road, what bedazzlement. There where, in August, with my grandmother, I had seen only the leaves and as it were the emplacement of the apple trees, they were in full flower for as far as the eye could see, unimaginably luxuriant, their feet in the mud but wearing their ball-gowns, not taking any precautions so as not to spoil the most marvellous pink satin that you ever set eyes on, made to shine by the sunlight; the far-off horizon of the sea provided the apple trees with what was in effect a background from a Japanese print; if I raised my head to look at the sky between the flowers, which made its blue appear the more cloudless, almost violent, they seemed to draw aside so as to display the depth of that paradise. Beneath this azure a slight but fresh breeze was causing the reddening bouquets to shiver slightly. Blue tits were coming to settle on the branches and were leaping about among the indulgent flowers, as if it were some lover of exoticism and of colours who had artificially created this living beauty. But it moved one almost to tears because, however excessive these effects of a refined artifice, you felt that it was natural, that these apple trees were there, in the heart of the countryside, like peasants, on one of the highways of France. Then to the rays of sunlight there suddenly succeeded those of the rain; they striped the entire horizon, drawing their grey mesh tight round the line of apple trees. But these continued to raise aloft their pink, flowering beauty, in a wind now become icy beneath the shower of rain that was falling: it was a day in spring.

CHAPTER 2

The mysteries of Albertine. – The girls she sees in the mirror. – The unknown lady. – The liftboy. – Madame de Cambremer. – The pleasures of M. Nissim Bernard. – First outline of Morel's strange character. – M. de Charlus dines at the Verdurins'.

In my fear that the pleasure found in this solitary walk might weaken the memory of my grandmother in me, I sought to revive it by thinking of some great moral suffering that she had experienced; at my summons, this suffering tried to erect itself in my heart, throwing up its immense pillars there; but my heart was doubtless too small for it, I did not have the strength to bear so great a sorrow, my attention slipped away just as it was reforming into a whole, and its arches crumbled before they had come together, just as waves break before they have completed their vault.

Meanwhile, if only from my dreams when I was asleep, I might have learned that my grief at my grandmother's death was diminishing, for she appeared there less oppressed by the idea I had been forming of her non-existence. I saw her as an invalid still, but on the way to recovering; I thought she looked better. And if she alluded to what she had suffered, I stopped her mouth with my kisses and assured her that now she was cured for ever. I would have liked to make the sceptics acknowledge that death is in truth an illness from which we recover. Only I did not find in my grandmother the rich spontaneity of old. Her words were only an enfeebled, docile response, a mere echo almost, of my own words; she was no longer anything more than the reflection of my own thoughts.

Incapable though I was as yet of again experiencing physical desire, Albertine was beginning meanwhile to fill me with something like a desire for happiness. Certain dreams of a shared tenderness, forever floating inside us, readily unite themselves by a sort of affinity to the memory (provided this has already become a little shadowy) of a woman with whom we have experienced pleasure. This feeling recalled for me aspects of Albertine's face, softer, less cheerful, rather different from those which physical desire would have evoked in me; and since it was also less pressing than this last, I would willingly have adjourned its realization to the following winter, without seeking to see Albertine again in Balbec before her departure. Yet even in the midst of a still keen grief, physical desire revives. From my bed, where I was made to stay resting for long periods each day, I wished that Albertine might come back and resume our old games. Are married couples not soon to be found once again intertwined, in the very bedroom where they have lost a child, in order to give the dead little one a brother? I tried to find distraction from this desire by going to the window to look at that day's sea. As in that first year, the seas were rarely the same from one day to the next. But they scarcely resembled those of that first year, on the other hand, either because now it was spring, with its storms, or because, even if I had come on the same date as the first occasion, the different, more changeable weather might not have recommended this coast to certain indolent, vaporous and fragile seas that I had seen on days of burning heat sleeping on the beach, lifting their blue bosom imperceptibly with a soft palpitation, or above all because my eyes, educated by Elstir to retain precisely those elements that I had once wilfully discarded, dwelt at length on what that first year they had not known how to see. The opposition that had so struck me then, between the rustic excursions I took with Mme de Villeparisis and this fluid, inaccessible, mythological vicinity of the everlasting Ocean, no longer existed for me. On certain days, the sea itself now seemed to me, on the contrary, almost rural. On the quite rare days of truly fine weather, the heat had traced on the water, as if across the countryside, a white and dusty road, behind which there protruded, like a village steeple, the delicate tip of a fishing-boat. A tugboat, of which only the funnel was visible, would be smoking in the distance like a secluded factory, while, alone on the horizon, a bellying white square, painted no doubt by a sail but which appeared compact and as if made of chalk, put you in mind of the sunlit corner of some isolated building, a hospital or a school. And the clouds and the wind, on the days when they were added to the sunshine, completed, if not the error of judgment, at least the illusion of a first glance, the suggestion it awakens in the imagination. For, on stormy days, the alternation between sharply defined areas of colour, like those resulting in the countryside from the contiguity of different crops, the harsh, yellow, as if muddy irregularities of the sea's surface, the embankments and slopes that hid from view a boat on which a crew of agile sailors seemed to be harvesting, all this made of the ocean something as varied, as consistent, as uneven, as populous, as civilized, as the land that was navigable, where I would before long be driving again. On one occasion, unable any longer to withstand my desire, instead of going back to bed, I got dressed and went off to find Albertine in Incarville. I would ask her to go with me as far as Douville, where I would pay Mme de Cambremer a visit at Féterne, and at La Raspelière, a visit to Mme Verdurin. During which time, Albertine would be waiting for me on the beach and we would come back together in the dark. I went to catch the little branch-line train, all of whose local nicknames I had once learned from Albertine and her friends, it being known variously as the Slowcoach, on account of its innumerable detours, the Rattletrap, because of its slow progress, the Ocean Liner, on account of a fearsome siren it possessed to make passers-by get out of the way, the Decauville[1] and the Funi, even though it was nothing like a funicular, but because it climbed up the cliff, nor even, properly speaking, a Decauville, but because it had a 60-centimetre track, the B.A.G. because it went from Balbec to Grattevast via Angerville, the tram and the T.S.N. because it formed part of the line of the Tramways du Sud de la Normandie. I installed myself in a carriage where I was alone, it was gloriously sunny, and stifling; I lowered the blue blind, which let only a strip of sunlight through. But I at once saw my grandmother, as she had been when sitting in the train on our departure from Paris for Balbec, and when, pained at seeing me drinking beer, she had preferred not to look, to close her eyes and pretend to be asleep. I, who had been unable to endure her sufferings in the old days when my grandfather took cognac, I had inflicted this pain on her, not simply even of seeing me take, at someone else's invitation, a drink she believed disastrous for me, but I had forced her to leave me free to swill it down as I pleased; worse still, by my rages and my breathless attacks, I had forced her to help me, to recommend it, in a supreme act of resignation whose wordless, despairing image I had before my memory, her eyes closed so as not to see. Such a memory, like a wave from a magic wand, had once again given back to me the soul I had been in the act of losing for some time past; what could I have done with Rosemonde[2] when across the whole of my lips there was passing only a desperate desire to kiss a dead woman? What could I have said to the Cambremers and the Verdurins when my heart was pounding because the sorrow that my grandmother had endured was constantly re-forming there? I could not remain in that carriage. As soon as the train stopped in Maineville-la-Teinturière, abandoning my plans, I got out. Maineville had for some time past been acquiring a considerable importance and a particular reputation, because a director of numerous casinos, a purveyor of well-being, had had built, not far from there, with an opulence of bad taste capable of competing with that of a grand hotel, an establishment to which we shall be returning, and which was, to make no bones about it, the first brothel for the smart set that anyone had thought to build on the coasts of France. It was the only one. Every port has its brothel, of course, but good only for sailors and for lovers of local colour, who get amusement from seeing, right next door to the immemorial church, the madam, herself almost as old, venerable and moss-covered, standing in front of her door of ill repute waiting for the fishing boats to return.

Avoiding the dazzling house of 'pleasure', insolently erected there despite the family protests addressed in vain to the mayor, I rejoined the cliff and followed its winding paths in the direction of Balbec. I heard the summons of the hawthorns, without responding. As its less affluent neighbours, they found the apple blossom very heavy, while acknowledging the fresh complexions worn by the daughters, with their pink petals, of the great cider-makers. They knew that, though less richly dowried, they were yet more sought after, and that a rumpled whiteness was all they required by way of attraction.

When I got back, the hotel porter handed me a letter announcing a bereavement on the part of the Marquis and Marquise de Gonneville, the Vicomte and Vicomtesse d'Amfreville, the Comte and Comtesse de Berneville, the Marquis and Marquise de Graincourt, the Comte d'Amenoncourt, the Comtesse de Maineville, the Comte and Comtesse de Franquetot, the Comtesse de Chaverny née d'Aigleville, and which I finally understood why it had been sent to me when I recognized the names of the Marquise de Cambremer née du Mesnil La Guichard, and of the Marquis and Marquise de Cambremer, and when I saw that the dead woman, a cousin of the Cambremers, had been called Eléonore-Euphrasie-Humbertine de Cambremer, Comtesse de Criquetot. Nowhere in this extensive provincial family, the enumeration of which filled lines of fine, close-set writing, was there a single bourgeois, nor a single familiar title for that matter, but the whole ban and arrière-ban of the regional nobility, whose names – those of all the interesting places in the region – they made to sing with their joyful endings in ville, or court, or sometimes more dully (in tot). Clad in the tiles of their château or the roughcast of their church, their nodding heads barely protruding above the vaulting or the corps de logis, and then only in order to be crowned by the Norman lantern or the half-timbering of the pepperpot roof, they seemed to have sounded the rallying-cry for all the pretty villages arranged in echelon or scattered for fifty leagues roundabout and to have set them out in close formation, without one gap, or one intruder, on the compact, rectangular chessboard of this aristocratic, black-edged letter.

My mother had gone back up to her room, meditating on this sentence from Mme de Sévigné – 'I see none of those who seek to distract me; in veiled words, the fact is they want to stop me from thinking of you and that offends me' – because the First President had told her she should find some amusement. To me he whispered: 'It's the Princesse de Parme.' My fear was dispelled on seeing that the woman the magistrate was pointing to had no connection with Her Royal Highness. But since she had reserved a room in order to spend the night on returning from Mme de Luxembourg's, the news had the effect on many of making them assume that every newly arrived lady was the Princesse de Parme – and on me, of making me go up and shut myself away in my garret. I would not have wanted to remain there alone. It was barely four o'clock. I asked Françoise to go and find Albertine so that she might come and spend the end of the afternoon with me.

I think I would be lying if I said that the painful and perpetual mistrust that Albertine was to inspire in me had already begun, let alone the particular, above all Gomorran, character which that mistrust was to assume. True, from that day forward – thought it was not the first – my expectations were a little fraught. Françoise, once gone, stayed away so long that I began to lose hope. I had not lit any lamps. It was barely daylight any longer. The wind was making the flag on the casino flap. And more sickly still, in the silence of the shore, where the sea was coming in, and like a voice as it were translating and enhancing the enervating uncertainty of that false, anxious hour of the day, a small barrel-organ had stopped in front of the hotel and was playing Viennese waltzes. At last Françoise arrived, but alone. 'I've been as quick as I could but she wouldn't come because she didn't think her hair was good enough. If she didn't stay a whole hour by the clock pomading herself, she didn't stay five minutes. It'll be a real scent-shop here. She's coming, she stayed behind to fix herself up in front of the mirror. I thought I'd find her here.' It was still a long time before Albertine arrived. But her cheerfulness and kindness on this occasion dispelled my unhappiness. She announced (contrary to what she had said the other day) that she would be staying for the whole season and asked whether we could not, as the first year, see each other every day. I told her that at the moment I was too unhappy and that instead I would send for her from time to time, at the last minute, as in Paris. 'If ever you feel sad or if your heart tells you to, don't hesitate, she said, send for me, I'll come running, and if you're not afraid it might cause a scandal in the hotel, I'll stay as long as you like.' On bringing her back, Françoise had worn a happy expression, as on every occasion when she had put herself out on my behalf and succeeded in pleasing me. But Albertine herself counted for nothing in this delight and the very next day Françoise was to speak these profound words to me: 'Monsieur shouldn't see that young lady. I can easily tell the sort of character she has, she'll cause you unhappiness.' Showing Albertine out, I caught sight through the lit dining-room of the Princesse de Parme. I merely looked at her while contriving not to be seen. But I will admit that I found a certain grandeur in the regal courtesy that had caused me to smile at the Guermantes's. It is a principle that sovereign princes are at home anywhere, and protocol translates this into dead and worthless customs such as that which has it that the host should keep his hat in his hand, in his own house, in order to show that he is no longer at home but at the prince's. Now the Princesse de Parme had not perhaps formulated this idea to herself, but so imbued with it was she that all her actions, invented on the spur of the moment to meet the circumstances, betrayed it. When she got up from the table she handed Aimé a large tip, as if he had been there solely on her account or as if, on leaving a château, she were rewarding a maître d'hôtel who had been detailed to attend on her. She did not content herself with the tip, moreover, but, with a gracious smile, addressed a few friendly and flattering words to him, with which her mother had supplied her. A minute more and she would be telling him that, just as the hotel was so very well maintained, so Normandy was prospering, and that of all the countries in the world she preferred France. Another coin slipped out of the Princesse's hand, for the sommelier, whom she had sent for and to whom she insisted on expressing her satisfaction, like a general who has just reviewed his troops. The 'lift' had come up at that same moment to give her a reply; he, too, received a word, a smile and a tip, all combined with some humble and encouraging words intended to prove that she was nothing more than one of them. Since Aimé, the sommelier, the 'lift' and the others thought it would be impolite not to wear the broadest of smiles for someone who was smiling at them, she was soon surrounded by a group of servants with whom she chatted benevolently; such manners being unusual in grand hotels, the people going past along the beach, not knowing her name, thought they were seeing an habituée of Balbec, who, on account of her unimpressive origins or out of professional self-interest (she was perhaps the wife of a champagne representative), was less different from the domestic staff than the genuinely smart patrons. For my part, I thought of the palace in Parma, and of the advice, part religious and part political, given to the Princesse, who behaved towards the populace as though she must win them over in order to reign one day; or rather, as though she were reigning already.

I went back up into my room, but I was not alone there. I could hear the mellow sound of someone playing Schumann. People, even those that we love the most, may, it is true, become saturated by the sadness or irritation that emanates from us. There is one thing, however, capable of a power of exasperation to which no human being will ever attain: a piano.

Albertine had made me take note of the dates on which she was due to be away, to go to her girl-friends' for a few days, and had made me write down their addresses also in case I had need of her on one of these evenings, since none of them lived too far away. This meant that, in order to find her, a chain of flowers, linking one girl to another, formed quite naturally around her. I dare to confess that many of her friends – I did not yet love her – afforded me moments of pleasure on one beach or another. These benevolent young companions did not seem many in number. But lately my mind has gone back to them, and their names have returned. I reckoned that in that one season, twelve granted me their fragile favours. One name came back to me later, which made thirteen. I then felt a childish fear of remaining on that number. I reflected, alas, that I had overlooked the first of them, Albertine, who was no more and who made the fourteenth.

To take up the thread of my story again, I had written down the names and addresses of the girls at whose houses I would find her on such and such a day when she would not be in Incarville, but I thought I would take advantage of those days rather to go to Mme Verdurin's. Our desires for different women are in any case not all equally strong. On a particular evening we cannot do without the woman who, afterwards, will hardly trouble us for the next month or two. And besides, apart from the reasons for alternating, for the study of which this is not the place, after the great exertions of the flesh, the woman whose image haunts our momentary senility is a woman whom we would hardly even kiss on the brow. As for Albertine, I saw her rarely, and only on those widely spaced-out evenings when I could not be without her. Should such a desire take hold of me when she was too far from Balbec for Françoise to be able to go there, I would send the 'lift' to Epreville, La Sogne or Saint-Frichoux, by asking him to stop work a little early. He would come into my room but left the door open, for, although he did his 'job' most conscientiously, which was arduous, consisting of much cleaning, starting at five o'clock in the morning, he could never find the strength to close a door, and if you pointed out to him that it was open, he would go back and, by succeeding in making a supreme effort, give it a gentle push. With the democratic vanity characteristic of him, but to which, in their careers, members of the fairly numerous professions, lawyers, doctors, men of letters, never attain, referring to another lawyer, man of letters or doctor simply as 'my colleague', he, making use, quite rightly, of a term reserved for exclusive bodies such as academies, for example, would say to me, when speaking of a chasseur who worked the lift one day in two, 'I'm going to see my associate takes my place'. This vanity did not prevent him, with the aim of improving what he called his 'salary', from accepting remuneration for his errands, which had led Françoise to develop a strong dislike of him: 'Yes, the first time you see him he looks as if butter wouldn't melt in his mouth, but there are days when he's about as polite as a prison gate. They're all just money-grubbers.' A category in which she had so often placed Eulalie, and in which, alas, for all the misfortunes to which it was one day to lead me, she had already classed Albertine, because she often saw me asking Mama, on behalf of my far from wealthy loved one, for small objects, trinkets, which Françoise thought inexcusable, because Mme Bontemps had only the one maid of all work. Very soon, the 'lift', having taken off what I would have called his uniform and what he termed his tunic, would appear in a straw hat, with a cane, attentive to his gait and holding himself erect, for his mother had advised him never to adopt the style of a 'workman' or 'chasseur'. Just as, thanks to books, knowledge is knowledge to a workman who is no longer a workman once his labours are over, so, thanks to the boater and to the pair of gloves, elegance had been brought within reach of the 'lift' who, having stopped taking guests up for the evening, believed, like a young surgeon who has removed his smock, or Sergeant Saint-Loup his uniform, he had turned into a perfect man of the world. He did not in any case lack ambition, any more than a talent for handling his cage and not causing you to stop between floors. But his language was defective. I believed in his ambition because, in speaking of the hall-porter, whose dependant he was, he would say: 'my hall-porter', in the same tone of voice as a man who, owning in Paris what the chasseur would have called 'a private mansion', would have spoken of his doorman. As for the liftboy's language, it is odd that someone who heard the guests calling out 'ascenseur' fifty times a day, should himself only ever have said 'accenseur'.[3] Certain things about this liftboy were extremely irritating: whatever I might have said to him, he would break in with a phrase, 'I'll say!' or 'Imagine!', which seemed to signify either that my remark was so self-evident that anyone at all might have thought of it, or else to transfer its merits on to himself as if it were he who had drawn my attention to it. 'I'll say!' and 'Imagine!', exclaimed with the utmost vigour, came to his lips every two minutes, for things that would never have entered his head, which so irritated me that I at once began saying the opposite, to show him he understood not the first thing. But to my second assertion, incompatible though it was with the first, he would still answer: 'I'll say!' or 'Imagine!', as if these words were inevitable. I found it hard to forgive him also for employing certain terms of his trade, which would for that reason have been perfectly suitable if used literally, only in a figurative sense, which lent them a somewhat puerile pretension to wit, the verb 'to pedal' for example. He never used it when he had run an errand by bicycle. But if, on foot, he had had to hurry so as to be on time, to signify that he had walked quickly, he would say: 'You can imagine how I pedalled!' The liftboy was on the small side, of poor physique and somewhat ugly. Which did not stop him, whenever you mentioned a young man who was tall, slim and fine-featured, from saying: 'Oh, yes, I know, one who's just my height.' One day, when I was waiting for an answer from him, as someone had been coming up the stairs, at the sound of footsteps I had in my impatience opened the door of my room, to see a chasseur as handsome as Endymion, with features of an unbelievable perfection, who had come for a lady whom I did not know. Once the liftboy had returned, on telling him with what impatience I had been awaiting his answer, I told how I had thought it was him coming upstairs but that it was a chasseur from the Hôtel de Normandie. 'Oh, yes, I know the one, he said, there's only one, a boy my own size. To look at, too, he's so like me we could be mistaken for one another, you'd say he was my twin.' Finally, he liked appearing to have understood everything right from the start, which meant that, as soon as you were advising him of something, he would say: 'Yes, yes, yes, yes, yes, I understand perfectly', with a decisiveness and an air of intelligence that took me in for a time; but, as we get to know them, people are like a metal plunged into some corrosive mixture, and can be seen gradually losing their good qualities (as sometimes their defects). Before giving him my instructions, I saw that he had left the door open; I pointed this out, I was afraid we might be overheard; he condescended to my wishes and returned, having reduced the opening. 'That's so as to please you. But there's no one on this floor any more but the two of us.' I immediately heard one, then two, then three people go past. This annoyed me because of the possible indiscretion, but above all because I could see that it in no way surprised him but was simply the normal traffic. 'Yes, it's the chambermaid from next door going to fetch her things. Yes, it's not of any importance, it's the sommelier bringing up his keys. No, no, it's nothing, you can speak, it's my associate who's going on duty.' And since the reasons that all these people had for going past did not lessen my annoyance that they might overhear me, at my formal order, he went, not to close the door, which was beyond the capacities of this cyclist who longed for a 'motorbike', but to push it a little further to. 'There, now we'll be nice and quiet.' We were so much so that an American woman entered and withdrew, apologizing for having mistaken the room. 'You're to bring the girl back here to me,' I said to him, after myself slamming the door with all my strength (which brought another chasseur to make sure no windows were open). 'I'm sure you can remember: Mlle Albertine Simonet. It's on the envelope in any case. All you need do is tell her it's from me. She'll come very willingly, I added, to encourage him not to humiliate me too much. – I'll say! – No, on the contrary, it's by no means a matter of course that she'll come willingly. It's very inconvenient to come here from Berneville. – I understand! – You'll tell her to come with you. – Yes, yes, yes, yes, I understand perfectly,' he replied in that precise, quick tone of voice that had long since ceased to create a 'good impression' on me because I knew it was more or less automatic and concealed beneath its seeming decisiveness much vagueness and stupidity. 'What time will you be back? – It'll not take me very long,' said the 'lift', who, taking to an extreme the rule, laid down by Bélise, of avoiding the recidivism of adding a pas to a ne, always contented himself with a single negative.[4] 'I can very easily go there. In fact, time off was cancelled this afternoon because there was a private party of twenty for lunch. And it was my turn to be off this afternoon. It's only fair if I'm out for a bit this evening. I'll take my bike with me. That way I'll be quick.' And an hour later he arrived, saying: 'Monsieur's had to wait indeed, but the young lady's come with me. She's downstairs. – Ah, thank you, the hall-porter won't be angry with me? – Monsieur Paul? Doesn't know where I been even. Even the door head had nothing to say.' But once when I had said to him: 'You absolutely must bring her back here,' he said to me with a smile: 'You know I couldn't find her. She's not there. And I couldn't stay longer; I was afraid of being like my associate who was moved from the hotel' (for the 'lift', who talked of rejoining a profession when one is joining it for the first time: 'I'd be very happy to rejoin the post office', by way of compensation, either so as to soften the blow if it was he who was involved, or else to insinuate it in a more mealy-mouthed and perfidious way if it involved someone else, suppressed the 're-' and said 'I know he was moved.'). It was not out of malice that he smiled, but on account of his shyness. He thought he could lessen the significance of his lapse by treating it as a joke. Similarly, while he had said 'You know I couldn't find her,' it was not because he in fact believed I knew that already. On the contrary, he was in no doubt that I did not know and was above all alarmed. Thus he said 'you know' so as to spare himself the agonies he would go through in uttering the words intended to inform me of it. We should never lose our tempers with those who, when we catch them out, start sniggering. They do so, not because they are making fun, but are fearful that we may be displeased. Let us evince great compassion, show great gentleness to those who laugh. Like a veritable stroke, the 'lift's' agitation had produced not only an apoplectic redness but a deterioration in his vocabulary, become suddenly familiar. He ended by explaining that Albertine was not in Epreville, that she would be back only at nine o'clock and that if sometimes, which meant by any chance, she were to return sooner, she would be given the message, and she would at all events be with me before one a.m.

It was not even on that evening, however, that my cruel mistrust began to take shape. No, to have out with it and although the episode took place only several weeks later, it was born of a remark of Cottard's. Albertine and her friends had wanted on that particular day to drag me along to the casino in Incarville and, as luck would have it, I would not have joined them there (wishing to go and pay a call on Mme Verdurin, who had invited me a number of times), had I not been held up in Incarville itself by the tram breaking down, which was going to take some time to put right. Walking up and down while waiting for them to finish, I suddenly found myself face to face with Doctor Cottard, who had come to Incarville for a consultation. I hesitated almost to wish him good day as he had not replied to any of my letters. But friendliness does not manifest itself in the same fashion in everyone. Not having been constrained by his upbringing to the same fixed rules of savoir-vivre as members of society, Cottard was full of good intentions of which we were unaware, which we denied, up until the day when he had the opportunity to display them. He apologized, had indeed received my letters, had signalled my presence to the Verdurins, who had a strong desire to see me and to whom he advised me to go. He even wanted to take me there that same evening, since he would be catching the little branch-line train again to go and dine there. As I was wavering and as he still had a little time before his train, the breakdown going to be quite prolonged, I made him enter the little casino, one of those that I had found so sad on the evening of my first arrival, full now of the tumult of young girls who, for want of male partners, were dancing together. Andrée came glissading up to me, I was anticipating leaving again in a moment with Cottard to go to the Verdurins', when I refused his offer once and for all, overcome by too keen a desire to remain with Albertine. For the fact was I had just heard her laughing. And that laugh at once summoned up the pink carnations, the perfumed walls against which it seemed to have just brushed and from which, pungent, sensual and revealing as the scent of geraniums, it seemed to be transporting with it a few almost ponderable, irritant and secret particles.

One of the girls whom I did not know sat down at the piano, and Andrée asked Albertine to waltz with her. Happy, in this little casino, to reflect that I was going to remain with these girls, I pointed out to Cottard how well they danced. But he, from the specialized perspective of a doctor, and with his faulty upbringing, which took no account of the fact that I knew these girls, whom he must, however, have seen me greeting, replied: 'Yes, but the parents are very unwise who let their daughters pick up such habits. I certainly wouldn't allow my own to come here. Are they pretty anyway? I can't make out their features. There, look,' he added, pointing to Albertine and Andrée, who were waltzing slowly, pressed one against the other, 'I've forgotten my eyeglass and I can't see properly, but they're certainly at the height of arousal. It's not sufficiently well known that it's chiefly through the breasts that women experience it. And look, theirs are touching, completely.' Indeed, those of Andrée and of Albertine had not ceased to be in contact. I do not know whether they heard or guessed at Cottard's observation, but they drew slightly apart while continuing to waltz. At that moment, Andrée said something to Albertine and the latter laughed, with that same deep, penetrating laugh I had heard just before. But the disturbance it brought me this time was more than simply cruel; Albertine seemed to be demonstrating, to be making Andrée acknowledge, some secret and voluptuous tremor. It had the ring of the first or last chords of some unknown celebration. I left again with Cottard, my thoughts elsewhere as I talked with him, reflecting only at intervals on the scene I had just witnessed. Not that Cottard's conversation was interesting. At that particular moment it had turned sour even because we had just caught sight of Doctor du Boulbon, who did not see us. He had come to spend time on the far side of the bay of Balbec, where he was in great demand. Now, although Cottard was in the habit of declaring that he did not practise medicine when on holiday, he had hoped to create for himself a select practice along this coast, to which du Boulbon found himself forming an obstacle. True, the Balbec doctor could not trouble Cottard. He was simply a very conscientious doctor who knew everything and to whom you could not mention the least itch without his immediately prescribing, in some complex formula, the appropriate pomade, liniment or lotion. As Marie Gineste put it in her pretty way of talking, he knew how to 'charm away' injuries and sores. But he lacked distinction. He had in fact caused Cottard some small annoyance. The latter, since he had been seeking to exchange his professorial chair for one in therapeutics, had made a special study of toxicants. Toxicants, a perilous innovation in medicine, serving to rewrite the labels of the pharmacists, all of whose products are declared to be, contrary to similar drugs, absolutely non-toxic, or detoxicant even. This is the fashionable claim; the guarantee that the product has been carefully antisepticized survives, if only just, at the bottom, in illegible letters, like the faint vestige of a previous fashion. Toxicants serve also to reassure the patient, who learns to his delight that his paralysis is only some passing toxic malaise. Now a Grand-Duke having come to spend a few days in Balbec, and having a badly swollen eye, he had sent for Cottard, who, in exchange for a few hundred-franc notes (the Professor would not put himself out for less), had ascribed the inflammation to a toxic condition and prescribed a detoxifying treatment. The swelling did not go down, and the Grand-Duke fell back on the usual Balbec doctor, who within five minutes had extracted a speck of dust. The next day all sign of it had gone. A more dangerous rival, however, was a celebrated specialist in nervous diseases. He was a red-faced, jovial man, both because his close acquaintance with nervous collapse did not stop him enjoying the rudest of health but also in order to reassure his patients by the loud laugh of his 'good morning' and his 'good-bye', even if his athlete's arms might later help to slip the straitjacket on them. All the same, the moment you spoke with him in company, whether about politics or about literature, he would listen to you with a benign attentiveness, as if to say: 'What's the problem?', without pronouncing right away, as though this were a consultation. But he after all, whatever his gifts, was a specialist. And so the whole of Cottard's fury had been transferred on to du Boulbon. For the rest, I soon left the Professor, the friend of the Verdurins, in order to return home, promising him I would go and visit them.

The hurt that his remarks concerning Albertine and Andrée had caused me was profound, but the worst of the pain was not felt by me straight away, as happens in those cases of poisoning which take effect only after a certain interval of time.

On the evening when the 'lift' had gone to fetch her, Albertine did not come, despite his assurances. It is true that a person's attractions are a less frequent cause of love than some such phrase as: 'No, this evening I shan't be free.' We pay little heed to those words if we are with friends; we remain cheerful throughout the evening, we are not preoccupied by a certain mental picture; during such time it is immersed in the requisite mixture; on coming home we find the photograph, developed and perfectly clear. We realize that life is no longer the life we would have given up for a trifle the day before, for, though we may continue not to fear death, we no longer dare to contemplate separation.

At all events, after, not one o' clock in the morning (the hour the liftboy had fixed), but three o' clock, I no longer suffered as in the old days from feeling the chances of her appearing to be diminishing. The certainty that she would not now be coming produced a complete calm in me, a freshness; the night was quite simply a night like so many others on which I had not seen her, that was the idea from which I began. And from that moment on, the thought that I would see her the next day or on other days, standing out against the nothingness that I had accepted, became sweet to me. Sometimes, on these evenings of waiting, our anguish is due to some medicament that we have taken. Wrongly construed by whoever is suffering, he believes he is anxious on account of she who does not come. Love is born in such a case, like certain nervous diseases, from the inaccurate explanation of a painful malaise. An explanation which there is no point in rectifying, at least where love is concerned, a sentiment which (whatever its cause) is always erroneous.

The next day, when Albertine wrote that she had only just got back to Epreville, so had not received my note in time, and would come, with my permission, to see me that evening, behind the words of her letter, as behind those she had spoken to me once on the telephone, I thought I sensed the presence of pleasures, of persons, whom she had preferred to me. Once again, my whole being was agitated by a painful curiosity to know what she might have been doing, by the latent love we bear always within us; I was able to believe for a moment that it was about to attach me to Albertine, but all that it did was to quiver, there where it was, and its last murmurs died away without its having started moving.

During my first stay in Balbec, I misunderstood – and perhaps indeed Andrée had done as I had – Albertine's character. I had believed that it was innocent frivolity on her part if all our entreaties did not succeed in detaining her and causing her to miss a garden-party, a donkey-ride or a picnic. During my second stay in Balbec, I suspected that that frivolity was only an appearance, and the garden-party only a screen, if not an invention. Under various forms, the following episode occurred (I mean the episode as observed by me, from my side of the glass, which was by no means transparent, and without my being able to tell what truth there might be on the other side). Albertine would make me the most passionate protestations of her affection. She would look at the time because she was due to go and call on a lady who was 'at home', it seemed, every day at five o'clock in Infreville. Tortured by a suspicion and feeling anyway unwell, I asked Albertine, I begged her, to stay. It was impossible (in fact, she could only stay for another five minutes) because it would annoy the lady in question, who was touchy and not very welcoming and, said Albertine, a bore. 'But one can easily miss a visit. – No, my aunt has taught me politeness has to come first. – But I've seen you be impolite often enough. – That's not the same thing, this lady would hold it against me and make trouble for me with my aunt. I'm already in her bad books rather. She insists I should have been to see her once at least. – But since she's "at home" every day.' Here, Albertine, feeling she had been 'cut off', modified the reason. 'Of course she's "at home" every day. But today I've arranged to meet some friends at her house. That way, we shan't be so bored. – In that case, Albertine, you're preferring this lady and your friends to me, since, in order not to risk paying a tedious visit, you prefer to leave me on my own, ill and most unhappy? – I wouldn't in the least mind the visit being tedious. But it's out of devotion to them. I shall bring them back in my trap. Otherwise, they'd no longer have any means of transport.' I pointed out to Albertine that there were trains up until ten o'clock in the evening, from Infreville. 'That's true, but, you know, it's possible we shall be asked to stay to dinner. She's very hospitable. – Well, you could refuse. – I'd be annoying my aunt again. – Anyway, you can have dinner and catch the ten o'clock train. – That's cutting it fine. – Then I can never go out to dinner and come back by train. But listen, Albertine, we're going to do something very simple: I feel that the fresh air will do me good; since you can't give this lady up, I'm going to go with you as far as Infreville. Never fear, I shan't go as far as the Tour Elisabeth (the lady's villa), I shan't see the lady, nor your friends.' Albertine looked as if she had received a terrible blow. She broke off from speaking. She said that sea bathing had not benefited her. 'If my going with you annoys you? – But how can you say that, you know my greatest pleasure is going out with you.' There had been an abrupt change of tack. 'Since we're going to go somewhere together, she said, why shouldn't we go the other side of Balbec, we could have dinner together. It would be so nice. Basically, the coastline there's much prettier. I'm beginning to get fed up with Infreville and all these little places the colour of spinach. – But your aunt's friend will be angry if you don't go and see her. – Well, she'll get unangry again. – No, we shouldn't make people angry. – But she won't even notice, she's "at home" every day; whether I go there tomorrow, or the day after, in a week's time, a fortnight's time, that'll meet the bill. – And your friends? – Oh, they've left me in the lurch enough times. It's certainly my turn. – But in the direction you're proposing, there's no train after nine o'clock. – Well, what of it? Nine is ideal. Besides, we should never let the problem of getting back stand in our way. We can always find a cart, or a bike, failing which we've got our legs. – Always find, Albertine, you're getting carried away! The Infreville direction, where the little wooden stations are so close to one other, yes. But the opposite direction, it's not the same. – Even that way. I promise I'll get you back safe and sound.' I sensed that Albertine was giving up on my account something she had arranged that she did not want to tell me about, and that there was someone who would be as unhappy as I had been. Finding that what she had wanted was not possible, since I wanted to go with her, she gave it up unhesitatingly. She knew it was not irremediable. For, like all the women who have several things in their lives, she could rely for support on what never weakens: doubt and jealousy. Admittedly, she was not trying to excite them, on the contrary. But those in love are so suspicious that they instantly sniff out a falsehood. So that Albertine, being no better than anyone else, knew from experience (without guessing in the very least that she owed it to jealousy) that she would always be sure to see again the people she had left in the lurch one evening. The person unknown whom she had given up for my sake would suffer, would love her the more (Albertine did not know this was the reason), and so as not to go on suffering would return to her of his own accord, as I would have done. But I wanted neither to cause pain, nor to tire myself out, nor to enter on to the terrible path of inquiry, of a multiform, innumerable surveillance. 'No, Albertine, I don't want to spoil your pleasure, go to your lady in Infreville, or at any rate to the person she's a pseudonym for, it's all the same to me. The real reason why I'm not going with you, is that you don't want it, that the excursion you'd be making with me isn't the one you wanted to make, the proof of which is that you've contradicted yourself more than five times without noticing.' Poor Albertine was afraid that her contradictions, which she had not noticed, might have been more serious, not knowing exactly what lies she had told: 'It's very possible I contradicted myself. The sea air takes away all my powers of reason. I'm forever saying one name instead of another.' And (which proved to me that she would not now have needed many sweet affirmations for me to believe her) I experienced the pain of a wound, on hearing this admission of what I had only feebly assumed. 'All right, it's agreed, I'm going,' she said in a tragic voice, not without looking at the time so as to see whether she was late or not for the other person, now that I had furnished her with the pretext for not spending the evening with me. 'You're so unkind. I change everything so as to spend a nice evening with you and it's you who don't want it, and you accuse me of lying. I've never seen you so cruel before. The sea will be my grave. I shall never see you again. (My heart beat faster at these words although I was certain she would be back the next day, which is what happened). I shall drown myself, I shall throw myself into the water. – Like Sappho.[5] – Yet another insult; you don't only have doubts about what I say but about what I do. – But little one, I had no such intention, I swear, you know that Sappho hurled herself into the sea. – Yes you did, you don't have any confidence in me.' She saw from the clock that it was twenty to; she was afraid of missing what it was she had to do, and selecting the briefest of farewells (which she apologized for as it happens by coming to see me the following day; on that particular following day the other person probably was not free), she made her escape at a run, crying 'Farewell for ever,' wearing a heartbroken expression. And perhaps she was heartbroken. For knowing what she was doing at that moment better than I did, at once more severe and more indulgent towards herself than I was to her, perhaps all the same she felt a doubt that I might not make her welcome after the way she had left me. I think that she cared for me, to the point where the other person was more jealous than me.

A few days later, in Balbec, when we were in the ballroom of the casino, Bloch's sister and cousin came in, both of whom were by now very pretty, but whom I no longer acknowledged because of my friends, for the younger of the two, the cousin, was living quite openly with the actress whose acquaintance she had made during my first stay. Andrée, allusion having been made to this under her breath, said to me: 'Oh, I'm like Albertine about that, there's nothing the two of us find more disgusting.' As for Albertine, starting to talk with me on the sofa where we were sitting, she had turned her back on the two disreputable girls. Yet I had observed that prior to this movement, just as Mlle Bloch and her cousin had made their appearance, there had come into my loved one's eyes that sudden and profound attentiveness that sometimes lent this mischievous girl's face a serious, even solemn expression, and left her looking sad afterwards. But Albertine had at once turned her gaze, still oddly immobile and thoughtful, back on to me. Mlle Bloch and her cousin having finally gone off, after giving a very loud laugh and uttering unseemly shouts, I asked Albertine whether the small, fair-haired one (she who was the girl-friend of the actress) was not the same girl who had the day before won the prize in the floral carriage race. 'Oh, I don't know, said Albertine, has one of them got fair hair? I have to tell you, they don't greatly interest me, I've never looked at them. Has one of them got fair hair?' she asked her three friends, with a detached, questioning look. Applied as it was to people whom Albertine met every day on the esplanade, this ignorance struck me as too extreme not to have been put on. 'They don't appear to be looking at us much, either,' I said to Albertine, perhaps on the hypothesis, though I did not as yet consciously entertain it, that Albertine liked women, so as to remove any regret on her part by demonstrating to her that she had not attracted the attention of these women, and that, generally speaking, even the most depraved of them do not usually concern themselves with young girls whom they do not know. 'They didn't look at us? replied Albertine unthinkingly, they did nothing else the whole time. – But you can't know that, I said, you had your back to them. – Well, what about that?' she replied, indicating, set into the wall facing us, a large mirror that I had failed to notice, and on which I now realized that, even while she was speaking to me, my loved one had not ceased to fix her beautiful, much preoccupied eyes.

From the day when Cottard had gone with me into the little Incarville casino, without sharing the opinion he had given voice to, I no longer saw Albertine in the same light; the sight of her produced anger in me. I had myself changed so much that she seemed other. I had ceased to look kindly on her; in her presence, or out of her presence if it might get repeated to her, I spoke of her in the most wounding fashion. There were truces, however. One day I learnt that Albertine and Andrée had both of them accepted an invitation to Elstir's. Not doubting that this was with a view to being able to amuse themselves on the way back like schoolgirls, by taking off girls of the disreputable sort, and derive in doing so an unconfessed, virginal pleasure that would wring my heart, without any announcement, in order to inconvenience them and to deprive Albertine of the pleasure on which she was counting, I arrived at Elstir's unexpectedly. But I found only Andrée there. Albertine had chosen another day, when her aunt was due to go there. So I told myself that Cottard must have been mistaken; the favourable impression produced in me by Andrée's being present without her friend did not go away and fostered in me a gentler disposition in regard to Albertine. But this lasted no longer than the fragile good health of those delicate individuals liable to temporary improvements, but in whom the merest nothing suffices to bring about a relapse. Albertine had incited Andrée to games that, without going very far, were not perhaps altogether innocent; finding this suspicion painful, in the end I discarded it. Hardly was I cured before it was reborn in another form. I had just seen Andrée, in one of those graceful movements that were peculiar to her, lay her head coaxingly on Albertine's shoulder and kiss her on the neck, half closing her eyes; or else they had exchanged a quick glance; a comment had escaped someone who had seen them alone together on the way to bathe, trivial incidents such as habitually float in the ambient atmosphere, where the majority of people absorb them all day long without their health suffering or their mood changing for the worse, but which are morbid and generative of fresh pain for someone so predisposed. Sometimes even, without my having seen Albertine again, and without anyone having spoken of her to me, I rediscovered in my memory an attitude of Albertine's in the company of Gisèle which I had thought innocent at the time; it was enough now to destroy the state of calm I had been able to recover, I no longer needed to go out of doors to breathe in dangerous germs, I had, as Cottard would have said, intoxicated myself. I thought then about all that I had learned of Swann's love for Odette, and of the way in which Swann had been made a fool of all his life. Fundamentally, if I try to think about it, the hypothesis which led me little by little to construct Albertine's whole character, and to interpret painfully each moment of a life I was unable to control in its entirety, was the memory, the idée fixe, of the character of Mme Swann, such as I had been told that it was like. These accounts helped to ensure that in future my imagination played the game of supposing that, instead of being a good girl, Albertine might have the same immorality, the same capacity for deception, as a former whore, and I thought of all the suffering that would have awaited me in that event had I ever had to love her.

One day, in front of the Grand-Hôtel, where we had gathered on the esplanade, I had just directed the harshest and most humiliating words at Albertine, and Rosemonde said: 'Oh, how you've changed towards her, at one time she was all that mattered, it was she who called the tune, now she's only good to be fed to the dogs.' In order to make my attitude towards Albertine even more conspicuous, I was in the midst of saying all manner of friendly things to Andrée, who, though she might be afflicted with the same vice, seemed more excusable because she was unwell and neurasthenic, when we saw emerge, at a gentle trot, into the street perpendicular to the esplanade on the corner of which we were standing, Mme de Cambremer's calash and pair. The First President, who was at that moment advancing towards us, leaped out of the way when he recognized the carriage, so as not to be seen in our company; then, when he thought that the Marquise's glances might be about to meet his own, he bowed and gave an immense sweep of his hat. But the carriage, instead of continuing, as had seemed likely, along the rue de la Mer, vanished behind the entrance to the hotel. It was a good ten minutes after this that the 'lift' arrived, all out of breath, to warn me: 'It's the Marquise de Camembert who's come just to see Monsieur. I went up to the room, I looked in the reading-room, I couldn't find Monsieur. Luckily, I had the idea of looking on the beach.' Hardly had he concluded his narration before, followed by her daughter-in-law and by a very ceremonious gentleman, the Marquise advanced towards me, coming probably from a matinée or tea-party in the vicinity, and bowed down under the weight, not so much of the years as of the host of luxurious articles in which she thought it more friendly and more befitting to her rank to be covered so as to appear as 'dressed-up' as possible to those she had come to see. It was, in short, at the hotel, that 'disembarkation' of the Cambremers which my grandmother had once so much dreaded when she wanted Legrandin not to be aware that we would perhaps be going to Balbec. Then Mama would laugh at the fears inspired by an event she considered impossible. And yet now at last it had come about, but by another route and without Legrandin having had any part in it. 'Can I stay if I don't disturb you? Albertine asked me (in whose eyes there remained, put there by the cruel things I had just been saying to her, a few tears that I observed without appearing to see them, and not without rejoicing), I might have something to say to you.' A hat with feathers, itself surmounted by a sapphire pin, had been set down anyhow on Mme de Cambremer's wig, like an insignia the display of which is necessary but sufficient, its placing of no importance, its elegance conventional, its immobility useless. Despite the heat, the good lady had put on a jet-black mantlet resembling a dalmatic, on top of which there hung an ermine stole, the wearing of which seemed to relate not to the temperature or the season, but to the nature of the ceremony. And on Mme de Cambremer's bosom there hung a baron's coronet linked to a short chain in the manner of a pectoral cross. The gentleman was a celebrated barrister from Paris, of a nobiliary family, who had come to spend three days with the Cambremers. He was one of those men of a professional experience so complete as to cause them somewhat to look down on their profession and who say, for example: 'I know I argue well in court, so I no longer get any amusement from arguing', or: 'Operating no longer interests me; I know I operate well.' As intelligent men, and as artists, they see, resplendent about a maturity handsomely endowed by success, the 'intelligence' and the 'artistic' nature that their colleagues acknowledge and which confers on them a rough approximation to taste and discernment. They develop a passion for the paintings not of a great artist, but of an artist of great distinction nonetheless, to purchasing whose works they devote the large income that their career procures for them. Le Sidaner[6] was the artist selected by the friend of the Cambremers, who was in fact very agreeable. He talked well about books, the books not of the true masters, however, but of those who have mastered themselves. The one troublesome defect that this amateur displayed was that he consistently employed certain ready-made expressions, such as 'for the most part', which lent something both important and incomplete to what he wished to talk about. Mme de Cambremer had taken advantage, she told me, of a matinée that some friends of hers had been giving that day near Balbec to come and see me, as she had promised Robert de Saint-Loup. 'You know he's due shortly to come and spend a few days locally. His uncle Charlus is staying in the country at his sister-in-law's, the Duchesse de Luxembourg, and M. de Saint-Loup will take the opportunity both to go and greet his aunt and to revisit his old regiment, where he is greatly loved, greatly esteemed. We often entertain officers, who all praise him to the skies. It would be so nice if you were to do us the pleasure of coming both of you to Féterne.' I introduced Albertine and her friends to her. Mme de Cambremer named us to her daughter-in-law. The latter, so glacial towards the petty nobility with whom the neighbourhood of Féterne forced her to associate, so full of reserve for fear of being compromised, held out her hand to me on the contrary with a radiant smile, in a place of safety and delighted as she was, faced by a friend of Robert de Saint-Loup's, and one whom the latter, preserving a greater social finesse than he liked people to see, had told her was a close friend of the Guermantes. Thus, in contrast to her mother-in-law, Mme de Cambremer had two infinitely different forms of politeness. It was at the very most the first form, distant and intolerable, that she would have accorded me had I met her through her brother Legrandin. But for a friend of the Guermantes she was all smiles. The most comfortable room in the hotel in which to receive people was the reading-room, in the old days a very terrible place into which I now entered ten times a day, re-emerging freely, as my own master, like those lunatics, little affected and so long resident in the asylum that the doctor has entrusted them with the key. Thus I offered to take Mme de Cambremer there. And because this saloon no longer filled me with shyness nor held any attraction for me, since the faces of things change for us just as those of people do, it was without feeling flustered that I made the suggestion. But she refused, preferring to remain out of doors, and we sat down in the open air, on the hotel terrace. There I found and rescued a volume of Mme de Sévigné that Mama had not had time to take with her in her precipitate flight, when she heard that I had visitors. She dreaded these invasions by strangers as much as my grandmother had and, for fear of no longer being able to escape if she let herself be hemmed around, she made her escape with a rapidity that always led my father and me to make fun of her. In her hand, Mme de Cambremer held, together with the handle of a sunshade, several embroidered bags, a tidy, a gold purse from which hung ropes of garnets, and a lace handkerchief. It struck me that it would have been more convenient for her to put them down on a chair; but I sensed it would be improper and pointless to ask her to abandon the regalia of her pastoral rounds and her worldly ministry. We gazed at the calm sea, where stray gulls floated like white petals. Because of the level of simple 'medium' to which worldly conversation reduces us, and also our desire to please with the help, not of qualities of which we are ourselves unaware, but of what we believe must be prized by those we are with, I began instinctively to talk to Mme de Cambremer, née Legrandin, in the manner in which her brother might have done. 'They have, I said, referring to the gulls, the whiteness and stillness of water-lilies.' And indeed, they appeared to be offering an inert target to the little waves that were rocking them, to the point where these, by contrast, seemed, in their pursuit, animated by some purpose, to have taken on life. The dowager Marquise did not weary of hymning the superb view of the sea that we got in Balbec, and envied me it, she who, at La Raspelière (where it so happens she was not living that year), could see the waves only from a long way off. She had two peculiar habits that derived at once from her exalted love of the arts (of music above all) and from her dental inadequacy. Whenever she talked aesthetics, her salivary glands, like those of certain animals in the rutting season, entered on a phase of hypersecretion such that the old lady's toothless mouth allowed a few droplets whose rightful place this was not to come from the corners of her faintly moustachioed lips. She would at once swallow them down again with a deep sigh, like someone recovering their breath. And then, were the beauty of the music too much for her, in her enthusiasm she would raise her arms and proffer a few summary judgments, energetically masticated and coming, if need be, from the nose. Now, it had never occurred to me that the commonplace beach of Balbec might indeed offer a 'sea-view', and Mme de Cambremer's simple words changed my ideas where that was concerned. In return, as I now told her, I had always heard people extolling the unique panorama from La Raspelière, situated at the top of the hill, and where, in a large drawing-room with two fireplaces, one whole row of windows looks out, at the foot of the gardens, between the foliage, on to the sea as far as Balbec and beyond, and the other row on to the valley. 'How kind of you and how well you put it: the sea between the foliage. It's ravishing, it's like… a fan.' And I sensed, from a deep breath intended to catch the saliva and dry the moustache, that the compliment was genuine. But the Marquise née Legrandin remained unmoved in order to show her disdain not for my words but for those of her mother-in-law. She did not merely despise the latter's intelligence, moreover, she deplored her affability, forever afraid that people might not have a sufficiently high regard for the Cambremers. 'And what a pretty name, I said. One would love to know the origin of all these names. – In the case of that one, I can tell you, the old lady answered quietly. It's a family home, of my grandmother Arrachepel, it's not an illustrious family, but a very good and very ancient provincial family. – What, not illustrious? her daughter-in-law broke in curtly. A whole stained-glass window in Bayeux Cathedral is filled with its arms, and the principal church of Avranches contains their funerary monuments. If these old names amuse you, you've come one year too late. We had appointed to the living at Criquetot, despite all the difficulties there are in changing dioceses, the dean of a place where I myself have estates, a long way from here, in Combray, where the good priest felt he was becoming neurasthenic. Unfortunately, the sea air didn't succeed at his great age; his neurasthenia increased and he went back to Combray. But while he was our neighbour, he amused himself by going to consult all the old charters, and he wrote a rather intriguing little booklet on the local place-names. That gave him a taste for it, moreover, for it seems he's occupying his closing years writing a large book on Combray and its surroundings. I shall send you his booklet on the region around Féterne. It's a labour of love. You'll read the most interesting things in it about our old Raspelière, about which my mother-in-law speaks much too modestly. – At all events, this year, replied the dowager Mme de Cambremer, La Raspelière is no longer ours and doesn't belong to me. But I sense you're a painter at heart; you ought to draw, and I would so like to show you Féterne, which is much better than La Raspelière.' For now that the Cambremers had let this last-named house to the Verdurins, its commanding position had abruptly ceased to appear what it had been for them during all these years, that is to say as offering the advantage, unique in the region, of having a view both out to sea and over the valley, and had suddenly – and after the event – presented them in return with the inconvenience that you had always to climb and descend in order to get there and then come away again. In short, you might have thought that if Mme de Cambremer had rented it out, this was less in order to increase her revenues than to rest her horses. And she declared herself overjoyed at finally being able all the time to possess the sea from so close to, at Féterne, she who, for so long, ignoring the two months she used to spend there, had only seen it from high up and as if in a panorama. 'I am discovering it at my age, she said, and how I enjoy it! It does me a world of good! I'd let La Raspelière for nothing so as to be constrained to live at Féterne.'

'To get back on to more interesting matters, resumed Legrandin's sister, who addressed the old Marquise as "Mother" but had adopted an insolent manner towards her over the years, you were talking of water-lilies: I imagine you know those that Claude Monet has painted. What genius! It interests me all the more because close to Combray, the place where I told you I owned land…' But she preferred not to speak too much about Combray. 'Oh, that's surely the series we heard about from Elstir, the greatest of contemporary painters, exclaimed Albertine, who had said nothing hitherto. – Oh, one can tell Mademoiselle loves the arts,' exclaimed Mme de Cambremer, sucking back a jet of saliva as she drew a deep breath. 'You will permit me to prefer Le Sidaner, Mademoiselle,' said the lawyer, smiling with the air of a connoisseur. And, as he had once appreciated, or seen appreciated, certain of Elstir's 'audacities', he added: 'Elstir was gifted, he was almost part of the avant-garde even, but for some reason or other he didn't keep up, he has wasted his life.' Mme de Cambremer came down in favour of the lawyer so far as Elstir was concerned, but, much to her guest's chagrin, ranked Monet with Le Sidaner. It cannot be said that she was stupid; she overflowed with an intelligence that I sensed was of not the slightest use to me. The sun just then getting lower, the seagulls were now yellow, like the water-lilies in another canvas of that same series by Monet. I said that I knew it and (continuing to imitate the language of the brother whose name I had not as yet dared to cite) I added that it was a pity that she had not thought rather of coming the day before, for, at that same hour, she would have been able to admire a light out of Poussin. Confronted by some Normandy squireen, not known to the Guermantes, telling her that she should have come the day before, Mme de Cambremer-Legrandin would no doubt have stiffened with offence. But I could well have been more familiar still and she would have been all fond, melting sweetness; in the warmth of that lovely late afternoon I could gather honey as I liked in the great honeycomb that Mme de Cambremer so seldom was and which took the place of the petits-fours I had not thought to hand round. But the name of Poussin, without taking away from the amenableness of the society woman, aroused the protests of the dilettante. On hearing that name, Mme de Cambremer gave vent six times, with scarcely any interval in between, to that brief clicking of the tongue against the lips which serves to signify to a child who is in the midst of doing something silly, that he is both at fault for having started and forbidden to continue. 'In heaven's name, after a painter like Monet, who's quite simply a genius, don't go and name an untalented old hack like Poussin. I tell you straight out that I consider him the most crashing of bores. There you are, but I can't call that painting. Monet, Degas, Manet, yes, they're painters! It's very odd,' she added, fixing a rapt and searching gaze on some vague point in space where she could perceive her own thought, 'it's very odd, at one time I preferred Manet. Nowadays, I still admire Manet, naturally, but I think I perhaps prefer Monet even more. Oh, the cathedrals!' She put as much scrupulousness as self-satisfaction into informing me of the direction in which her taste had evolved. And you had the sense that the phases through which that taste had passed were no less important, as she saw it, than the different manners of Monet himself. I had, moreover, no cause to feel flattered that she should have been confiding her admirations to me, for, even when faced by the most narrow-minded of provincial ladies, she could not go five minutes without feeling the need to confess them. When a noble lady from Avranches, who would have been incapable of telling Mozart from Wagner, said in front of Mme de Cambremer: 'There was nothing new on of any interest during our stay in Paris, we did go once to the Opéra Comique, they were doing Pelléas et Mélisande, it's ghastly,' Mme de Cambremer not only seethed with anger but felt the need to exclaim: 'On the contrary, it's a small masterpiece' and to 'argue the matter'. This perhaps was a habit from Combray, picked up from the sisters of my grandmother, who called it 'fighting the good fight', and who loved dinner-parties where they knew, week after week, that they would have to defend their gods against the Philistines. Thus, Mme de Cambremer liked to 'get the blood coursing' by 'squabbling' about art, as others about politics. She took the side of Debussy as she would have done that of one of her women friends whose conduct had come under fire. Yet she must certainly have realized that when she said: 'Not at all, it's a small masterpiece', she could never improvise, in whoever she was putting in their place, that whole progression in artistic culture at whose conclusion they might have reached agreement without any need to argue. 'I shall have to ask Le Sidaner what he thinks of Poussin, the lawyer said to me. He's a quiet one, keeps himself to himself, but I shall know how to draw him out.'

'Anyway, Mme de Cambremer went on, I have a horror of sunsets, so very romantic, so very operatic. That's the reason why I detest my mother-in-law's house, with its plants from the Midi. You'll see, it looks like a park in Monte-Carlo. That's the reason why I like your shore better. It's sadder, more genuine; there's a little lane from where you can't see the sea. On rainy days, there's nothing but mud, it's a world of its own. It's like in Venice, I detest the Grand Canal and I know of nothing more affecting than the little alley-ways. It's a question of ambiance anyway. – But,' I said to her, sensing that the one way of rehabilitating Poussin in Mme de Cambremer's eyes was to let her know that he was back in fashion, 'M. Degas assures us that he knows of nothing more beautiful than the Poussins at Chantilly.[7] – Oh yes? I don't know the ones at Chantilly, said Mme de Cambremer, who did not want to be of a different opinion to Degas, but I can talk about those in the Louvre, which are horrors. – Those, too, he admires enormously. – I shall have to look at them again. It's all a bit old in my head,' she replied after a moment's silence and as if the favourable judgment she would certainly soon be delivering on Poussin must depend, not on the news I had just conveyed to her, but on the supplementary and this time definitive examination to which she was relying on subjecting the Poussins in the Louvre so as to facilitate the reversing of her verdict. Contenting myself with what was the beginning of a retraction since, if she did not yet admire the Poussins, she had adjourned for further deliberation, and so as not to leave her any longer on the rack, I told her mother-in-law what a lot I had heard about the admirable flowers at Féterne. Modestly, she spoke of the small mixed garden she had at the back into which, by pushing open a door, she went in the mornings in her dressing-gown to feed her peacocks, to look for new-laid eggs, and to pick zinnias or roses, which, by providing an edging of flowers along her table runner for the oeufs à la crème or the fried fish, reminded her of her garden paths. 'It's true we have lots of roses, she said, our rose garden is almost too close to our living quarters, there are days when it gives me a headache. It's more agreeable from the terrace at La Raspelière, where the wind brings you the smell of the roses, but not so heady.' I turned to the daughter-in-law: 'It's straight out of Pelléas, I said, to satisfy her liking for modernism, the smell of the roses coming all the way up to the terraces. It's so strong in the score that, because I get both hay-fever and rose-fever, it made me sneeze each time I heard that scene. – What a masterpiece Pelléas is! exclaimed Mme de Cambremer, I simply adore it'; and drawing closer, with the gestures of a female savage seeking to have her way with me, and making use of her fingers to pick out imaginary notes, she began humming something that I supposed for her represented Pelléas's farewell, keeping on with a vehement insistence as though it were of importance that Mme de Cambremer should remind me of that scene at this moment, or rather perhaps demonstrate that she remembered it. 'I think it's even more beautiful than Parsifal, she added, because in Parsifal the most beautiful things have had a certain halo of melodic phrases added to them, obsolete therefore because melodic. – I know you are a great musician, Madame, I said to the dowager. I'd very much like to hear you.' Mme de Cambremer-Legrandin looked at the sea in order not to take part in the conversation. Considering that what her mother-in-law liked was not music, she considered the gift she was recognized as possessing, purported according to her, but most remarkable in point of fact, as a virtuosity of no interest. It is true that Chopin's one surviving pupil had declared, rightly, that the Master's way of playing, his 'feeling', had been handed down, through her, only to Mme de Cambremer, but to play like Chopin was far from being a commendation for the sister of Legrandin, who despised nobody so much as the Polish musician. 'Oh, they're flying away!' exclaimed Albertine, pointing to the seagulls which, ridding themselves for a moment of their floral incognito, were rising as one towards the sun. 'Leurs ailes de géants les empêchent de marcher,'[8] said Mme de Cambremer, confusing the seagulls with albatrosses. 'I'm very fond of them, I saw some in Amsterdam, said Albertine. They can smell the sea, they come and sniff it even through the paving in the streets. – Oh, you've been in Holland, do you know the Ver Meers?' Mme de Cambremer asked imperiously, in the tone of voice in which she might have said 'Do you know the Guermantes?', for snobbery does not change its accent in changing its object. Albertine answered no; she thought they were living people. But it did not show. 'I'd be very happy to play something for you, Mme de Cambremer said to me. But you know, I only play things that no longer interest your generation. I was brought up to worship Chopin,' she said in a low voice, for she was fearful of her daughter-in-law and knew that the latter regarded Chopin as not being music, so that to play him well or to play him badly were expressions devoid of sense. She acknowledged that her mother-in-law had good technique, and performed the virtuoso passages to perfection. 'They'll never get me to say she's a musician,' ended Mme de Cambremer-Legrandin. Because she saw herself as 'advanced' and (in art only) 'never far enough to the left', as she put it, she imagined that music not only progresses, but does so along a single line, and that Debussy was some sort of super-Wagner, a little more advanced even than Wagner. She had not realized that, if Debussy was not as independent of Wagner as she herself was to believe in a few years' time, for we use the weapons won in battle after all finally to liberate ourselves from him whom we have momentarily vanquished, he was nevertheless seeking, people beginning to have had their fill of works that were too complete, in which everything is expressed, to satisfy a contrary need. This reaction had been bolstered momentarily, of course, by theories, similar to those which, in politics, come to the support of laws against the Congregations, or wars in the East (teaching against nature, Yellow Peril, etc.).[9] An age of haste called, it was said, for rapidity in art, absolutely as they might have said that a future war could not last more than a fortnight, or that the out-of-the-way spots beloved of the stage-coaches would be forsaken by the railways but restored to honour by the motor-car. It was recommended not to tire the listener's attention, as though we did not have at our command different degrees of attention, the highest of which it is in fact up to the artist to awaken. For those who yawn with fatigue after ten lines of some second-rate article have been making the journey to Bayreuth year after year to hear the Tetralogy.[10] The day was coming, moreover, when, for a time, Debussy would be declared to be as fragile as Massenet[11] and the joltings of Mélisande demoted to the rank of those of Manon. For theories and schools, like microbes and globules, devour one another and, by their struggles, ensure life's continuance. But that time had not yet come.

As on the Bourse, when an upward movement occurs and a whole section of the market profits by it, a certain number of disdained authors had benefited from the reaction, either because they had not deserved such disdain, or simply – which enabled one to break new ground by extolling them – because they had brought it on themselves. And people even went looking, in an isolated past, for a few independent talents whose reputation the current movement should not, seemingly, have affected, but whose name one of the new masters was thought to have cited favourably. Often it was because a master, whoever he might be, and however exclusive his school may be, is original in his judgments and does justice to talent wherever it is to be found, and to less than talent even, to a pleasing inspiration he has enjoyed in the past, linked to some cherished moment of his adolescence. At other times, because certain artists of another epoch have, in a single piece, achieved something that resembles what the master has gradually realized he has been seeking to do himself. He then sees this elder as something like a precursor; he likes in him, in another form, an effort that is momentarily, and in part, fraternal. There are bits of Turner in the work of Poussin, a phrase of Flaubert's in Montesquieu. But sometimes, too, the rumour of a master's predilection had resulted from an error, born who knows where and hawked about among his school. But the name cited then benefited from the imprint under whose protection it had come just in time, for if there is a certain freedom, genuine taste, in the choice of the master, schools for their part take their lead only from the theory. Thus it was that, following its customary course, which advances by digressions, veering off one time in this direction and the next in the contrary direction, the spirit of the age had brought back into the spotlight a certain number of works, to which the need for justice, or for renewal, or the taste of Debussy, or some caprice of his, or some remark he had not perhaps made, had added those of Chopin. Extolled by judges in whom people had every confidence, and benefiting from the admiration aroused by Pelléas, they had rediscovered a new éclat, and even those who had not heard them again were so anxious to like them that they did so despite themselves, though with an illusion of freedom. But Mme de Cambremer-Legrandin remained for part of the year in the provinces. Even in Paris, as an invalid, she lived largely in her bedroom. It is true that this handicap managed to draw attention to itself mainly in the choice of expressions that Mme de Cambremer thought were fashionable, which would have been better suited to the written language, a nuance she had not discerned, for she derived them more from reading than from conversation. This last is necessary for an accurate knowledge less of people's opinions than of the new expressions. However, the rejuvenation of the Nocturnes had yet to be announced by the critics. News of it had been passed on only in casual conversation by 'the young'. It remained unknown to Mme de Cambremer-Legrandin. I took pleasure in informing her, though by addressing her mother-in-law for this purpose, as when, in billiards, you play off the cushion in order to strike a ball, that, very far from being old-fashioned, Chopin was Debussy's favourite musician. 'Well I never, how amusing,' the daughter-in-law said with a smile, as though this were merely a paradox tossed off by the author of Pelléas. Nevertheless, it was quite certain now that she would only ever listen to Chopin with respect or even with pleasure. And so my words, which had just sounded the hour of her deliverance for the dowager, brought an expression of gratitude to me, and above all of joy, to her face. Her eyes shone like those of Latude in the play entitled Latude or 35 years of Captivity;[12] and her breast inhaled the sea-air with that dilatation that Beethoven has emphasized so well in Fidelio, when his prisoners finally breathe in 'the air that gives life'.[13] I thought she was going to put her moustachioed lips to my cheek. 'What, you like Chopin? He likes Chopin, he likes Chopin,' she exclaimed with an impassioned nasal twang, as she might have said: 'What, you know Mme de Francquetot, too?', with the difference that my connection with Mme de Francquetot would have been a matter of profound indifference to her, whereas my knowledge of Chopin threw her into a sort of artistic delirium. Salivary hypersecretion was no longer enough. Without even having tried to understand Debussy's role in the reinvention of Chopin, she simply felt that my verdict was favourable. She was seized by musical enthusiasm. 'Elodie! Elodie! He likes Chopin.' Her bosom swelled and she beat the air with her arms. 'Ah, I'd sensed indeed you were a musician, she exclaimed. I can understand, aaartist that you are, that you should like it. It's so beautiful!' And her voice was as flinty as if, in order to express her ardour for Chopin, she had, in imitation of Demosthenes, filled her mouth with all the pebbles from the beach. Finally there came the reflux, reaching as far as her veil, which she had not had time to remove to safety and was drenched, and finally the Marquise took her embroidered handkerchief to the dribble of foam with which the memory of Chopin had just soaked her moustaches.

'Heavens, Mme de Cambremer-Legrandin said to me, I think my mother-in-law's overstaying her welcome rather, she's forgetting we've got my uncle de Ch'nouville coming to dinner. And besides, Cancan doesn't like to wait.' Cancan remained beyond me, I thought perhaps it referred to a dog. But where the de Ch'nouville cousins were concerned, it was as follows. With age, the pleasure the young Marquise had taken in pronouncing their name in this fashion had died down. And yet, in the old days, it had been in order to enjoy it that she resolved on her marriage. In other social groups, when the name of de Chenouville came up (every time at least that the particule[14] was preceded by a noun ending in a vowel, for in the contrary case one was indeed obliged to lay stress on the de, the tongue refusing to pronounce Madam' d'Ch'nonceaux), it was customary for the mute e of the particule to be sacrificed. They said: 'Monsieur d'Chenouville'. Among the Cambremers, the tradition was the reverse, but equally imperious. In every case it was the mute e in Chenouville that was suppressed. Whether the name were preceded by 'mon cousin' or 'ma cousine', it was always de 'Ch'nouville' and never 'Chenouville'. (Where the father of these Chenouvilles was concerned, they said 'notre oncle', for they were not upper-crust enough at Féterne to pronounce it 'notre onk', as the Guermantes would have done, whose required jargon, suppressing consonants and nationalizing foreign names, was as hard to understand as old French or the modern patois.) Every person entering the Cambremer family at once received a warning, in this matter of the Ch'nouvilles, of which Mlle Legrandin had had no need. Visiting one day, and hearing a girl say 'ma tante d'Uzai', 'mon onk de Rouan', she had not recognized straight away the illustrious names she was in the habit of pronouncing 'Uzès' or 'Rohan'; hers had been the surprise, the embarrassment and the shame of someone who finds a newly invented utensil before them on the dinner table of whose use they are ignorant and with which they do not dare to start eating. But the night following and the next day, she had repeated, enraptured: 'ma tante d'Uzai', with that suppression of the final s, a suppression that had astounded her the day before but which she now found it so vulgar not to be aware of, one of her women friends having referred to a bust of the Duchesse d'Uzès, Mlle Legrandin had answered her ill-humouredly and in a haughty tone: 'You might at least pronounce it correctly: "Mame d'Uzai".' From that moment on, she had realized that, by virtue of the transmutation of solid matter into ever more subtle elements, the considerable and very honourably acquired fortune that she owed to her father, the thorough education that she had received, her assiduity at the Sorbonne, at Caro's lectures along with those of Brunetière',[15] and at the Lamoureux concerts,[16] all this was to be volatilized, to find its final sublimation in the pleasure of one day saying: 'ma tante d'Uzai'. This did not exclude from her mind that she would continue to associate, at least in the early days following her marriage, not with certain woman friends whom she liked but was resigned to giving up, but with certain others whom she did not like but to whom she wished to be able to say (since this was her reason for marrying): 'I shall introduce you to my aunt d'Uzai', or when she saw that this alliance was too difficult: 'I shall introduce you to my aunt de Ch'nouville' or 'I'll have you to dinner with the Uzais.' Her marriage to M. de Cambremer had provided Mme de Cambremer with the opportunity of saying the first of these sentences but not the second, the society in which her parents-in-law moved not being that which she had imagined and of which she continued to dream. And so, after having said to me about Saint-Loup (adopting for the purpose an expression of Robert's own, for if, in order to talk to her, I had spoken like Legrandin, she, by an opposite suggestion, had answered me in Robert's dialect, borrowed unbeknownst to her from Rachel), bringing her thumb and forefinger together and half closing her eyes, as though she were gazing at something infinitely delicate that she had succeeding in capturing: 'He has a pretty quality of mind'; so wholehearted was she in her praise of him that you might have thought she was in love with him (it was claimed, as it happens, that in the old days, when he was at Doncières, Robert had been her lover), but in reality merely so that I might repeat it to him, and to lead up to: 'You're very friendly with the Duchesse de Guermantes. I'm ailing, I hardly get out, and I know she remains confined within a circle of select friends, which I fully approve of, so I know her only slightly, but I do know she's an absolutely superior woman.' Knowing that Mme de Cambremer scarcely knew her, and to make myself as small as she was, I slid over this topic and said, in answer to the Marquise, that I had above all known her brother, M. Legrandin. At this name, she adopted the same evasive expression as I had worn in the case of Mme de Guermantes, but combining with it a look of displeasure, for she thought I had said this in order to humble, not myself, but her. Was she eaten away with despair at having been born Legrandin? That at least was what her husband's sisters and sisters-in-law claimed, provincial noblewomen who knew nobody and nothing, and were jealous of Mme de Cambremer's intelligence, her education, her wealth, and the physical attractions she had possessed before she fell ill. 'She thinks of nothing else, it's that that's killing her,' these spiteful women would say the moment they were talking about Mme de Cambremer to anyone at all, but preferably to a commoner, either, if he was conceited and stupid, so as to enhance the value, by this assertion of the shame attaching to the commoner's condition, of the affability they were showing him, or else, if he was shy and discerning, and had applied the remark to himself, so as to have the pleasure, even as they received him courteously, of indirectly behaving insolently towards him. But if these ladies believed they spoke true where their sister-in-law was concerned, they were mistaken. The latter suffered all the less from having been born Legrandin for having lost all memory of the fact. She was put out that I should have reminded her of it and fell silent as if she had not understood, not regarding it as necessary to supply any details, nor even to confirm mine.

'Our relations are not the main reason for cutting short our visit,' the dowager Mme de Cambremer said to me, who was probably more blasé than her daughter-in-law where the pleasure to be had from saying 'Ch'nouville' was concerned. 'But so as not to tire you out with too many people, Monsieur, she said, indicating the lawyer, did not dare bring his wife and son all the way here. They're walking on the beach while they wait for us and must be starting to get bored.' I had them carefully pointed out to me and hurried off to find them. The wife had a round face like certain flowers of the Ranunculus family, and quite a large plant-like mark at the corner of her eye. And since the generations of men preserve their features like a family of plants, just as on the faded face of the mother, so the same mark, which might have helped to classify a variety, swelled beneath the eye of the son. The lawyer was touched by my attentiveness towards his wife and son. He showed interest in the subject of my stay in Balbec. 'You must feel a bit out of place, for they're foreigners here for the most part.' And he looked at me as he spoke, for, not liking foreigners, though many were his clients, he wanted to be sure that I was not hostile to his xenophobia, in which case he would have beaten a retreat, by saying: 'Of course Mme X may be a charming woman. It's a question of principle.' Since at that time I had no opinion concerning foreigners, I evinced no disapproval, and he felt himself on safe ground. He went so far as to ask me to call on him one day in Paris, to see his collection of Le Sidaners, and to bring the Cambremers along, with whom he obviously thought I was intimate. 'I shall invite you with Le Sidaner, he said, convinced I would be living only in anticipation of that blessed day. You'll see what a delightful man he is. And his pictures will enchant you. Of course, I can't compete with the big collectors, but I believe it's I who own the greatest number of his favourite canvases. It'll interest you all the more, coming from Balbec, because they're seascapes, in the majority at least.' The wife and son, of a vegetable disposition, listened composedly. You sensed that their house in Paris was a sort of temple to Le Sidaner. These sorts of temples are not without their uses. When the god has doubts about himself, he can easily stop up the fissures in his own opinion with the irrefutable testimony of individuals who have devoted their lives to his work.

At a signal from her daughter-in-law, Mme de Cambremer made to stand up and said to me: 'Since you don't want to install yourself at Féterne, won't you at least come and have lunch, one weekday, tomorrow for example?' And in her benevolence, in order to decide me, she added: 'You'll find the Comte de Crisenoy there,' whom I certainly had not lost, for the good reason that I did not know him. She was starting to hold out still other shining temptations to me, but stopped short. The First President, who, on returning, had learned that she was in the hotel, had been searching everywhere for her on the sly, had then waited for her and, pretending to be meeting her by chance, came up to present his respects. I realized that Mme de Cambremer was not keen to extend to him the luncheon invitation she had just addressed to me. He, however, had known her for much longer than I had, having for years past been one of those regulars at the Féterne matinées whom I had so much envied during my first stay in Balbec. But seniority cannot do everything among society people. They reserve their lunches more readily for those new connections who can still prick their curiosity, especially when their arrival is preceded by a cordial and prestigious recommendation such as that of Saint-Loup. Mme de Cambremer calculated that the First President had not heard what she said to me, but in order to still the remorse that she felt, she addressed him in the most friendly manner. In the sunlight in which, on the horizon, the golden shoreline of Rivebelle, normally invisible, was bathed, we could make out, barely separate from the luminous azure, emerging from the water, pink, silvery, imperceptible, the little bells of the angelus ringing out in the vicinity of Féterne. 'Again, it's rather like Pelléas, I remarked to Mme de Cambremer-Legrandin. You know the scene I mean. – I think I do, yes.' But 'I've no idea' was what her voice and her face proclaimed, uninformed by any memory, and her unsupported smile off into the air. The dowager could not get over the fact that the bells had carried all this way and stood up, thinking of the time: 'In fact, I said, from Balbec, you can't normally see that shoreline, nor hear it either. The weather must have changed and made the horizon twice as wide. Unless they've come to fetch you, for I can see they're making you leave; for you they are the dinner-bell.' The First President, none too responsive to the bells, was gazing furtively at the esplanade, which he was distressed to see so depopulated this evening. 'You're a true poet, Mme de Cambremer said to me. I can tell how fine-strung you are, how artistic; come and I will play you some Chopin,' she added, raising her arms with an ecstatic air and pronouncing the words in a hoarse voice that seemed as if it were shifting pebbles. Then came the deglutition of the saliva, and the old lady instinctively wiped her so-called 'American' toothbrush moustache with her handkerchief. The First President rendered me a very great service in spite of himself by seizing the Marquise by the arm in order to conduct her to her carriage, a certain admixture of vulgarity, boldness and a liking for ostentation having dictated a course of behaviour that others would hesitate before adopting, but which is found far from displeasing in society. It had, in any case, been much more of a habit with him these many years past than with me. I may have blessed him but I did not dare to imitate him, and walked beside Mme de Cambremer-Legrandin, who wanted to see the book I had in my hand. The name of Mme de Sévigné caused her to screw up her face; and employing a word she had read in certain newspapers, but which, when spoken and put into the feminine, and applied to a writer of the seventeenth century, created a bizarre effect, she asked me: 'Do you find her genuinely talentueuse?'[17] The Marquise gave the footman the address of a pâtis-serie she needed to go to before taking again to the road, pink from the dust of evening, in which the stepped rumps of the cliffs had turned blue. She asked her old coachman whether one of her horses that felt the cold had been warm enough, whether another's shoe might not be hurting. 'I shall write to you about what we have to arrange, she said to me in a low voice. I saw you were talking literature with my daughter-in-law, she's adorable,' she added, although she did not believe this but had got into the habit – maintained out of goodness of heart – of saying so, so that her son should not seem to have married for money. 'Besides, she added, in a last enthusiastic mumble, she's so aaartissstic!' Then she climbed into her carriage, swaying her head and raising the handle of her sunshade, and went off again through the streets of Balbec, weighed down by the vestments of her ministry, like an old bishop on his confirmation rounds.

'She has invited you to lunch,' the First President said to me sternly once the carriage had moved off and I came back with the girls. 'We're not on good terms. She thinks I neglect her. But there, I'm easy enough to get on with. Should anyone have need of me, I'm always there to answer "present". But they tried to throw the grappling-irons over me. Ah, well, that!' he added, with a canny expression and raising his finger like someone splitting hairs: 'That I don't allow. That's an attack on my liberty when on holiday. I was obliged to say: "Stop there!" You seem to be very well in with her. When you get to be my age, you'll find that society is nothing really, and you'll regret having attached so much importance to these trifles. Right, I'm going to take a turn before dinner. Adieu les enfants,' he cried to the world at large, as if he were already fifty metres away.

Once I had said goodbye to Rosemonde and Gisèle, they saw with astonishment that Albertine had stopped, without following them. 'Albertine, what are you doing, you know the time? – You go home, she replied authoritatively, I have to talk with him,' she added, indicating me with a submissive expression. Rosemonde and Gisèle looked at me, imbued so far as I was concerned with a new respect. I enjoyed feeling that, for the moment at least, and in the eyes even of Rosemonde and Gisèle, I counted for more with Albertine than the time of her return home, or than her friends, and might even share solemn secrets with her into which it was impossible that they be admitted. 'Shan't we be seeing you this evening? – I don't know, that'll depend on him here. – Till tomorrow anyway. – Let's go up to my room,' I said to her, once her friends had gone off. We took the lift; she held her tongue in front of the 'lift'. The habit of being obliged to rely on personal observation and on deduction in order to know the petty concerns of their masters, those strange people who talk among themselves but do not speak to them, develops a greater power of divination among 'employees' (as the 'lift' called the servants) than among the 'employers'. Our organs atrophy or become stronger or more subtle according as the need for them increases or diminishes. Since the existence of railways, the necessity of not missing the train has taught us to reckon the minutes, whereas among the ancient Romans, whose astronomy was not only more perfunctory but whose lives were less hurried, the notion, not of minutes but even of fixed hours of the day, scarcely existed. So the 'lift' had understood, and was counting on retailing to his fellows, that we were preoccupied, Albertine and I. But he talked to us without stopping because he was without tact. I could see depicted on his face, however, substituted for the usual impression of friendship and delight at taking me up in his lift, a look of extraordinary dejection and anxiety. Since I was ignorant of its cause, in an attempt to distract him, and although more preoccupied with Albertine, I told him that the name of the lady who had just left was the Marquise de Cambremer and not de Camembert. On the floor that we were just then passing, I caught sight of, carrying a bolster, a frightful-looking chambermaid who curtseyed to me respectfully, hoping for a tip on my departure. I would like to have known whether it was the one I had so much desired on the evening of my first arrival in Balbec, but I was never able to be certain. The 'lift' swore to me, with the sincerity of most false witnesses, though without abandoning his despairing expression, that it was certainly under the name of Camembert that the Marquise had asked him to announce her. And truth to tell it was quite natural that he should have heard a name he knew already. Besides, having, where the nobility and the nature of the names out of which titles are made are concerned, the very vague notions which are those of many people who are not liftboys, the name of Camembert had struck him as all the more probable in that, this cheese being universally known, there was no call to be surprised that a Marquisate of such glorious renown should have been derived from it, unless it were that of the Marquisate which had lent its celebrity to the cheese. All the same, as he could see that I did not wish to appear to have made a mistake, for he knew that the masters like to see their most futile whims being obeyed and their most blatant falsehoods accepted, he promised me, like a good servant, to say Cambremer from then on. It is true that no shopkeeper in the town, nor countryman from roundabout, where the name and the persons of the Cambremers were thoroughly familiar, would ever have been able to make the 'lift's' mistake. But the staff at the Grand-Hôtel de Balbec were not in any sense locals. They had come in a straight line, with all their equipment, from Biarritz, Nice and Monte-Carlo, one part having been directed to Deauville, another to Dinard and the third been kept for Balbec.

But the 'lift's' sorrowful anxiety only grew. For him thus to have neglected to evince his devotion to me by his customary smiles, some misfortune had to have befallen him. Perhaps he had been 'moved'. I promised myself in that event to try to get him kept on, the manager having promised he would ratify whatever I might decide where his staff were concerned. 'You can always do what you want, I rectify it in advance.' Suddenly, just after leaving the lift, I fathomed the 'lift's' distress, his downcast expression. Because of the presence of Albertine I had not given him the hundred sous I was in the habit of handing him as we ascended. And instead of realizing that I did not want to make a show of tipping in front of a third party, the imbecile had begun to tremble, assuming that it was over once and for all, that never again would I give him anything. He had been imagining that I had 'come a cropper' (as the Duc de Guermantes would have said), and that supposition had filled him, not with any compassion for me but with a terrible, selfish disappointment. I told myself I was less unreasonable than my mother had thought one day when I had not dared not to give the exaggerated but feverishly anticipated sum that I had given the day before. But also, the significance I had hitherto been lending, without the slightest doubt, to the customary expression of delight, which I had not hesitated to see as a sign of attachment, appeared less certain in meaning. Seeing the liftboy ready, in his despair, to throw himself down five storeys, I wondered whether, had our respective positions in society been reversed, as the result of a revolution for example, instead of operating the lift for me so politely, the 'lift', now a bourgeois, might not have thrown me from it, and whether there is not, among certain classes of the people, more duplicity than in society, where, no doubt, the disobliging remarks are reserved for when we are absent, but where the attitude towards us would not be insulting were we to fall on hard times.

It cannot be said, however, that at the Balbec hotel the 'lift' was the most self-interested. So far as that went, the staff could be divided into two categories: on the one hand, those who made a distinction between the guests, being more responsive to the reasonable gratuity from an old nobleman (in a position of course to get him excused his twenty-eight days by putting in a word with General de Beautreillis) than to the reckless largesse of some foreign money-bags, who thereby betrayed a lack of breeding that was referred to as generosity only to his face. And on the other hand, those for whom nobility, intelligence, celebrity, position, manners, were non-existent, being masked by a figure. For these there was only one hierarchy, the money that you have, or rather that you give. Aimé himself, although he aspired, on account of the large number of hotels in which he had served, to a wide knowledge of the world, perhaps belonged to this category. At most, he would give a social twist, as knowing the families, to this kind of appreciation, by saying of the Princess of Luxembourg for example: 'Is there plenty of money there?' (the question-mark being in order to gain information, or to check one last time on information already acquired, before procuring for a guest a 'chef' for Paris, or guaranteeing him a table on the left, as you go in, with a view of the sea, at Balbec). Despite which, without being devoid of self-interest, he would not have exhibited it with the same foolish despair as the 'lift'. On the other hand, the latter's artlessness perhaps simplified matters. The convenience of a grand hotel, or an establishment such as Rachel's once was, is that, without intermediaries, the sight of a hundred-franc note, and even more of a thousand-franc note, even when being given on this occasion to someone else, causes the hitherto frozen face of an employee or of a woman to smile and show willing. In politics on the other hand, or the relationship of a lover and a mistress, too many things are interposed between the money and the docility. So many things that even those in whom money finally kindles a smile are often incapable of following the inner process that links them, and believe themselves to be, indeed are, more delicate. Besides, this clarifies polite conversation of all that 'I know what remains for me to do, tomorrow they'll find me in the morgue.' Thus one meets in polite society with few novelists, or poets or all those sublime creatures who talk about the very things that should not be said.

As soon as we were alone and had started down the corridor, Albertine said to me: 'What have you got against me?' Had my severity towards her not been more painful to myself? Was it only an unconscious stratagem on my part, with a view to inducing in my loved one, vis-à-vis myself, that attitude of fear and entreaty which would enable me to question her and learn perhaps which of the two hypotheses I had long since formed about her was the right one? The fact is that when I heard her question, I felt suddenly happy, like someone close to attaining a long-desired objective. Before answering her, I led her all the way to my door. As it opened, the latter caused the pink light that was filling the room to flow back and turned the white muslin of the curtains hanging against the evening into saffron lampas. I went as far as the window; the gulls had settled again on the waves; but now they were pink. I remarked on this to Albertine: 'Don't change the subject, she said, be open like me.' I lied. I declared that she would have to listen to a preliminary confession, of a great passion that I had been feeling for some time past for Andrée, and I made it to her with a simplicity and candour worthy of the stage, but which we hardly ever have in life save in the case of a love that we do not feel. Repeating the falsehood I had used with Gilberte before my first stay in Balbec, but varying it, I went so far, the better to make her believe me when I now told her that I did not love her, as to let slip that in the old days I had been on the point of falling in love with her, but that too much time had elapsed, that she was no more to me than a good companion, and that, even had I wanted, it would no longer have been possible for me again to have more ardent feelings towards her. Moreover, by thus dwelling in Albertine's presence on the protestations of my indifference towards her, all that I was doing – because of a particular circumstance and with a particular end in view – was to make more apparent, to mark with greater force, the binary rhythm that love assumes in all who are too unsure of themselves to believe that a woman can ever love them, and also that they can truly love her. They have sufficient self-knowledge to know that, with the most dissimilar women, they have felt the same hopes and the same anxieties, have invented the same fictions and uttered the same words, to have thus been made aware that their sentiments and their actions bear no close or necessary relation to the beloved, but pass to one side of her, splashing her, circumventing her like the tide that dashes itself along the rocks, and the sense of their own instability even increases their mistrust as to whether this woman, by whom they would like so much to be loved, loves them. Why would chance so order it, when she is nothing more than a simple accident set down before the outpouring of our desires, that we should be the object of those that she feels? And so, even while needing to pour out all these feelings towards her, so very different from the merely human feelings inspired in us by our neighbours, the very special feelings which are those of love, having taken a step forward, confessing to the one we love our affection for her and our hopes, instantly fearful of displeasing her, embarrassed, too, at sensing that the language we have used was not created expressly for her, that it has served, will serve us, for others, that if she does not love us she cannot understand us, that we have spoken with the lack of good taste, the immodesty of the pedant addressing subtle phrases not designed for them to dunces, this fear, this shame, lead to a counter-rhythm, a reflux, a need, be it by first of all drawing back, quickly to retract our previously confessed sympathy, to resume the offensive and recover our esteem, our dominance; this double rhythm is to be perceived in the various stages of a single love affair, in all the corresponding periods of similar love affairs, and in all those individuals who are better at analysing than at valuing themselves. If, however, it was accentuated rather more forcefully than is customary in the speech I was in the midst of making to Albertine, this was simply to enable me to move more rapidly and energetically into the contrary rhythm, punctuated by my affection.

As though Albertine must be having difficulty believing what I had told her of the impossibility of my loving her again, because of the too long interval, I backed up what I had called a quirk of my character with examples taken from people with whom I had, either by their fault or my own, allowed the moment of loving them to pass, without being able, however much I might desire it, to rediscover it afterwards. I thus appeared to be both apologizing to her, as if for an impoliteness, for this inability to start loving her again, and to be trying to make her understand the psychological reasons as if they had been peculiar to myself. But in explaining myself in this fashion, in elaborating on the case of Gilberte, in respect of whom what had become so untrue when applied to Albertine had been strictly true, I was simply making my assertions as plausible as I had pretended to believe that they were implausible. Sensing that Albertine had appreciated what she believed was my 'frank talking', and had recognized in my deductions the clarity of the self-evident, I apologized for the former, telling her that I knew quite well that one always gave offence by speaking the truth and that she must anyway have found it incomprehensible. She thanked me on the contrary for my sincerity and added into the bargain that she understood perfectly a state of mind so common and so natural.

So as to appear wholly sincere and not to be exaggerating, I assured Albertine in passing, as if making a point of being polite, that this confession of an imaginary feeling for Andrée, and of indifference towards herself, was not to be taken too literally, and I was finally able, without fearing that Albertine might suspect love in it, to speak to her with a gentleness that I had for so long denied myself and which I found delectable. I was almost caressing my confidante; as I spoke to her of her friend whom I loved, tears came into my eyes. But coming to the point, I finally told her that she knew what love was like, its susceptibilities and its sufferings, and that perhaps, as a friend already of long standing, she would have her heart set on putting an end to the great unhappiness she had been causing me, not directly, since it was not her that I loved, if I might venture to repeat that without offending her, but indirectly, by injuring me in my love for Andrée. I broke off to look and to indicate to Albertine a large solitary, hurrying bird which, far ahead of us, was lashing the air with the regular beat of its wings and, travelling at great speed above the beach, stained here and there by reflections like small pieces of torn red paper, covered its entire length, without slackening its speed, without its attention being diverted, without deviating from its course, like an emissary carrying far off some urgent, critical message. 'It at least goes straight to the mark! said Albertine with a reproachful look. – You say that because you don't know what I'd have liked to say to you. But it's so difficult that I'd rather give up; I'm certain I'd make you angry; and then all it would lead to is this: I'd be in no way happier with the one I've given my heart to but I'd have lost a good companion. – But since I swear I shan't be angry.' She looked so sweet, so sadly docile, to be waiting for her happiness to come from me, that I had difficulty restraining myself and not kissing – kissing with the kind of pleasure almost that I would have got from kissing my mother – that new face, which no longer had the alert, blushing appearance of a perverse and mischievous kitten, with its little pink, upturned nose, but seemed, in the fullness of its overwhelming sadness, to have melted, in broad, flattened, descending rivulets, into kindness. Leaving my love out of account, as though it were a chronic foolishness unconnected with her, and putting myself in her place, I felt pity faced by this good girl, accustomed to being treated fairly and kindly, yet against whom the good companion she may have thought I was for her had been conducting for weeks past a persecution that had finally reached a climax. It was because I had taken up a simply human vantage-point, external to the two of us, from where my jealous love had vanished, that I felt this profound pity for Albertine, which would have been less so if I had not loved her. Moreover, in this rhythmic oscillation, which goes from the declaration to the quarrel (the surest, most dangerously effective means of forming, by contrary and successive movements, a knot that will not come untied but which attaches us firmly to a person), and at the heart of the movement of withdrawal which constitutes one of the two elements in this rhythm, what use is it still to distinguish these refluxes of human pity which, opposed to love yet perhaps having unconsciously the same cause, lead in any case to the same effects? When afterwards we recall the sum-total of all that we have done for a woman, we are often made aware that the actions inspired by the desire to demonstrate that we love her, to make ourselves loved, to win favours, occupy little more space than those attributable to the human need to set right the wrongs we have done to the one we love, out of a simple moral duty, as though we did not love them. 'So, then, what have I managed to do?' Albertine asked me. There was a knock; it was the 'lift'; Albertine's aunt, who had been passing the hotel in her carriage, had stopped on the off chance to see whether she might not be there and to take her back. Albertine sent answer that she could not come down, that they should eat without waiting for her, that she did not know what time she would be home. 'But your aunt will be angry? – Don't you believe it! She'll understand perfectly.' And so – at this moment at least, such as would not perhaps recur – a conversation with me was, as Albertine saw it, the circumstances being what they were, a matter so self-evidently important that it must come before everything else, to which, referring herself no doubt instinctively to a familial jurisprudence, and enumerating the situations in which, when M. Bontemps's career had been at stake, a journey was not a consideration, my loved one was in no doubt that her aunt would think it perfectly natural to find the dinner hour being sacrificed. Having slid this remote hour that she spent without me, at her family's, all the way to me, Albertine gave it to me; I could use it as I saw fit. In the end I ventured to tell her what had been reported to me as to her mode of life, and that, despite the profound disgust aroused in me by women afflicted with that same vice, I had not felt any concern until they named her accomplice to me, and that she could well understand, loving Andrée to the extent that I did, the grief that I had experienced. It would have been cleverer perhaps to say that other women, too, had been named, but ones who meant nothing to me. But Cottard's abrupt and terrible revelation had entered into me and lacerated me just as it was, in its entirety, with nothing to be added. And just as, before, I could never on my own have imagined that Albertine loved Andrée, or might at least play caressing games with her, had Cottard not drawn my attention to their attitude as they waltzed, so I had been unable to move on from that idea to the, for me, so very different one that Albertine might have relationships with women other than Andrée which not even affection could excuse. Even before swearing to me that it was not true, Albertine, like anyone who has just been told they have been talked about in this way, displayed anger, unhappiness and, where the unknown slanderer was concerned, a raging curiosity to learn who it was and a desire to come face to face with them so as to be able to confound them. But she assured me that at least she did not hold it against me. 'If it'd been true, I'd have confessed it. But Andrée and I are both as horrified as each other by that sort of thing. We haven't reached the age we are without seeing women with short hair, who have mannish ways and are of the kind you say, and nothing revolts us as much.' Albertine merely gave me her word, a peremptory word and unsupported by any proof. But that was the very thing best able to set my mind at rest, jealousy belonging to that family of unhealthy doubts far more easily removed by the vigour of an affirmation than by its plausibility. A peculiarity of love, moreover, is that it makes us at once more mistrustful and more credulous, makes us quicker to suspect the one we love than we would have another woman, and to be readier to lend credence to her denials. We must be in love to feel concern that there are not only honest women, or in other words to be made aware of it, and in love, also, if we are to hope, that is to say to be sure, that there are some. It is human to seek out sorrow and at once to be delivered from it. The propositions capable of succeeding in this easily strike us as true, we do not quibble for long over a sedative that works. And besides, however multiple the person that we love may be, they may in any case present two essential personalities to us, according to whether they appear as ours or as turning their desires elsewhere than towards us. The first of these personalities possesses the peculiar power which prevents us from believing in the reality of the second, the specific secret for allaying the suffering that the latter has caused. The loved one is by turns the sickness and the remedy that suspends and aggravates the sickness. No doubt I had long been prepared, by virtue of the sway exercised over my imagination and my ability to be moved by the example of Swann, to believe that what I feared was true instead of what I would have wished for. Thus the comfort brought by Albertine's affirmations was all but compromised for a moment because I recalled the story of Odette. But I told myself that if it was right to make allowances for the worst, not only when, in order to understand Swann's sufferings, I had tried to put myself in his place, but now that it involved myself, by seeking the truth as though it involved someone else, it must not, however, out of cruelty towards myself, a soldier choosing the post, not where he may be of the greatest use but where he is the most exposed, eventuate in the error of holding one supposition to be truer than the others solely because it was the most painful. Was there not an abyss between Albertine, a girl from quite a good bourgeois family, and Odette, a cocotte sold by her mother from an early age? The word of the one was not to be set alongside that of the other. Moreover, Albertine had none of the same interest in lying to me as Odette had to Swann. Besides, Odette had confessed to the latter what Albertine had just denied. I should therefore have committed an error of reasoning as serious – though opposite – as that which would have inclined me towards a hypothesis on the grounds that it would have caused me less suffering than the others, by not taking into account these real differences between their situations and reconstructing the actual life of my loved one solely in terms of what I had learned of Odette's. I had before me a new Albertine, already glimpsed on several occasions, it was true, towards the end of my first stay in Balbec, open, good-natured, an Albertine who, out of affection for me, had just forgiven me my suspicions and attempted to dispel them. She made me sit down beside her on my bed. I thanked her for what she had said, I assured her that our reconciliation was complete and that never again would I be hard on her. I told Albertine that she should, all the same, go back home for dinner. She asked me whether I was not comfortable as we were. And drawing down my head for a caress she had never as yet given me, and which I owed perhaps to the ending of our quarrel, she passed her tongue lightly over my lips, and tried to part them. To start with, I kept them tightly shut. 'You're being such a naughty boy!' she said.

I should have left that evening without ever seeing her again. I had a presentiment from then on that in a love that is not shared – or in other words, in love, for there are people for whom there is no shared love – all we can taste of happiness is that simulacrum which had been granted me at one of those unique moments when a woman's kindness, or her caprice, or chance, applies to our desires, in a perfect coincidence, the same words and the same actions as if we had truly been loved. The wise thing would have been to contemplate with curiosity, to possess with delight, this small particle of happiness, lacking which I would have died without having suspected what it can be like for hearts less difficult or more favoured; to suppose that it formed part of a vast and enduring happiness that had appeared to me at this point alone; and, so that the following day might not give the lie to this pretence, not to try to demand a further favour following that which had been due only to the artifice of an exceptional moment. I should have left Balbec, have shut myself away in solitude, have remained there in harmony with the dying vibrations of the voice I had been able to turn for a moment into that of love, and of which I would have demanded nothing more than never to address me further; for fear that by some fresh utterance, which from now on could only be different, it might wound by a dissonance the silence of the senses in which, as though thanks to some pedal, the tonality of happiness might have long survived within me.

Calmed by my discussion with Albertine, I began to live more in the company of my mother once again. She liked talking quietly to me about the days when my grandmother had been younger. Afraid that I might be reproaching myself for the sadnesses with which I may have darkened the end of that life, she went gladly back to the years when my early studies had given my grandmother satisfactions that hitherto had always been concealed from me. We spoke again of Combray. My mother told me that there at least I used to read and that in Balbec I should certainly be doing the same, if I was not working. I replied that in order indeed to surround myself with memories of Combray and the pretty painted plates, I would like to reread The Arabian Nights. As in the old days at Combray, when she gave me books for my name day, so as to make it a surprise, my mother sent secretly for both Galland's Arabian Nights and Mardrus's Arabian Nights.[18] But having cast an eye over the two translations, my mother would certainly have wanted me to stick to that by Galland, while being afraid to influence me on account of the respect she had for intellectual freedom, of a fear of intervening clumsily in the life of my mind, and of the feeling that, as a woman, on the one hand she lacked, as she thought, the necessary literary competence, and on the other should not be judging a young man's reading-matter according to what she found shocking. Lighting upon certain of the tales, she had been revolted by the immorality of the subject-matter and the coarseness of the expression. But above all, having conserved as precious relics, not only the brooch, the en-tout-cas,[19] the cloak and the volume of Mme de Sévigné, but also her mother's habits of thought and of language, and searching at every opportunity for the opinion the latter might have expressed, my mother was in no doubt that my grandmother would have pronounced sentence on Mardrus's book. She recalled that at Combray, when, before setting off on the Méséglise walk, I had been reading Augustin Thierry,[20] my grandmother, happy with my reading, and with my walks, was indignant all the same to find the man whose name had remained attached to the hemistich 'Then Mérovée reigned' being referred to as Merowig, and refused to say Carolingians for the Carlovingians to whom she had remained faithful. In the end I had told her what my grandmother had thought about the Greek names that Bloch, following Leconte de Lisle,[21] had given to the Homeric gods, even going so far, in the case of the simplest things, to take it as a religious duty, in which he thought literary talent consisted, to adopt the Greek spelling. Having to say for example in a letter that the wine they drank at home was true nectar, he wrote true nektar, with a k, which enabled him to snigger at the name Lamartine.[22] Now, if an Odyssey from which the names of Ulysses and Minerva were missing was for her no longer the Odyssey, what would she have said on seeing the title of her Arabian Nights deformed on the cover itself, and on no longer finding, exactly transcribed as she had always been accustomed to saying them, the immortally familiar names of Scheherezade or Dinarzarde, or where the charming Caliph and the influential Djinns were barely recognizable, having been debaptized, if I dare apply that term in the case of Muslim tales, as, in the one instance, the 'Kalifat' and, in the other, the 'Gennis'? Meanwhile, my mother handed me the two books and I told her I would read them on those days when I was too tired to go out for a walk.

Those days were not very frequent as it happens. We went to have tea as a 'gang' as in the old days, Albertine, her girl-friends and I, on the cliffs or at the Marie-Antoinette farm. But there were times when Albertine gave me this great pleasure. She would say: 'Today I want to be alone with you for a bit, it would be nicer if just the two of us met.' Then she would say she had things to do, that in any case she did not have to account to anyone, and so that the others, if they went off for a walk and for tea without us, would not be able to find us, we used to go off like two lovers all on our own to Bagatelle or La Croix d'Heulan, while the gang, who would never have thought of looking for us there and never went there, remained indefinitely, in the hope of seeing us arrive, at Marie-Antoinette. I remember the warm weather we were then having, when a drop of sweat would fall vertically, regularly, intermittently, from the brow of the farmboys working in the sun, like the drip from a cistern, alternating with the fall of the ripe fruit coming away from the tree in the neighbouring 'close'; they have remained, still today, together with this mystery of a woman concealed, the most constant element in any love that is offered to me. I will break all my week's engagements to get to know a woman I have been told about but to whom I would not give a moment's thought, if it is a week when the weather is of this kind, and if I am to meet her at some isolated farmhouse. For all my knowing that weather and an assignation of this sort are not from her, they are the bait, familiar to me though it is, that I allow myself to take and which is enough to hook me. I know that in cold weather, in a town, I might have desired this woman, but without the accompaniment of any romantic feelings, without falling in love; the love is no less strong once, the circumstances being what they are, it has enslaved me, it is simply more melancholy, as our feelings for people become in life the more we perceive the increasingly small part they are playing and that the new love, which we would wish to be so enduring, and to be cut short at the same time as our life itself, will be the last.

There were few people in Balbec as yet, few girls. Sometimes I would see one or other of them stopped on the beach, without attractions yet whom many coincidences seemed to certify was the same one as I had been in despair at not being able to go up to just as she was coming out with her friends from the riding-school or the gymnastics class. If it was the same one (and I was careful not to mention her to Albertine), the girl I had thought intoxicating did not exist. But I was unable to attain any certainty for the faces of these girls did not occupy a fixed magnitude on the beach, did not present any permanent form, contracted, dilated, transformed as they were by my own expectations, by my anxious longing, or a feeling of well-being that was sufficient unto itself, by the different outfits that they wore, by the pace they were walking at or by their immobility. From close to, however, I found two or three of them adorable. Each time I saw one of these, I longed to take her down the avenue des Tamaris, or into the dunes, or better still along the cliffs. But although into desire, as opposed to indifference, there already enters the boldness that is after all a first step, if a unilateral one, towards realization, between my desire and the action that would be my asking to kiss her, there lay the whole indefinite 'blank' of hesitation and timidity. So then I would go into the pâtissier-limonadier and drink seven or eight glasses of port one after the other. Instantly, in place of that unbridgeable gap between my desire and the action, the effect of the alcohol drew a line that conjoined both. No further room for hesitation or fear. I fancied that the girl would come flying to me. I went up to her, and these words came from my lips of their own accord: 'I would like to go for a walk with you. Wouldn't you like us to go along the cliffs, you're not disturbed by anyone behind the little wood which shields the portable house that's currently unlived-in from the wind?' All life's difficulties had been smoothed away, there was no longer anything to impede the intertwining of our two bodies. No more impediments where I was concerned at least. For they had not evaporated for the girl, who had not been drinking port. Had she done so, and had the universe lost a certain reality in her eyes, the long-cherished dream that might then have suddenly appeared realizable to her would by no means perhaps have been that of falling into my arms.

Not only were the girls few in number but at that time of year, which was not yet the 'season', they stayed only briefly. I remember one with the russet complexion of a Coleus flower, with green eyes and two russet cheeks, whose thin, reversible face resembled the winged seeds of certain trees. I do not know what breeze brought her to Balbec, nor what other breeze bore her away again. So abrupt was it that for several days I felt an unhappiness which I ventured to confess to Albertine, once I realized that she had gone for ever.

It has to be said that several of them were either girls I did not know at all, or ones whom I had not seen in years. Often, before meeting them, I would write to them. What joy if their reply led me to believe in a possible love affair! At the outset of a friendship with a woman, even if it is not subsequently to be realized, we cannot be parted from the first letters we have received. We want to have them always beside us, like so many beautiful flowers we have been sent, still fresh, and which we break off from gazing at only in order to breathe them in from closer to. The phrase that we know by heart is pleasant to reread, and, with those that we have learned less literally, we want to verify the degree of affection in a certain expression. Did she write: 'Your dear letter'? A small disappointment in the sweetness we are breathing in, to be attributed either to our having read too fast or to our correspondent's illegible handwriting; she has not put 'and your dear letter', but 'on seeing your letter'. But the rest is so affectionate. May more such flowers come tomorrow! Then that is no longer enough, her looks, her voice, must be set next to the written words. We arrange a rendezvous and – without her having changed perhaps – where we had thought, from the given description or our own personal memory, we would be meeting the fairy Viviane we find Puss in Boots.[23] We fix a rendezvous for the next day nevertheless, for it is after all her, and what we desired was her. But these desires for a woman of whom we have dreamed do not make the beauty of any precise feature absolutely necessary. These desires are simply the desire for some being or other; vague as fragrances,[24] as Styrax was the desire of Prothyraia, saffron the ethereal desire, spices the desire of Hera, myrrh the fragrance of the clouds, manna the desire of Nike, incense the fragrance of the sea. But the fragrances of which the Orphic Hymns sing are far fewer in number than the divinities that they cherish. Myrrh is the fragrance of the clouds but also of Protogonos, of Neptune, of Nereus and of Leto; incense is the fragrance of the sea, but also of the beautiful Dike, of Themis, of Circe, of the Nine Muses, of Eos, of Mnemosyne, of the Day, of Dikaiosyne. As for styrax, manna and spices, there could be no telling all the divinities whom they inspire, so numerous are they. Amphietes has all the fragrances save incense, and Gaia rejects solely beans and spices. So also with the desires I felt for girls. Fewer in number than they were, they turned into disappointments and unhappinesses one of which was much like another. Myrrh I have never wanted. I reserved that for Jupien and for the Princesse de Guermantes, since it is the desire of Protogonos 'of the two sexes, having the bellow of the bull, of the countless, memorable, indescribable orgies, descending, joyfully, to the sacrifices of the Orgiophants'.

But soon the season was in full swing; every day saw new arrivals and for the suddenly increasing frequency of my walks, replacing the delightful reading of the Arabian Nights, there was a reason devoid of pleasure, which poisoned every one of them. The beach was now populated by girls, and the idea put into my head by Cottard having, not furnished me with fresh suspicions, but made me sensitive and vulnerable on that score and careful not to allow any to form within me, as soon as a young woman arrived in Balbec, I felt uneasy and proposed the most distant excursions to Albertine, so that she might not make the acquaintance of or even, if it were possible, set eyes on, the new arrival. I was naturally more fearful still of those whose dubious ways had been observed or whose bad reputation was known; I attempted to persuade my loved one that this bad reputation was without foundation, was a slander, perhaps, without admitting it to myself, out of an as yet unconscious fear that she might try to strike up a friendship with the depraved woman in question, or regret not being able to seek her out on my account, or think, given the number of examples, that so widespread a vice was not to be condemned. By denying it in each instance of guilt, I came close to claiming that sapphism does not exist. Albertine adopted my own incredulity in respect of this or that woman's vice: 'No, I think it's just a manner she's trying to put on, it's to give herself style.' But then I would almost regret having pleaded their innocence, for it displeased me that Albertine, formerly so severe, might think that this 'manner' was something sufficiently flattering, and sufficiently advantageous, for a woman exempt from such tastes to have sought to make it appear that she had them. I would have wished for no more women to come to Balbec; I trembled at the thought that since this was more or less the time when Mme Putbus was due to arrive at the Verdurins', her lady's-maid, whose preferences Saint-Loup had not concealed from me, might make an excursion as far as the beach, and, if it was on a day when I was not at Albertine's side, might try to corrupt her. I found myself wondering, since Cottard had made no secret of the fact that the Verdurins were very attached to me, and while not wishing, as he put it, to appear to be pursuing me, would have given much to receive a visit, whether I might not, by dint of promising to bring to them in Paris every known Guermantes, persuade Mme Verdurin, on some pretext or other, to warn Mme Putbus that it was impossible that they should keep her in the house and make her leave again as quickly as possible.

In spite of these thoughts, and since it was above all the presence of Andrée that had been worrying me, the assuagement procured by Albertine's words persisted for some little while longer. I knew, moreover, that soon I would have less need of it, Andrée being due to leave with Rosemonde and Gisèle at almost the same time as everyone would be arriving, having only a few weeks more in the company of Albertine. During which weeks, moreover, Albertine seemed to plan everything she did and everything she said with a view to destroying my suspicions, should any remain, or stopping them from reviving. She saw to it that she was never left alone with Andrée and insisted, when we returned home, that I should go with her all the way to her door, so that I might come and fetch her from there when we were due to go out. Andrée meanwhile, for her part, took equal pains and seemed to avoid seeing Albertine. And this apparent pact between them was not the only indication that Albertine must have informed her friend of our conversation and asked her to be good enough to lay my absurd suspicions to rest.

Around this time, there occurred a scandal at the Grand-Hôtel de Balbec which was not calculated to alter the course of my torments. Bloch's sister had for some little time had a secret relationship with a former actress that soon was no longer enough for them. To be seen seemed to them to add perversity to their pleasure, and they wanted to expose their perilous frolickings to the public gaze. It began with caresses, that might after all be put down to an intimate friendship, in the cardroom, around the baccarat table. Then they grew bolder. Finally, one evening, in a not even unlit corner of the great ballroom, on a sofa, they no more stood on ceremony than if they had been in their bed. Two officers who were close by with their wives complained to the manager. It was thought for a moment or two that their protest might have some effect. But against them was the fact that, having come to Balbec for the evening from Netteholme, where they were staying, they could be of no possible usefulness to the manager. Whereas, without her even knowing it, and whatever observations the manager may have made to her, there hovered over Mlle Bloch the protection of M. Nissim Bernard. I need to say why. M. Nissim Bernard practised the family virtues in the very highest degree. Each year he rented in Balbec a magnificent villa for his nephew, and no invitation could have deflected him from going back to dine at his, which was in reality their, house. He never ate lunch at home, however. Each day, at noon, he was at the Grand-Hôtel. For the fact was that, just as other men keep a young dancer, he kept a 'commis', rather like the chasseurs mentioned earlier, who put one in mind of the young Israelites in Esther and Athalie. Truth to tell, the forty years that separated M. Nissim Bernard from the young commis ought to have preserved the latter from a disagreeable contact. But as Racine puts it so very sagaciously in those same choruses:[25]

Mon Dieu, qu 'une vertu naissante
Parmi tant de périls marche à pas incertains!
Qu 'une âme qui te cherche et veut être innocente
Trouve d'obstacle à ses desseins![26]

For all that the young commis had been 'raised far from the world', in the Temple Palace of Balbec, he had not followed the advice of Joad:

Sur la richesse et l'or ne mets point ton appui.[27]

He had resigned himself perhaps by saying: 'The sinners cover the earth.' Whatever the truth of the matter, and although M. Nissim Bernard could not have been hoping for so brief a delay, from the very first day,

Et soit frayeur encor ou pour le caresser,
De ses bras innocents il se sentit presser.[28]

From the second day, M. Nissim Bernard was taking the commis out, and 'the contagion of this contact had marred his innocence'. From then on, the young boy's life had changed. For all that he carried the bread and the salt, as ordered by his chef de rang, his whole face sang out:

De fleurs en fleurs, de plaisirs en plaisirs
Promenons nos désirs.
De nos ans passagers le nombre est incertain.
Hâtons-nous aujourd'hui de jouir de la vie!
L'honneur et les emplois
Sont le prix d'une aveugle et douce obéissance,
Pour la triste innocence
Qui viendrait élever la voix.[29]

From that day forward, M. Nissim Bernard had never failed to come and occupy his seat at lunch (as someone who is keeping a ballet dancer would have done his seat in the stalls, a ballet dancer in this case of a strongly characterized kind that still awaits its Degas).[30] It was M. Nissim Bernard's pleasure to follow, in the dining-room and off into the distant vistas where the cashier sat enthroned beneath her palm tree, the manoeuvrings of this adolescent, assiduous in his attendance on one and all, though less so with M. Nissim Bernard since the latter had been keeping him, either because the young choirboy did not think it necessary to evince the same friendliness towards someone by whom he thought himself sufficiently loved, or because this love irritated him, or because he was afraid that, once discovered, it might make him miss other opportunities. But this coldness in fact pleased M. Nissim Bernard by all that it concealed. Whether out of an atavistic Hebraism, or a profanation of Christian sentiment, he took a singular pleasure in the Racinian ceremonial, whether Jewish or Catholic. Had it been a real performance of Esther or Athalie, M. Bernard would have regretted that the difference of centuries would not have allowed him to get to know the author, Jean Racine, in order to obtain a more prominent role for his protégé. But the ceremony of lunch not emanating from any writer, he contented himself with being on good terms with the manager and with Aimé, so that the 'young Israelite' might be promoted to the hoped-for role of either second-in-command or even chef de rang. He had been offered that of sommelier. But M. Bernard forced him to refuse for he would no longer have been able to come every day and see him running around the green dining-room and be served by him like a stranger. And so strong was this pleasure that M. Bernard came back to Balbec year after year and ate his lunch away from home, habits in which M. Bloch saw, in the first, a poetic liking for the beautiful light, the sunsets along this coast that he preferred to any other; and in the second, the inveterate idiosyncrasy of an old bachelor.

Truth to tell, this error on the part of M. Nissim Bernard's relations, who did not suspect the real reason for his annual return to Balbec, and for what the pedantic Mme Bloch called his 'culinary nights away', this error was a deeper truth, to the second degree. For M. Nissim Bernard was himself unaware of the extent to which his love of the beach at Balbec, and of the view you got over the sea from the restaurant, and his obsessive habits entered into his liking for keeping, like a ballet dancer of another sort as yet lacking its Degas, one of the male servants who were still as yet girls. And so M. Nissim Bernard maintained excellent relations with the manager of the theatre that was the Balbec hotel, and with Aimé, its director and stage manager – whose role in this whole affair was not of the most pellucid. One day they would scheme to obtain a leading role, a position as maître d'hôtel perhaps. Meanwhile, M. Nissim Bernard's pleasure, however poetical and calmly contemplative it might be, had something of the character of those ladies' men – Swann in the old days, for example – who always know that by going into society they will meet with their mistress. Hardly would M. Nissim Bernard be seated before he saw the object of his desires advancing on to the stage bearing in his hand fruit or cigars on a tray. And so each morning, having kissed his niece, fretted over my friend Bloch's labours and fed lumps of sugar to his horses from his outstretched palm, he made feverish haste to arrive at the Grand-Hôtel in time for lunch. Had the house caught fire, or had his niece had a stroke, he would no doubt have left just the same. Thus he feared like the plague a cold that might keep him in bed – for he was a hypochondriac – and necessitate having Aimé asked to send his young friend round to him before tea-time.

Moreover, he loved that whole labyrinth of corridors, secret offices, saloons, cloakrooms, larders and galleries that was the Balbec hotel. He had the atavistic love of an Oriental for harems, and when he left in the evenings, he was to be seen furtively exploring its byways.

Whereas, venturing all the way down into the basements, and trying in spite of everything not to be seen and to avoid scandal, M. Nissim Bernard put you in mind, in his quest for young Levites, of these lines from La Juive:[31]

> O Dieu de nos pères,
> Parmi nous descends,
> Cache nos mystères
> A l'oeil des méchants![32]

I, on the contrary, was going up to the room of two sisters who had accompanied an old foreign lady to Balbec, as ladies'-maids. They were two what in hotel parlance are known as courrières, or guests' servants, and in that of Françoise, who imagined that a courrier or courrière is there to run courses or errands, two coursières or 'coursers'. Hotels, for their part, have remained, more nobly, in the days when they used to sing: 'C'est un courrier de cabinet.'[33]

In spite of the difficulty there was for a guest to go into the courrières' rooms, and vice versa, I had very soon struck up a very lively though very pure friendship with these two young people, Mlle Marie Gineste and Mme Céleste Albaret.[34] Born at the foot of the high mountains in the centre of France, on the banks of streams and torrents (the water even passed underneath their family home, where a mill-wheel turned, and which had several times been devastated by flooding), they seemed to have preserved their character. Marie Gineste was more uniformly quick and staccato, Céleste Albaret softer and more languid, slack like the waters of a lake, but with recurring fits of a terrible turbulence when her fury recalled the dangers of those spates and whirlpools that carry everything away and lay everywhere waste. They often used to come and visit me in the mornings, when I was still in bed. I have never known people so wilfully ignorant, who had learned absolutely nothing at school, yet whose language had something so literary about it that, had it not been for the almost primitive nature of their accent, you would have thought their words affected. With a familiarity on which I am not embroidering, and despite the praises (which are here in order to celebrate, not myself but the strange genius of Céleste) and the criticisms, both equally false, but perfectly sincere, which such remarks appear to imply in my regard, as I was dipping croissants in my milk, Céleste would say to me: 'Oh, little black devil with hair like a jay, oh what deep mischief! I don't know what your mother was thinking of when she made you, because you're just like a bird. Look, Marie, wouldn't you say he's smoothing down his feathers, and turning his neck so supply? He looks so light, you'd think he was busy learning to fly. Oh, you're lucky that the ones who created you had you born into the ranks of the rich; what'd have become of you, wasteful as you are? Look, he's throwing away his croissant because it touched the bed. Oh no, look how he's spilling his milk, wait till I put a napkin on you because you wouldn't know how to go about it, I've never seen anyone so silly and so clumsy as you.' And then you heard the more regular torrent-sound of Marie Gineste, who was furious and took her sister to task: 'Come, Céleste, will you be quiet? Are you crazy talking to Monsieur in that way?' All Céleste did was to smile; and since I hated having a napkin tied on: 'No, I'm not, Marie, look at him, whoosh! he's sitting straight up now like a snake. A real snake, I tell you.' She did not stint, indeed, on these zoological comparisons, for according to her one never knew when I was asleep, I fluttered about all night long like a moth, and during the day I was as quick as the squirrels, 'you know, Marie, like you see at home, so agile you can't follow them even with your eyes. – But, Céleste, you know he doesn't like having a napkin on when he's eating. – It's not that he doesn't like it, it's to tell you there's no changing what he's made up his mind to. He's a lord and master and wants to show he's a lord and master. You can change the sheets ten times a day if you have to, but he won't have given in. Yesterday's lasted the course, but today they've only just been put on and already they'll have to be changed. Oh, I was right to say he wasn't made to be born amongst the poor. Look, his hair's standing up, it's puffing up with anger like the feathers on a bird. Poor little dickybird!' At this Marie was not alone in protesting, I did so, too, for I did not at all feel myself to be a lord and master. But Céleste never believed that my modesty was genuine and, cutting me short: 'Oh, bag of tricks, oh, sweet, yes, and treacherous, of all the cunning, lowdown…! Oh Molière!' (This was the only writer's name that she knew, but she applied it to me, meaning by it someone who would be capable simultaneously of composing plays and performing in them.) 'Céleste!' cried Marie imperiously who, not knowing the name of Molière, was afraid it might be some further insult. Céleste went back to smiling: 'Haven't you seen the photograph in his drawer then of when he was a child? He wanted to make us believe they always dressed him very simply. And there, with his little cane, he's nothing but fur and lace, like no prince ever had. But that's nothing compared with his immense majesty and his even more profound goodness. – So now you're rummaging in his drawers,' scolded Marie the mountain torrent. To allay Marie's fears, I asked her what she thought about what M. Nissim Bernard had been doing. 'Oh, Monsieur, those are things I couldn't have believed they existed; I needed to come here', and, for once outdoing Céleste with a more profound observation: 'But there you are, Monsieur, you can never know what there may be in a life.' To change the subject, I talked to her about my father's life, who used to work day and night. 'Oh, Monsieur, those are lives where people keep nothing for themselves, not a single minute, not a single pleasure; everything, everything entirely is a sacrifice for others, those are given lives… Look, Céleste, just to put his hand on the coverlet to pick up his croissant, such refinement! He can do the most insignificant things, you'd think the whole nobility of France, all the way to the Pyrenees, was changing its position in every one of his movements.'

Crushed by this far from truthful portrait, I was silent; Céleste saw this as one more stratagem: 'Oh, brow that looks so pure yet hides so many things, cool and friendly cheeks like the inside of an almond, little satin hands all plush, nails like claws, and so on. I say, Marie, look at him drinking his milk so composedly it makes me want to say my prayers. How serious he looks! Now's when they should make his portrait right enough. He's the complete child. Is it drinking milk like them that's kept you their clear complexion? Oh, youth, oh, what pretty skin! You'll never grow old. You're lucky, you'll never have to raise your hand against anyone because you've got eyes that know how to impose their will. And look there, now he's angry. He's standing up, straight as what there's no denying.'

Françoise did not at all like the women she called the two wheedlers coming to engage me in conversation like this. The manager, whose staff he made keep watch on everything that was going on, even pointed solemnly out to me that it was undignified for a guest to talk to the courrières. But I, who found the 'wheedlers' superior to all the female guests in the hotel, merely laughed in his face, convinced that he would not understand my explanations. And the two sisters returned. 'Look, Marie, at those delicate features. Oh perfect miniature, finer than the most precious miniature you'd see in a glass case, for he's got the movements, and words to make you listen to him for days and nights on end.'

It was a wonder that a foreign lady had been able to bring them, for, without knowing any history or geography, they confidently detested the English, the Germans, the Russians, the Italians, those foreign 'vermin', and liked, with some exceptions, only the French. Their faces had preserved the moisture of the malleable clay of their rivers to such an extent that, as soon as mention was made of a foreigner staying in the hotel, in order to repeat what he had said, Céleste and Marie applied his face to their faces, their mouths became his mouth, their eyes his eyes, and you would have wanted to preserve these admirable stage masks. Céleste even, while pretending merely to be repeating what the manager had said, or one or other of my friends, would, without appearing to, insert fictitious remarks into her brief narrative, in which were mischievously depicted all the defects of Bloch, or the First President, and the like. In the form of an account of a simple errand that she had obligingly carried out, you got an inimitable portrait. They never read anything, not even a newspaper. One day, however, they found a book on my bed. It was some admirable but obscure poems by Saint-Léger Léger.[35] Céleste read a few pages and said to me: 'But are you quite sure they're poetry, aren't they more like riddles?' Obviously, for someone who had learned only one poem in her childhood, 'Ici-bas tous les lilas meurent',[36] there was a lack of transition. I think that their obstinate refusal to learn had something to do with their unhealthy native region. Yet they were as well endowed as a poet, with more modesty than these generally possess. For if Céleste had said something remarkable and, unable to remember it properly, I asked her to remind me of it, she assured me she had forgotten. They will never read books, but nor will they ever write any.

Françoise was quite impressed on learning that the two brothers of these very simple women had married, one of them the niece of the Archbishop of Tours, the other a relation of the Bishop of Rodez. To the manager, this would have conveyed nothing. Céleste sometimes reproached her husband for not understanding her, and I was astonished for my part that he was able to put up with her. For there were certain moments when, quivering, furious, all-destroying, she was hateful. They claim that the saline liquid which is our blood is only what survives within us of our original element, the sea. In the same way, I believe that Céleste, not only in her rages but also in her moments of depression, had preserved the rhythm of her native streams. When she was exhausted, it was after their fashion; she had truly run dry. Nothing then could have brought her back to life. Then all of a sudden the circulation would resume in her tall, slight, magnificent body. The water flowed in the opaline transparency of her blueish skin. It smiled in the sunlight and became bluer still. At such moments she was truly celestial.

For all that Bloch's family had never suspected the reason why his uncle never lunched at home, but had accepted it from the outset as an old bachelor's idiosyncrasy, required of him perhaps by a liaison with some actress, everything that concerned M. Nissim Bernard was 'taboo' for the manager of the Balbec hotel. And this was why, without even having referred the matter to the uncle, he had not dared in the end to find fault with the niece, while advising her to a certain circumspection. So the girl and her friend, who for several days had imagined that they would be banned from the casino and the Grand-Hôtel, finding that everything had been arranged, were happy to demonstrate to the paterfamiliases who had shunned them that they could do whatever they liked with impunity. Not that they went so far of course as to repeat the public exhibition that had revolted everyone. But gradually and imperceptibly they resumed their old ways. And one evening as I was leaving the casino more dead than alive with Albertine, and Bloch, whom we had met, they came past, intertwined, kissing without stopping, and, having drawn level with us, gave vent to giggles, laughter and indecent shouts. Bloch looked down so as to appear not to have recognized his sister, while I was in torments at the thought that this private and atrocious language was perhaps directed at Albertine.

Another incident fixed my preoccupations even more firmly in the direction of Gomorrah. On the beach I had seen a beautiful young woman, slender and pale, whose eyes disposed, around their centres, rays so geometrically luminous that, faced by her gaze, you thought of a constellation. I reflected on how much more beautiful this girl was than Albertine and how it would be more sensible to give the other up. At the very most, this beautiful young woman's face had been subjected to an invisible planing by a life of great degradation, of the constant acceptance of coarse expedients, so that her eyes, though nobler than the rest of her face, had to radiate only appetite and lust. But the next day, this young woman being sat some distance from us in the casino, I could see that she never stopped letting the alternating and revolving light from her glances rest on Albertine. You would have said she was signalling to her, as if with the aid of a lighthouse. I was suffering lest my loved one saw that she was the object of so much attention, and afraid that these endlessly kindled glances might carry the conventional meaning of a lovers' assignation for the following day. Who knows? that assignation might not perhaps be the first. The young woman with the radiant eyes might have come to Balbec another year. It was perhaps because Albertine had already yielded to her desires or to those of a friend that the latter felt free to address these dazzling signals to her. They were doing more then than demand something for the present, their authority for that had come from good times in the past.

In that case, the assignation would not be the first but a continuation of games played together in other years. And indeed, the glances were not saying 'Will you?' The moment the young woman had caught sight of Albertine, she had turned her head all the way round and shone glances at her laden with memories, as though she were afraid and astounded that my loved one should not remember. Albertine, who could see her very clearly, remained phlegmatically without moving, with the result that the other, with the same sort of tact as a man who sees his former mistress with another lover, stopped looking at her or taking any more notice of her than if she had not existed.

But a few days later I received proof of this young woman's proclivities and also of the probability that she had known Albertine in the old days. Often, when, in the hall of the casino, two girls felt desire for one another, there was produced something like a phenomenon of light, a sort of trail of phosphorescence leading from one to the other. Let me say in passing that it is with the aid of such materializations, imponderable though they be, by these astral signs setting fire to a whole portion of the atmosphere, that, in every town and every village, that Gomorrah, having been scattered, tends to reunite its separated members, to reconstitute the biblical city, while everywhere the same efforts are being pursued, if only with a view to an intermittent rebuilding, by the nostalgic, the hypocritical and sometimes by the courageous exiles from Sodom.

On one occasion I saw the unknown woman whom Albertine had appeared not to recognize, just as Bloch's cousin was passing. Stars came into the young woman's eyes, but it was easy to tell that she did not know the young Israelite damsel. She was seeing her for the first time, had felt desire, little doubt about that, but not at all the same certainty as in respect of Albertine, Albertine on whose camaraderie she must have so much been counting that, faced by her indifference, she had experienced the surprise of a stranger familiar with Paris but who does not live there and who, having returned to spend a few weeks, finds that a bank has gone up on the site of the little theatre where he had been in the habit of spending happy evenings.

Bloch's cousin went and sat at a table, where she looked at a magazine. Soon the young woman came and sat down beside her wearing an absent air. But beneath the table you would soon have been able to see their feet becoming agitated and then their legs and hands, which were merged. Words followed, a conversation got under way, and the young woman's innocent husband, who had been looking for her everywhere, was astonished to find her making plans for that same evening with a girl he did not know. His wife introduced Bloch's cousin to him as a childhood friend, under some unintelligible name, for she had forgotten to ask her what her name was. But the presence of the husband advanced their intimacy by a step, for they addressed one another as tu, having met at the convent, an incident at which they laughed heartily later on, as well as at the deluded husband, with a merriment that was an opportunity for further intimacies.

As for Albertine, I cannot say that anywhere, in the casino or on the beach, her manner towards another girl was too free. I found it in fact excessively distant and insignificant, seeming more like a stratagem intended to deflect suspicion than the effect of a good upbringing. She had a quick, icy, proper way of answering this girl or that in a very loud voice: 'Yes, I'll be going to play tennis around five. I shall have my bathe tomorrow morning around eight,' and at once leaving the person to whom she had just said this, which looked horribly like an attempt to mislead, and either to be arranging a rendezvous, or rather, having arranged one sotto voce, to be saying these, in effect insignificant, words loudly so as not to 'draw attention to herself'. And when next I saw her fetch her bicycle and ride off at top speed, I could not help thinking that she was on her way to join the girl to whom she had barely spoken.

At most, whenever some beautiful young woman got out of a motor-car at the corner of the beach, Albertine could not help looking round. And she would immediately justify herself: 'I was looking at the new flag they've put up in front of the baths. They might have spent a bit more. The other one was pretty moth-eaten. But I really think this one's even shabbier.'

On one occasion, Albertine was not content to remain indifferent, and I was all the more unhappy. She knew it bothered me that she might sometimes meet a friend of her aunt's, who 'had a certain reputation' and sometimes came to spend two or three days with Mme Bontemps. Albertine had been kind enough to tell me she would not acknowledge her. And when this woman came to Incarville, Albertine said: 'By the way, you know she's here. Did anyone tell you?' as if to demonstrate she was not seeing her on the sly. One day as she was saying this, she added: 'Yes, I met her on the beach and on purpose, out of rudeness, I practically brushed against her as I passed, I jostled her.' As Albertine said this there came back into my head some words of Mme Bontemps to which I had never given a second thought, when she had said to Mme Swann in my presence how impudent her niece Albertine was, as if this were a virtue, and how she had told some functionary or other's wife that the latter's father had been a kitchen boy. But a remark made by the woman we love does not preserve its purity for long; it spoils, it goes off. One or two evenings later, Albertine's words came back to me and what they seemed to signify was no longer the bad upbringing that was a source of pride to her – and which could but make me smile – but something else, and that Albertine, perhaps even without any precise object, in order to excite the woman's senses or to remind her mischievously of earlier propositions, accepted perhaps in the old days, had brushed quickly against her, had thought that I had perhaps found out about it, since it had been done in public, and had wanted to forestall an unfavourable interpretation.

But the jealousy caused in me by the women whom Albertine had perhaps loved was in any case about abruptly to cease.

We were, Albertine and I, in front of the Balbec station on the little local railway. We had had ourselves driven there by the hotel omnibus, on account of the weather. Not far away from us was M. Nissim Bernard, who had a black eye. He had recently been unfaithful to the choirboy from Athalie with the boy from quite a thriving farm in the vicinity, 'Aux Cerisiers'. This red-faced boy, with his blunt features, seemed absolutely to have a tomato for a head. An exactly similar tomato served his twin brother for a head. For the disinterested onlooker, what is rather beautiful about these perfect resemblances between two twins is that nature, as if it had been momentarily industrialized, seems to be turning out similar products. M. Nissim Bernard, alas, saw things from a different point of view, and the resemblance was purely external. Tomato No. 2 found frenetic enjoyment in giving delight exclusively to the ladies, tomato No. i was nothing loth to condescend to the tastes of certain gentlemen. Now each time M. Bernard, shaken, as if by a reflex, by the memory of good times spent with tomato No. 1, presented himself at 'Aux Cerisiers', the short-sighted (and short-sightedness was not essential in order to get them confused) old Israelite, unwittingly playing the role of Amphitryon,[37] would address the twin brother and say to him: 'Will you meet me this evening?' He at once received a good 'hiding'. This might even be repeated in the course of the same meal, when he pursued with the one topics started on with the other. Eventually, by an association of ideas, he grew so to dislike tomatoes, even the edible kind, that every time he heard a traveller ordering them next to him at the Grand-Hôtel, he would whisper: 'Forgive me for addressing you without having been introduced, Monsieur. But I heard you ordering tomatoes. They're off today. I tell you this for your own good as it's all one to me, I never eat them.' The stranger would thank this disinterested and philanthropic neighbour effusively, call the waiter back and pretend to be changing his mind: 'No, definitely, no tomatoes.' Aimé, for whom this was a familiar scene, would laugh to himself and think: 'He's a sly old fox, M. Bernard, he's found a way of getting the order changed again.' M. Bernard, as he waited for the tram, which was late, was not keen to greet Albertine and me, on account of his black eye. We were even less keen to speak to him. It would have been almost inevitable, however, if, at that moment, a bicycle had not borne down on us at high speed; from it jumped the 'lift', out of breath. Mme Verdurin had telephoned shortly after our departure to get me to go to dinner in two days' time; it will soon be seen why. Then, having given me the details of this telephone-call, the 'lift' left us and, like those democratic 'employees' who affect independence vis-à-vis the bourgeoisie, and re-establish the principle of authority among themselves, meaning that the hall-porter and the coachman might be displeased were he to be late, he added: 'I'm off on account of my chiefs.'

Albertine's friends had gone off for some time. I wanted to amuse her. Even supposing that she might have derived some happiness from spending the afternoons alone with me, in Balbec, I knew that it never allows itself to be possessed totally and that Albertine, still at that age (which some never pass beyond) when we have yet to discover that this imperfection depends on the one who is experiencing the happiness, not on the one who is giving it, might have been tempted to trace the cause of her disappointment back to me. I preferred that she should impute it to circumstances which, having been arranged by me, would leave no opportunity for our being alone together, while preventing her from remaining in the casino or on the esplanade without me. And so on the day in question I had asked her to go with me to Doncières, where I would be going to visit Saint-Loup. In this same intention of keeping her occupied, I advised painting, which she had learned in the old days. While working, she would not be asking herself whether she was happy or unhappy. I would gladly also have taken her to dine now and again at the Verdurins' or the Cambremers', who would certainly, both of them, have gladly entertained a friend introduced by me, but I first had to be sure that Mme Putbus was not yet at La Raspelière. It was really only on the spot that I could find out, and I knew in advance that in two days' time Albertine would be obliged to go off round about with her aunt, I had taken advantage of this to send a telegram to Mme Verdurin asking whether she could receive me on Wednesday. If Mme Putbus was there, I would contrive to meet her lady's-maid, ascertain whether there was a risk of her coming to Balbec, and in that case find out when, so as to take Albertine well away on the day in question. The little local railway, making a loop that had not existed when I took it with my grandmother, now went through Doncières-la-Goupil, a large station from which important trains left, notably the express by which I had come to visit Saint-Loup from Paris, and had then returned by. Because of the bad weather, the omnibus from the Grand-Hôtel took us, Albertine and me, to the station for the little tram, Balbec-Plage.

The little train was not yet there, but you could see the slow, lazy plume of smoke that it had left behind along the way, and which now, reduced to its own resources as a not very mobile cloud, was slowly climbing the green slopes of the Criquetot cliffs. At last, the little tram, which it had preceded only to then take a vertical direction, arrived in its turn, slowly. The passengers who would be catching it stood aside to give it room, but unhurriedly, knowing that they had to deal with a debonair, almost human stroller which, guided, like the bicycle of a learner, by the indulgent signals of the station-master, and under the powerful tutelage of the engine-driver, was in no danger of running anyone down and would have stopped wherever you wanted.

My telegram explained the Verdurins' telephone-call and it was all the more timely in that Wednesday (the next day but one happened to be a Wednesday) was the day on which Mme Verdurin, at La Raspelière as in Paris, gave a big dinner party, which I had not known. Mme Verdurin did not give 'dinners', but she had 'Wednesdays'. Her Wednesdays were a work of art. While knowing that there was nothing to equal them elsewhere, Mme Verdurin introduced fine distinctions between them. 'This last Wednesday wasn't up to the one before, she would say. But I think the next'll be one of the most successful I've ever given.' She sometimes went so far as to confess: 'This Wednesday wasn't worthy of the others. In return, I've got a big surprise for you for the one after that.' In the final weeks of the season in Paris, before leaving for the country, the Patronne would announce that the Wednesdays were ending. It was an opportunity to spur on the faithful: 'There are only three Wednesdays left, there are only two more, she would say, in the same tone of voice as if the world were about to end. You're not going to let me down next Wednesday for the closure.' But this closure was a sham, for she would warn them: 'Now, officially, there are no more Wednesdays. That was the last for this year. But I shall be here all the same on Wednesdays. We'll have Wednesday amongst ourselves; who knows? these little intimate Wednesdays will perhaps be the pleasantest.' At La Raspelière, the Wednesdays were necessarily restricted, and since, according as some friend had been met with when passing through, and had been invited for one evening or another, almost every day was a Wednesday. 'I don't recall exactly the names of the guests, but I know Mme the Marquise de Camembert is one of them,' the 'lift' had said to me; the memory of our discussions relating to the Cambremers had not succeeded in finally supplanting that of the old word, whose familiar syllables, so full of meaning, had come to the aid of the young employee when he was having trouble with this difficult name, and had been instantly preferred and readopted by him, not out of laziness or as an old, ineradicable usage, but because of the need for logic and clarity that they satisfied.

We made haste to find an empty carriage where I would be able to kiss Albertine all through the journey. Not having found one, we got into a compartment where was already installed a lady with an enormous, ugly, old face, and a mannish expression, very overdressed, who was reading the Revue des Deux Mondes. For all her vulgarity, she was pretentious in her gestures, and I amused myself by wondering to which social category she might belong; I at once concluded that she must be the manageress of some large brothel, a madam on her travels. Her face and mannerisms proclaimed it. I had simply been unaware up until now that such ladies might read the Revue des Deux Mondes. Albertine drew my attention to her, not without winking as she smiled at me. The lady wore an extremely dignified air; and as, on my side, I carried within me the knowledge that I had been invited for the next day, at the terminus of the little railway, to the celebrated Mme Verdurin's, that at an intermediate station Robert de Saint-Loup was waiting for me, and that a little further on I would have given Mme de Cambremer great pleasure by going to stay at Féterne, my eyes sparkled with irony as I contemplated this self-important lady, who seemed to think that, what with her studied attire, the feathers in her hat, and her Revue des Deux Mondes, she was a more considerable personage than myself. I was hoping that this lady would not remain much longer than had M. Nissim Bernard, and that she would at least be getting out at Toutainville, but no. The train stopped at Epreville, she remained sitting. Similarly at Montmartin-sur-Mer, at Parville-la-Bingard, at Incarville, so that in despair, once the train had left Saint-Frichoux, which was the last station before Doncières, I began to twine myself around Albertine without concerning myself with this lady. At Doncières, Saint-Loup had come to wait for me at the station, with the greatest difficulty, he told me, for living as he was at his aunt's, my telegram had only just now reached him and, not having been able to organize his time in advance, he could only devote an hour to me. That hour appeared much too long for me, alas, for no sooner had she alighted from the carriage than Albertine's attention was all for Saint-Loup. She would not talk with me, scarcely answered if I addressed her, pushed me away when I approached. With Robert on the other hand, she laughed her temptress's laugh, talked volubly, played with the dog he had brought, and, in teasing the animal, brushed deliberately against its master. I recalled that on the day when Albertine had let herself be kissed by me for the first time, I had had a smile of gratitude for the unknown seducer who had produced so profound a modification in her and so greatly simplified my task. I thought of him now with horror. Robert must have realized that I was not indifferent to Albertine, for he did not respond to her flirting, which put her in a bad mood with me; then he spoke to me as if I were alone, which, once she had noticed it, made me rise again in her esteem. Robert asked me whether I would not like to try and find, among the friends with whom he had made me dine each evening in Doncières when I was staying there, those who were still there. And since he was inclined himself to the kind of irritating pretentiousness that he disapproved of: 'What was the point of "turning on the charm" for them so persistently if you don't want to meet them again?' I turned down his proposal because I did not want to risk being parted from Albertine, but also because I was now detached from them. From them, that is to say, from myself. We desire passionately that there should be another life in which we would be similar to what we are here below. But we do not reflect that, even without waiting for that other life, but in this one, after a few years, we are unfaithful to what we have been, to what we had wanted to remain immortally. Even without supposing that death might modify us more than the changes that occur in the course of a lifetime, if in that other life we were to meet the self that we have been, we would turn away from ourselves as from those people to whom we have been close but whom we have not seen for a long time – those friends of Saint-Loup's, for example, that I was so pleased to find again every evening at the Faisan Doré but whose conversation I would now find simply out of place and an embarrassment. In this respect, and because I preferred not to go and rediscover what had pleased me there, a walk through Doncières might have seemed to me to prefigure my arrival in paradise. We dream a great deal of paradise, or rather of numerous successive paradises, but they are all, long before we die, paradises lost, in which we would feel lost.

He left us at the station. 'But you may have nearly an hour to wait, he said. If you spend it here you'll no doubt meet my uncle Charlus, who's taking the train to Paris again this afternoon, ten minutes before yours. I've already said my goodbyes to him because I'm obliged to be back before the time of his train. I wasn't able to talk to him about you because I hadn't yet had your telegram.' To the reproaches I directed at Albertine once Saint-Loup had left us, she replied that she had wanted, by her coldness towards me, to erase any ideas he might have chanced to get if, just as the train was stopping, he had seen me leaning against her with my arm around her waist. He had indeed remarked this position (I had not noticed him, otherwise I would have been sitting more correctly at Albertine's side) and had had time to say into my ear: 'So, are these the very stuck-up girls you talked about, who wouldn't associate with Mlle de Stermaria because they didn't like the look of her?' I had indeed told Robert, and in all sincerity, when I went from Paris to visit him in Doncières, and as we were talking again about Balbec, that there was nothing to be done with Albertine, that she was virtue itself. And now that I had long since learned for myself that this was not so, I wanted even more for Robert to believe it was true. It would have been enough for me to tell Robert that I loved Albertine. He was one of those people who are able to deny themselves a pleasure in order to spare their friend sufferings they would experience as if they were their own. 'Yes, she's very childish. But you don't know anything about her? I added anxiously. – Nothing, except that I saw you sat there like two lovers.'

'Your attitude erased nothing at all,' I said to Albertine once Saint-Loup had left us. 'It's true, she said, I was clumsy, I've made you suffer, I'm much more unhappy about that than you. You'll see, I'll never be like that again; forgive me,' she said, holding out her hand to me with a sad expression. At that moment, from the back of the waiting-room in which we were sitting, I saw, followed a little way behind by a porter carrying his bags, M. de Charlus go slowly past.

In Paris, where I encountered him only at soirées, motionless, tightly buttoned into his evening dress, maintained in the vertical position by a haughty straightening of his back, the impulse to attract and the rocket flight of his conversation, I had not realized to what extent he had aged. Now, in a light-coloured travelling suit that made him look fatter, waddling as he walked, swinging a belly that was becoming a paunch and an almost symbolic behind, the cruelty of the broad daylight had broken down, into rouge on his lips, into rice powder fixed by cold cream on the tip of his nose, into black on the dyed moustaches whose ebony colour contrasted with his greying hair, everything that in an artificial light would have seemed to be enlivening the complexion of someone still young.

Even as I talked with him, only briefly, because of his train, I was looking at Albertine's carriage so as to signal to her that I was coming. When I turned back towards M. de Charlus, he asked me to be good enough to call over a soldier, a relation of his, who was on the other side of the line exactly as if he were going to get into our train, but in the opposite direction, that leading away from Balbec. 'He's in the regimental band, M. de Charlus said. Since you have the good fortune to be young enough, and I the nuisance of being old enough, for you to be able to spare me crossing all the way over there…' I made it my duty to go towards the soldier indicated and could see, indeed, from the lyres sewn on to his collar, that he was a bandsman. But how great was my surprise, and I may say my pleasure, when, just as I was about to discharge my commission, I recognized Morel, the son of my uncle's valet, who brought back so many memories! I forgot to carry out M. de Charlus's commission. 'What, are you in Doncières? – Yes, and I've been incorporated in the band, in the percussion.' But he answered me in a curt, haughty tone. He had become a real 'poseur' and the sight of me, reminding him as it did of his father's profession, was obviously disagreeable to him. I suddenly saw M. de Charlus bearing down on us. The delay had evidently made him impatient. 'I'd like to hear a bit of music this evening, he said to Morel, without any preamble, I'll give 500 francs for the evening, that might be of some interest to one of your friends, if you have any in the band.' For all that I was familiar with M. de Charlus' insolence, I was amazed that he should not even have greeted his young friend. The Baron left me no time for reflection, in any case. Holding out his hand affectionately: 'Au revoir, dear boy,' he said, to signify that all that remained was to go. I had in any case left my dear Albertine on her own for quite long enough. 'You know, I said to her, as we got back into the carriage, the life of a resort and the life of travel make me realize that the theatre of the world has fewer sets at its disposal than actors and fewer actors than "situations". – For what reason do you say that? – Because M. de Charlus has just asked me to send one of his friends to him who, at this very instant, on the platform of the station here, I've just recognized as a friend of mine, too.' But even as I said this, I was trying to think how the Baron might have met Morel. The social disproportion, which I had not at first considered, was too vast. My first idea was that it had been through Jupien, whose daughter, it will be remembered, had seemed very taken with the violinist. What had amazed me, however, was that, having to leave for Paris in five minutes, the Baron should have asked to hear some music in Doncières. But seeing Jupien's daughter again in my memory, I was beginning to think that 'recognitions', a lame expedient in works of artifice, might on the contrary express an important element in real life, were we able to attain to the true romance of it, when I had a sudden flash of inspiration and realized I had been very naïve. M. de Charlus had never in his life met Morel, nor Morel M. de Charlus, who, dazzled but also intimidated by a soldier, even by one wearing only lyres, had, in his agitation, commandeered me to bring him someone he had not suspected that I knew. At all events, the offer of five hundred francs must have made up in Morel's case for the absence of any previous connection, for I could see them continuing to talk without reflecting that they were next to our tramcar. And recalling the manner in which M. de Charlus had come towards Morel and me, I seized on the resemblance to certain of his kinsmen when they picked up women in the street. The intended target had simply changed sex. After a certain age, and even if our inner development varies, the more we become ourselves, the more are family characteristics accentuated. For, while maintaining the harmonious design of its tapestry, Nature breaks up the monotony of the composition by the variety in the faces that it inserts. Moreover, the hauteur with which M. de Charlus had looked the violinist up and down is relative, according to the vantage point we adopt. It would have been recognized by three out of four society people, who bowed to him, but not by the chief of police, who, a few years later, was to put him under surveillance.

'The Paris train is signalled, Monsieur,' said the porter who was carrying the bags. 'But I'm not catching the train, put all that in the cloakroom, confound it!' said M. de Charlus, giving the porter twenty francs, who was stupefied by this volte-face but enchanted by the tip. Such generosity at once attracted a flower-seller. 'Buy my carnations, see, this beautiful rose, mon bon Monsieur, it'll bring you good luck.' M. de Charlus, growing impatient, handed her forty sous, in exchange for which the woman offered him her blessing and once again her flowers. 'God, if only she'd leave us alone,' said M. de Charlus, addressing himself in an ironic, complaining tone, like a man all on edge, to Morel, in appealing to whom for support he found a certain comfort. 'What we have to say is rather complicated as it is.' Perhaps, the railwayman not yet being too far away, M. de Charlus was not keen to have a large audience, or perhaps these parenthetical words allowed his haughty timidity not to broach the request for a rendezvous too directly. The musician, turning with a frank, imperative and resolute air towards the flower-seller, raised a palm towards her which thrust her away and signified that they did not want any of her flowers and that she should remove herself forthwith. M. de Charlus was in ecstasies at the sight of this virile, authoritative gesture, executed by the graceful hand for which it should as yet have been too heavy, too massively brutal, with a precocious firmness and suppleness that lent this as yet beardless adolescent the air of a young David capable of engaging Goliath in combat. Mixed involuntarily in with the Baron's admiration was the smile that we experience on seeing an expression on the face of a child that is too solemn for its years. 'Here's someone I'd like to be accompanied by on my travels and helped by in my business affairs. How he would simplify my life!' M. de Charlus said to himself.

The Paris train (which the Baron did not take) left. Then Albertine and I got into ours, without my knowing what had become of M. de Charlus and Morel. 'We mustn't ever be angry any more, I ask you to forgive me once again, Albertine repeated, referring to the Saint-Loup incident. We must always both be kind, she said fondly. As for your friend Saint-Loup, if you think he interests me in the very slightest, you're quite wrong. The one thing that attracts me about him is that he seems to be so fond of you. – He's a very good fellow,' I said, carefully avoiding lending Robert any imaginary superior qualities, as I should not have failed to do, out of friendship for him, had I been with anyone other than Albertine. 'He's an excellent person, open, devoted, loyal, whom you can rely on for everything.' In saying this, restrained by my jealousy, I was confining myself to speaking the truth about Saint-Loup, but it was certainly the truth that I spoke. But it had been expressed in exactly the same terms as Mme de Villeparisis had employed in talking to me of him, when I did not as yet know him, imagined him to be very different, very haughty, and used to tell myself: 'People think him kind because he's a great nobleman.' Similarly, when she had said to me, 'He'd be so pleased', I imagined, having caught sight of him in front of the hotel, ready to drive off, that his aunt's words were a mere social commonplace, intended to flatter me. But I had then realized that she had spoken sincerely, thinking of what interested me, of my reading, and because she knew that that was what Saint-Loup liked, just as I was to have occasion to say sincerely to someone who was writing a history of his ancestor, La Rochefoucauld, the author of the Maxims,[38] and who would have liked to approach Robert for his advice, 'He'll be so pleased.' The fact was that I had learned to know him. But on meeting him that first time, I had not believed that an intelligence akin to my own could be swathed in so much outward elegance of dress and attitude. From his plumage, I had adjudged him to be from another species. It was Albertine now who, partly perhaps because Saint-Loup, out of kindness for me, had been so distant with her, said what I had once thought: 'Oh, he's as devoted as that! I notice people always discover all the virtues in the people who come from the Faubourg Saint-Germain.' Now, that Saint-Loup was from the Faubourg Saint-Germain was something that had not once crossed my mind during those years when, divesting himself of his prestige, he had displayed his virtues to me. A change of perspective from which to regard people, already more striking in friendship than in any mere social connection, but how much more so still in love, when desire sets the first signs of indifference on so vast a scale, magnifies them to such proportions, that it had taken a lot less than that shown at the outset by Saint-Loup to make me believe myself scorned at first by Albertine, to imagine her girl-friends to be wonderfully inhuman creatures, and to put Elstir's verdict down, when he said of the little gang, altogether in the same spirit as Mme de Villeparisis of Saint-Loup, 'They're good girls', simply to the indulgence we feel towards beauty and a certain elegance. And was this not the verdict I would gladly have delivered when I heard Albertine say: 'Anyway, devoted or no, I hope very much not to meet him again, because he led to us quarrelling. We mustn't ever be angry again, the two of us. It's not nice'? Because she had seemed to feel desire for Saint-Loup, I felt more or less cured for some time of the idea that she loved women, which I imagined to be incompatible. And confronted by Albertine's rubber waterproof, in which she seemed to have become another person, the indefatigable wanderer of rainy days, and which, close-fitting, malleable and grey at that moment, seemed less to be to protect her clothes against the water than to have been soaked by her and to have been attached to my loved one's body in order to take an impression of her forms for a sculptor, I snatched at this tunic that was jealously moulding a longed-for bosom, and drawing Albertine to me:

Rêver sur mon épaule en y posant ton front?[39]

I said, taking her head in my hands and pointing to the great silent, flooded meadows, stretching all the way in the gathering dusk to a horizon closed off by the parallel ranges of distant, blue-coloured foothills.

Two days later, on the famous Wednesday, on the same little railway I had just taken in Balbec, to go and dine at La Raspelière, I was very anxious not to miss Cottard in Graincourt-Saint-Vast, where a fresh telephone-call from Mme Verdurin had told me I should find him. He was to get on to my train and indicate where we needed to get off in order to find the carriages that were sent from La Raspelière to the station. And so, the little train stopping only for a moment at Graincourt, the first station after Doncières, I had stationed myself at the door ahead of time, so afraid was I of not seeing Cottard or of not being seen by him. Fears that proved quite baseless! I had not appreciated the extent to which, the little clan having shaped all the 'regulars' to the same pattern, they, wearing full evening dress for good measure, were instantly recognizable as they waited on the platform by a certain air of self-assurance, elegance and familiarity, and by glances that passed, as though over an empty space where there is nothing to stay the attention, over the serried ranks of the common herd, watching for the arrival of some regular who had caught the train at a preceding station, and were already bubbling with the conversation to come. This sign of election, with which the habit of dining together had stamped the members of the little group, did not mark them out only when numbers of them were massed there in force, forming a more brilliant patch of colour in the midst of the flock of travellers – what Brichot called the 'pecus'[40] – on whose lacklustre faces there could not be read any notion relating to the Verdurins, any hope of ever dining at La Raspelière. Moreover, these common travellers would have been less interested than I was, had – despite the notoriety some had acquired – they heard spoken the names of those faithful whom I was surprised to find continuing to dine out, when several had already been doing so, according to the accounts I had heard, before I was born, in an epoch both sufficiently distant and sufficiently vague for me to be tempted to exaggerate its remoteness. The contrast between their continuing, not merely to exist but to be in the fullness of their vigour, and the annihilation of so many friends whom I had already seen depart at one time or another, produced in me the same feeling that we experience when, in the 'Late News' column of the newspapers, we read the very report we had least expected, that of a premature death, for example, which seems fortuitous because the causes of which it is the outcome were not known to us. The sense we get is that death does not come to all men uniformly, but that a more advanced wave from its tragic tide, as it rises, carries off an existence situated at the same level as others that will yet long be spared by the waves that follow. We shall see, moreover, later on, the diversity of the deaths which circulate invisibly to be the source of that particular unexpectedness represented, in newspapers, by the obituaries. Then I saw that, with time, not only do real gifts, which may co-exist with the worst vulgarities in conversation, reveal and impose themselves, but also that second-rate individuals attain to those high positions that belong in our childhood imaginings to a few celebrated old men, without reflecting that a certain number of years later their disciples would be celebrated also, having become masters, and inspire the same respect and fear which they had felt in the old days. But if the names of the faithful were not known to them, their appearance attracted the stares of the 'pecus'. Even in the train (once the accident of what one or other of them had had to do during the day had brought them all together there), having only one more isolated member to pick up at the next station, the carriage in which they found themselves gathered, indicated by the elbow of Ski, the sculptor, and bedecked with Cottard's copy of Le Temps, blossomed in the distance like a de luxe carriage and, at the station appointed, rallied their laggard comrade. The only one whom these promissory signs may have eluded, half blind as he was, was Brichot. But one of the regulars had gladly taken on the duties of lookout on behalf of the blind man and the moment they caught sight of his straw-hat, his green umbrella and his blue spectacles, they steered him gently but hurriedly towards the compartment of election. So that it was unheard-of for one of the faithful, short of exciting the gravest suspicions of being on the razzle, or even of not having come 'by the train', not to meet up with the others along the way. On occasions, the opposite occurred: one of the faithful had had to go some distance during the afternoon and had in consequence to effect part of the journey on his own before being joined by the group; but even in isolation like this, alone of his kind, he did not fail most often to produce an effect. The Future for which he was making singled him out to the person sitting on the seat opposite, who said to himself, 'He must be somebody', and with the obscure perspicacity of the travellers to Emmaus[41] could discern, whether around Cottard's soft hat or Ski the sculptor, a vague halo, and was only half surprised when, at the next station, a fashionable crowd, if it was their final stop, welcomed this member of the faithful at the carriage-door and went off with him towards one of the carriages that were waiting, all bowed very low to by the Douville porter, or else, if it were an intermediate station, invaded the compartment. Which is what, precipitately, for several had arrived late, just as the train, already in the station, was about to leave again, the troop did that Cottard led at the double towards the carriage at whose window he had seen my signals. Brichot, who was among the faithful in question, had become more so in the course of the same years that had seen the assiduity of others diminish. His progressively failing eyesight had obliged him, even in Paris, to do less and less work in the evenings. Moreover, he had little sympathy with the New Sorbonne, where German-style notions of scientific accuracy were beginning to prevail over humanism.[42] He confined himself exclusively now to his lectures and to examination juries; thus he had far more time to give to his social life, that is to soirées at the Verdurins', or those given now and again for the Verdurins by one or other of the faithful, quaking with emotion. It is true that on two occasions love had nearly achieved what his work could not: detach Brichot from the little clan. But Mme Verdurin, who 'kept a weather eye open for squalls' and, what was more, having acquired the habit for the sake of her salon, had finally come to find a disinterested pleasure in these kinds of drama and executions, had turned him irremediably against the dangerous person, knowing, as she put it, how to 'keep everything shipshape' and to 'apply the cauterizing iron to the wound'. This had been all the simpler for her in the case of one of these dangerous persons as it was only Brichot's washerwoman, and Mme Verdurin, who had free access to the Professor's fifth-floor rooms, he blushing scarlet with pride whenever she deigned to undertake the climb, had merely had to show this worthless woman the door. 'What, the Patronne had said to Brichot, a woman like me does you the honour of coming up here, and you entertain a creature like that?' Brichot had never forgotten the service Mme Verdurin had rendered him by preventing his old age from sinking into the mire, and had become increasingly attached to her, whereas, in contrast to this renewal of affection and perhaps on account of it, the Patronne had begun to feel dislike for one of the faithful who was far too docile and of whose obedience she could be certain in advance. But from his intimacy with the Verdurins Brichot derived a prestige that marked him out among all his colleagues at the Sorbonne. They were dazzled by the accounts he gave them of dinner-parties to which they would never be invited, by the mention made of him, in reviews, or by the portrait exhibited at the Salon, by one or other renowned writer or painter, whose talents were held in high esteem by the holders of the other chairs in the Faculty of Letters but whose attention they had no chance of attracting, and finally by the very elegance of dress of the worldly philosopher, an elegance that they had mistaken at first for casualness until such time as their colleague kindly explained to them that the top hat gladly allows itself to be put down on the floor in the course of a visit, and is not worn for dinners in the country, however smart, where it must be replaced by a soft hat, which looks very well with a dinner-jacket. During the first moments of the little group's being engulfed by the carriage, I was not even able to speak to Cottard, for he was choking, less from having run so as not to miss the train, as from amazement at having cut it so fine. More than joy at a triumph, he was experiencing the hilarity almost of a merry prank. 'Oh, that was a good one! he said, once he had recovered himself. Another few seconds, upon my word, that's what they call arriving on the dot!' he added with a wink, not in order to ask whether the expression was correct, for these days he oozed self-assurance, but out of self-satisfaction. Finally he was able to name me to the other members of the little clan. I was annoyed to see that they were almost all of them dressed in what in Paris is called a smoking. I had forgotten that the Verdurins had begun timidly to evolve in the direction of society, an evolution slowed by the Dreyfus Affair, but accelerated by the 'new' music, if one which they themselves denied, and would continue to deny until it had come to fruition, like those military objectives which a general announces only once he has attained them, in such a way as not to appear to have suffered a defeat if he fails. For its part, moreover, the world was quite prepared to move towards them. As yet, it looked on them as people to whom no one from society went, but who did not thereby feel any regret. The Verdurin salon passed for a temple of music. It was there, you were assured, that Vinteuil had found inspiration and encouragement. Now, if Vinteuil's sonata remained wholly misunderstood and more or less unknown, his name, spoken as that of the greatest of contemporary musicians, exerted an extraordinary prestige. Indeed, certain young men from the Faubourg having made up their minds to be as well-informed as the bourgeoisie, three of their number had learned music and among these Vinteuil's sonata enjoyed a huge reputation. Having returned home, they spoke of it to the intelligent mother who had urged them on to cultivate themselves. And having taken an interest in their sons' studies, at concerts the mothers would gaze with a certain respect at Mme Verdurin, who was following the score from her front box. Up until now, this latent society-mindedness on the Verdurins' part had betrayed itself by two actions only. On the one hand, Mme Verdurin had said of the Princesse de Caprarola,[43] 'Ah, she's intelligent, that one, she's an agreeable woman. What I can't stand are the imbeciles, the people who bore me, they drive me crazy.' Which would have given anyone in the least discerning to think that the Princesse de Caprarola, a woman of the very highest society, had paid a call on Mme Verdurin. She had even uttered her name in the course of a visit of condolences she had made to Mme Swann after the death of the latter's husband, and had asked her whether she knew them. 'How did you say? Odette had replied, suddenly looking sad. – Verdurin. – Oh, then I know! she went on, desolately, I don't know them, or rather I know of them without having met them, they're people I saw once at some friends' a long time ago, they're agreeable.' The Princesse de Caprarola having left, Odette would very much have liked simply to have told the truth. But her instant falsehood was not the product of calculation, but the revelation of her fears and of her desires. She had denied not what it would have been astute to deny, but what she would have wished was not the case, even if her interlocutor was to learn within the hour that it was indeed the case. Not long afterwards she had regained her self-confidence and had even pre-empted questions by saying, so as not to appear to fear them: 'Mme Verdurin, why, I knew her terrifically well,' with an affectation of humility, like a great lady recounting how she has taken the tram. 'The Verdurins have been much spoken of just lately,' said Mme de Souvré. Odette, with the disdainful smile of a duchess, replied: 'Oh yes, indeed, I fancy they're much spoken of. From time to time you get new people like that who arrive in society,' without reflecting that she herself was one of the newest. 'The Princesse de Caprarola has dined there, Mme de Souvré went on. – Ah! replied Odette, accentuating her smile, that doesn't surprise me. It's always through the Princesse de Caprarola that these things start, then another one comes along, the Comtesse Molé, for example.' In saying this, Odette appeared to have a profound disdain for the two great ladies who were in the habit of being the earliest occupants of the newly opened salons. You sensed by her tone that this meant that they would never manage to get her, Odette, like Mme de Souvré, aboard any such ship of fools as that.

Following Mme Verdurin's admission as to the Princesse de Caprarola's intelligence, the second sign that the Verdurins were conscious of their future destiny was that they hoped very much that (without having requested it formally, of course) people should now wear evening dress when coming to dinner; M. Verdurin might now have been greeted without shame by his nephew, the one who was 'in queer street'.

Among those who got into my carriage at Graincourt was Saniette, who had been driven out from the Verdurins' in the old days by his cousin Forcheville, but had returned. His defects, where his social life was concerned, had once been – for all his superior qualities – somewhat of the same kind as those of Cottard, shyness, a desire to please, and fruitless attempts to manage to do so. But if life had led Cottard to wear, if not at the Verdurins', where he had, thanks to the influence that past times exert over us when we find ourselves in an accustomed setting, remained much the same, then at least among his patients, when on duty at the hospital or at the Academy of Medicine, an exterior of coldness, disdain and solemnity that was accentuated while he was coming out with his puns in front of his indulgent pupils, and had dug a veritable chasm between the present Cottard and the old one, the same defects had on the contrary become exaggerated in Saniette, even as he sought to correct them. Sensing that he was often boring, that he was not listened to, instead of then slowing down as Cottard would have done, and compelling their attention by an air of authority, not only did he attempt, by a playful tone, to apologize for the too serious turn of his conversation, but he hurried his delivery, ignored all but the gist, used abbreviations so as to seem less long-winded and more familiar with the things he was talking about and, by rendering these unintelligible, merely succeeded in seeming interminable. His self-assurance was not like that of Cottard, which caused his patients to freeze, who, to the people who acclaimed his amenableness in company, would answer: 'He's not the same man any more when he receives you in his consulting-room, you in the light, he with his back to it, with those piercing eyes.' It did not impose itself, you felt it was masking too much self-consciousness, that the least thing would be enough to put it to flight. Saniette, whose friends had always told him he had too little belief in himself, and who indeed saw people whom he rightly regarded as very inferior obtaining with ease the successes that were denied to him, could no longer start on a story without smiling at its drollery, for fear that a serious expression might sell his wares short. At times, lending credence to the humour he himself appeared to find in what he was about to say, they granted him the favour of a general silence. But the story would fall flat. A kind-hearted guest would sometimes slip Saniette the private, almost secret encouragement of a smile of approval, conveying it to him furtively, without attracting attention, as someone slips you a note. But no one went so far as to assume the responsibility, to risk the public adherence, of laughing out loud. Long after the story had finished, and fallen flat, the dejected Saniette alone remained smiling to himself, as if enjoying, alone, the delectation in it that he pretended to find sufficient and which the others had not felt. As for the sculptor Ski, so called because of the difficulty they found in pronouncing his Polish name, and because he himself, since he had been living in a certain society, had affected not to wish to be confused with relations who were very well placed but somewhat boring and very numerous, he, aged forty-five and extremely ugly, had a sort of impishness, of dreamy whimsicality, that he had preserved from having been, up until the age often, the most ravishing child prodigy in the world, the apple of every lady's eye. Mme Verdurin claimed he was more artistic than Elstir. Any resemblance he bore to the latter was purely external, however. It was sufficient for Elstir, who had met Ski on one occasion, to feel for him that profound repulsion that is inspired in us, even more than by those people who are our complete opposites, by those who resemble us only on our worst side, in whom are displayed what is least good about us, the faults which we have cured, unfortunate reminders to us of how we may have appeared to some before we became what we are. But Mme Verdurin believed that Ski had more temperament than Elstir because there was no art for which he did not have an aptitude, and she was convinced that he might have developed that aptitude into a talent had he had less laziness. This last even seemed to the Patronne to be one more gift, being the opposite of hard work, which she thought was the lot of those without genius. Ski would paint anything you wished, on cuff links or on the tops of doors. He sang with the voice of a composer, and played from memory, giving an imitation of an orchestra at the piano, less by his virtuosity than by the false bass notes that signified his fingers' inability to indicate that at this point there was a cornet, which he imitated in any case with his mouth. Searching for words as he spoke, to make people believe in an interesting impression, in the same way as he would hold back a chord and then strike it, saying 'ping', to make the brass section sound, he passed for being wonderfully intelligent, but in point of fact his ideas amounted to two or three, very limited ones. Annoyed by his reputation as a fantasist, he had taken it into his head to demonstrate that he was a practical, positive person, whence a triumphant affectation in him of false precision and false good sense, made worse by the fact that he had no memory and that his information was always inaccurate. The movements of his head, his neck and his legs might have been graceful had he still been nine years old, with blond curls, a big lace collar and little red leather boots. Having arrived ahead of time with Cottard and Brichot at the station in Graincourt, they had left Brichot in the waiting-room and gone to take a stroll. When Cottard had wanted to go back, Ski had replied: 'But there's no rush. It's not the local train today, but the departmental train.' Overjoyed at observing the effect that this pedantic nuance produced in Cottard, he added, speaking of himself: 'Yes, because Ski loves the arts, because he models in clay, people think he isn't practical. Nobody knows this line better than I.' Nevertheless, they were on their way back to the station, when suddenly, catching sight of the smoke of the little train as it arrived, Cottard let out a cry and shouted: 'We'll have to run like the very devil.' They had in fact arrived just in time, the distinction between the local and the departmental trains having ever existed only in Ski's head. 'But isn't the Princesse on the train?' asked Brichot in a quavering voice, whose enormous spectacles, resplendent like the reflectors that laryngologists attach to their foreheads to shine down their patients' throats, seemed to have borrowed their vitality from the professor's eyes and, perhaps because of the effort he was making to adjust his vision to them, seemed, even at the most insignificant moments, to be themselves gazing with a sustained attention and an extraordinary fixity. Moreover, by gradually depriving Brichot of his sight, his illness had revealed to him the beauties of this sense, just as we often need to have decided to part with an object, by making a present of it for example, to look at it, to miss it and to admire it. 'No, no, the Princesse has gone to take some of Mme Verdurin's guests back to Maineville, who were catching the Paris train. It's not impossible even that Mme Verdurin, who had things to do in Saint-Mars, went with her! In that case she'd be travelling with us and we'd all be doing the journey together, it'd be delightful. The thing is to keep an eye open at Maineville, and the right one! Ah well, never mind, we very nearly missed the boat and no mistake. When I saw the train, I was thunderstruck. That's what they call arriving at the psychological moment. If we'd missed the train, you know, if Mme Verdurin saw the carriages coming back without us, picture the scene! added the doctor, who was not yet recovered from his agitation. That was no ordinary escapade. I say, Brichot, what d'you think of our little adventure? asked the Doctor with a certain pride. – My word, replied Brichot, yes indeed, if you hadn't found the train still there, as the late Villemain[44] would have said, that would have put the lid on things!' But I, distracted from the very start by these people whom I did not know, I recalled all of a sudden what Cottard had said to me in the ballroom of the little casino, and as if an invisible chain had managed to connect an organ to the pictures in my memory, that of Albertine leaning her breasts against those of Andrée gave me a terrible pain in my heart. The pain did not last; the idea of Albertine's possible relations with women no longer seemed possible since two days earlier, when the advances my friend had made to Saint-Loup had excited a new jealousy in me which had caused me to forget the earlier one. I had the innocence of those people who believe that one taste necessarily excludes another. At Arembouville, as the tram was crowded, a farmer in a blue smock, who had only a third-class ticket, got into our compartment. The Doctor, adjudging that the Princesse could not be allowed to travel with him, summoned a porter, displayed his card as doctor to one of the great railway companies, and forced the station-master to make the farmer get out. This scene so pained the kind heart and alarmed the timidity of Saniette that the moment he saw it start, fearful already, because of the number of country people there were on the platform, that it might take on the dimensions of a peasants' revolt, he feigned a stomach-ache and, in order not to be accused of having some share in the Doctor's violence, he slipped into the corridor on the pretence of looking for what Cottard called the 'W C'. Not finding one, he gazed at the countryside from the other end of the 'slowcoach'. 'If this is your first time at Mme Verdurin's, Monsieur, Brichot said to me, anxious to show off his talents to a "newcomer", you'll find there's no circle where you get a stronger sense of "douceur de vivre", in the words of the inventors of dilettantism, of couldn't-care-less-ism, of a lot of words in "ism" fashionable among our jumped-up shop-girls, I refer to M. le Prince de Talleyrand.'[45] For when he spoke of these great noblemen from the past, he thought it was witty and lent 'period colour' to put Monsieur in front of their title, and would say Monsieur le Duc de La Rochefoucauld, or Monsieur le Cardinal de Retz, whom he also called from time to time 'That "struggle-for-lifer" de Gondi, that "boulangiste" de Marcillac.'[46] And he never failed to call Montesquieu, with a smile, 'Monsieur le Président Secondat de Montesquieu.' A clever man of the world would have been irritated by this pedantry, which smelt of the schools. But there is pedantry, too, in the perfect manners of the man of the world, revealing of another caste, that in which, when speaking of a prince, they put 'the Emperor' in front of the name of William,[47] and talk to a Royal Highness in the third person. 'Ah, to him we must take off our hats, Brichot went on, alluding to "Monsieur le Prince de Talleyrand". He's an ancestor. – It's a delightful circle, Cottard said to me, you'll find a bit of everything, for Mme Verdurin is not exclusive: illustrious scholars like Brichot, the high nobility like, for example, the Princesse Sherbatoff, a great Russian lady, a friend of the Grand-Duchesse Eudoxie, who even visits her alone, at the times when no one is admitted.' The Grand-Duchesse Eudoxie indeed, not caring that the Princesse Sherbatoff, who had not been received by anyone for a long time past, should come to her when she might have people there, only let her come very early in the day, when Her Highness had none of the friends with her for whom it would have been as disagreeable to encounter the Princesse as it would have been embarrassing for the latter. As, for the last three years, immediately after leaving, like a manicurist, the Grand-Duchesse, Mme Sherbatoff had gone off to Mme Verdurin's, who had only just woken up, and did not leave her again, it could be said that the Princesse's loyalty infinitely exceeded that of Brichot even, assiduous though he was at the Wednesdays, where he had the pleasure of believing himself, in Paris, to be a sort of Chateaubriand at l'Abbaye-aux-Bois[48] and where, in the country, he got the impression of having become the equivalent of what the man whom he always called (with the mischievous satisfaction of the literary man) 'M. de Voltaire' may have been for Mme de Châtelet.[49]

The absence of connections had enabled the Princesse Sherbatoff to display a fidelity to the Verdurins in recent years that made her more than an ordinary member of the 'faithful', but the very type, the ideal that Mme Verdurin had long believed was inaccessible and which, having reached the change of life, she had at last found made flesh in this new female recruit. However much the Patronne might be racked by jealousy, it was unprecedented for even the most assiduous of the faithful not to have 'defaulted' once. The most stay-at-home had let themselves be tempted by a journey; the most continent had had an amorous adventure; the most robust may have caught 'flu, the idlest been trapped by their twenty-eight days, the most indifferent gone to close the eyes of their dying mother. And it was in vain that Mme Verdurin would then say to them, like the Roman empress,[50] that she was the one general whom her legion must obey, like Christ or the Kaiser,[51] that whoever loved his father and mother as much as her but was not prepared to leave them in order to follow her, was unworthy of her, that instead of growing weak in bed or letting themselves be made a fool of by a whore, they would do better to remain close to her, she, their one remedy and their one delight. But destiny, which is sometimes pleased to embellish the conclusion of lives that are long-drawn-out, had caused Mme Verdurin to meet the Princesse Sherbatoff. Having quarrelled with her family, an exile from her homeland, no longer knowing anyone except the Baronne Putbus and the Grande-Duchesse Eudoxie, to whom, because she had no wish to meet the women friends of the first, and because the second had no wish for her women friends to meet the Princesse, she went only at those morning hours when Mme Verdurin was still asleep, not recalling having kept to her room on a single occasion since the age of twelve, when she had had measles, and having replied on the 31st of December to Mme Verdurin who, concerned at being on her own, had asked her without warning whether she could not stay overnight, despite New Year's Day: 'But what would be able to stop me, no matter what day it is? Moreover, that's a day when we remain en famille and you are my family', living in a pension and swapping whenever the Verdurins moved house, following them on their holidays in the country, the Princesse was, for Mme Verdurin, so much the embodiment of Vigny's line:

> Toi seule me parus ce qu 'on cherche toujours[52]

that the lady president of the little club, desirous of securing one of the 'faithful' even unto death, had asked her that whichever of them was the last to die should have herself buried next to the other. Before strangers – among whom must always be counted that stranger to whom we lie the most because it is by them that it would be most painful to be despised: ourselves – the Princesse Sherbatoff took care to represent her only three friendships – with the Grande-Duchesse, with the Verdurins and with Mme Putbus – as the only ones, not that cataclysms independent of her will had allowed to emerge amidst the destruction of all the rest, but which a free choice had caused her to elect in preference to any other, and to which a certain liking for solitude and simplicity had led her to confine herself. 'I see no one else,' she would say, stressing the inflexible character of what had the appearance more of a self-imposed rule than a necessity to be endured. She would add: 'I frequent only three houses', like those authors who, afraid of being unable to stretch to a fourth, announce that their play will have only three performances. Whether or not M. and Mme Verdurin lent credence to this figment, they had helped the Princesse to instil it into the minds of the faithful. And the latter were persuaded both that the Princesse, out of the thousands of connections available to her, had chosen the Verdurins alone, and that the Verdurins, solicited in vain by the whole of the upper aristocracy, had consented to make only one exception, in favour of the Princesse.

As they saw it, the Princesse, too superior to her original milieu not to be bored there, and out of all the people with whom she might have associated, had found the Verdurins alone to be agreeable, and the latter in return, deaf to the overtures of the whole aristocracy that had been offering itself to them, had consented to make only one exception, in favour of a great lady more intelligent than her peers, the Princesse Sherbatoff.

The Princesse was very rich; at every first night she had a large ground-floor box, to which, authorized by Mme Verdurin, she took the faithful and never anyone else. People would point out this pale, enigmatic figure who had aged without turning white, but rather had gone red, like certain long-lasting, shrivelled fruit in the hedgerows. They admired both her influence and her humility, for though always having with her an Academician, Brichot, a celebrated scholar, Cottard, the leading pianist of the day, and later on M. de Charlus, she still did her best to book the gloomiest baignoire, and remained at the back, paying no attention to the auditorium but living exclusively for the little group, who, a little before the end of the performance, would withdraw, in the train of this strange sovereign, who was not without possessing a shy, fascinating, worn-out beauty. But, if Mme Sherbatoff did not look at the auditorium, and remained in the shadows, it was in order to try to forget that there existed a living world that she desired passionately, but was unable to get to know; the 'coterie' in a baignoire was for her what their almost corpse-like stillness is for certain animals in the presence of danger. Nonetheless, the taste for novelty and for curiosity which exercises society people meant that they perhaps lent greater attention to this mysterious stranger than to the celebrities in the front boxes on whom everyone came calling. They imagined her to be other than the people whom they knew, that a wonderful intelligence, allied to a clairvoyant goodness, had retained this small circle of the eminent around her. Were someone's name to be mentioned, or someone introduced to her, the Princesse was forced to feign a great indifference so as to keep up the fiction of her horror of society. Nonetheless, with the support of Cottard or of Mme Verdurin, a few newcomers succeeded in meeting her, and her euphoria at meeting one of them was such that she forgot the fable of her voluntary isolation and lavished attention on this new arrival. If he were a nonentity, everyone was astonished. 'What a peculiar thing, that the Princesse, who refuses to meet anybody, should go and make an exception for someone so out of keeping!' But these fertilizing acquaintances were rare, and the Princesse lived strictly confined in the midst of the faithful.

Cottard was far more inclined to say, 'I'll see him on Wednesday at the Verdurins,' than 'I'll see him on Tuesday at the Academy.' He spoke also of the Wednesdays as of an occupation just as important and just as ineluctable. Cottard, moreover, was one of these little-sought-after people who make it an imperious duty to accept an invitation as though it constituted an order, like a military or judicial summons. He needed to be called out on a truly important visit for him to 'default' from the Verdurins on a Wednesday, its importance having more to do, moreover, with the status of the sick person than the seriousness of their condition. For Cottard, kindly man though he was, would renounce the comforts of a Wednesday, not for a workman who had had a stroke, but for the head-cold of a minister. Even in this last instance he would say to his wife: 'Make my sincere apologies to Mme Verdurin. Warn her I'll be late getting there. His Excellency might well have picked another day to catch cold.' One Wednesday, their elderly cook having cut the vein in her arm, Cottard, already in a dinner-jacket in order to go to the Verdurins, had given a shrug when his wife timidly asked him whether he could not dress the wound: 'But I can't, Léontine, he had exclaimed with a groan, you can see I've got my white waistcoat on.' So as not to provoke her husband, Mme Cottard had sent post-haste for the chef de clinique. The latter, in order to save time, had taken a cab, with the result that, his carriage entering the courtyard at the same moment as that of Cottard was about to leave to take him to the Verdurins, they had wasted five minutes advancing and retreating. Mme Cottard was embarrassed that the chef de clinique should have seen her lord and master in his evening clothes. Cottard had cursed at the delay, perhaps out of remorse, and left in an execrable temper that it required all the pleasures of a Wednesday finally to dispel.

Were a patient to ask Cottard: 'Do you sometimes come across the Guermantes?' it was in the best of good faith that the Professor would reply: 'Perhaps not the Guermantes exactly, I don't know. But I meet all those sorts of people at some friends of mine. You've certainly heard speak of the Verdurins. They know everybody. And they at least aren't smart folk who've gone down in the world. There's money there all right. Mme Verdurin's generally reckoned to have thirty-five million. I mean, that's a tidy sum, thirty-five million. So she doesn't do things by halves. You mentioned the Duchesse de Guermantes. I'm going to tell you the difference. Mme Verdurin is a great lady, the Duchesse de Guermantes is probably on her uppers. You get the distinction, don't you? In any event, whether the Guermantes go to Mme Verdurin's or not, she entertains, which is better, the d'Sherbatoffs, the d'Forchevilles, e tutti quanti, people out of the very top drawer, all the nobility of France and Navarre, who you'd see me talking to as equals. What's more, those sorts of individuals are happy to seek out the princes of science,' he added, with a beatifically self-regarding smile, produced on his lips by the presumptuous satisfaction, not so much that an expression once reserved for such as Potain and Charcot[53] should now be applied to him, but that he was finally able to make suitable use of all those expressions authorized by custom of which, after much burning of the midnight oil, he now had a thorough command. And so, after citing the Princesse Sherbatoff to me among the people received by Mme Verdurin, Cottard added, with a wink: 'You can tell the type of establishment it is, you understand what I mean?' He meant the most chic imaginable. Now, to entertain a Russian lady who knew only the Grande-Duchesse Eudoxie meant little. But the Princesse Sherbatoff might even not have known her without lessening the opinion Cottard held as to the supreme elegance of the Verdurin salon or his delight at being received there. The splendour in which the people with whom we associate appear clothed is no more intrinsic than that of those characters on the stage to dress whom it is quite pointless for a director to spend hundreds of thousands of francs on buying authentic costumes and real jewelry that will have no effect, when a great designer will create an impression of luxury a thousand times more sumptuous by directing a beam of artificial light at a doublet of coarse cloth strewn with glass bottle-tops and a cloak made of paper. A man may have spent his life amidst the great ones of the earth, who to him were either tedious relatives or tiresome acquaintances, because in his eyes a habit contracted from the cradle had stripped them of all glamour. But in return, this same glamour needed only, by some accident, to be added to the most obscure individuals for Cottards without number to live bedazzled by titled women whose salons they imagined to be the centre of aristocratic elegance, and who were not even what Mme de Villeparisis and her friends were (great ladies fallen from favour with whom the aristocracy that had been brought up with them no longer associated); no, were the many people who took pride in their friendship with such ladies to publish their memoirs, citing their names and those of the women whom they received, no one, Mme de Cambremer any more than Mme de Guermantes, would be able to identify them. But what matter! In this way, a Cottard has his Baronne or his Marquise, who for him is 'the Baronne' or 'the Marquise', just as in Marivaux, where the Baronne's name is never spoken and we have no idea even that she ever had one.[54] Cottard believes all the more strongly that he has here found the very essence of the aristocracy – which has no knowledge of this lady – because the more doubtful the titles the more space the coronets occupy on the glasses, the silver, the notepaper and the luggage. Numerous Cottards, who thought they were spending their lives in the heart of the Faubourg Saint-Germain, have had their imaginations more bewitched perhaps by feudal dreams than those who have lived among princes in actuality, just as, for the small shopkeeper who, on Sundays, goes now and again to visit 'olde world' buildings, it is sometimes from those buildings all of whose stones are of our own world, and whose ceilings have been painted blue and strewn with gold stars by pupils of Viollet-le-Duc,[55] that they get the strongest sense of the Middle Ages. 'The Princesse will be at Maineville. She will travel with us. But I shan't introduce you straight away. It'd be better were Mme Verdurin to do that. Unless I find some neat way in. You can rely on me then, I shall jump at it. – What were you talking about? said Saniette, who made as if he had been out getting a breath of air. – I was quoting to Monsieur, said Brichot, a remark you know well, of the man who in my opinion is first among all the "fins de siècle" (of the eighteenth siècle, be it understood), first name Charles-Maurice, abbé of Périgord.[56] He had begun by promising to be a very good journalist. But he went to the bad, I mean he became a minister! These falls from grace happen in life. A none too scrupulous politician what's more, with all the disdain of a thoroughbred nobleman, but who found no difficulty in working in his time for nothing, let's not hide the fact, and died an incorrigible member of the centre-left.'

At Saint-Pierre-des-Ifs there got in a splendid girl who, alas, was not part of the little group. I could not take my eyes off her magnolia flesh, her black eyes, the high and admirable construction of her breasts. After a moment, she wanted to open a window because it was rather hot in the compartment, and not wanting to ask everyone for permission, since I alone had no overcoat, she said to me, in a quick, fresh, laughing tone: 'You don't find it disagreeable, Monsieur, the fresh air?' I would have liked to say to her: 'Come with us to the Verdurins,' or 'Tell me your name and address.' I replied: 'No, the fresh air doesn't worry me, Mademoiselle.' And afterwards, without moving from her seat: 'The smoke won't worry your friends?', and she lit a cigarette. At the third station she jumped out.

The next day, I asked Albertine who it could have been. For, foolishly, believing that we can love only one thing, and jealous of Albertine's attitude in respect of Robert, I felt reassured where women were concerned. Albertine told me, perfectly sincerely I believe, that she did not know. 'I'd so much like to meet her again! I exclaimed. – Don't worry, we always do meet again,' answered Albertine. In this particular instance, she was wrong; I have never again met nor identified the beautiful girl with the cigarette. We shall see, moreover, why for a long time I had to leave off searching for her. But I have not forgotten her. It often happens that when I am thinking of her I am seized by a wild longing. But these recurrences of desire force us to reflect that, if we wanted to meet these girls again with the same pleasure, we should have also to go back to the year in question, which has since been followed by ten others, in the course of which the girl has faded. We can sometimes find a person again, but not abolish time. All this up until that unforeseen day, sad as a winter's night, when we are no longer seeking that particular girl, nor any other, and when to find one would alarm us even. For we no longer feel we have sufficient attractions to please, nor the strength to love. Not, of course, that we are, in the true sense of the word, impotent. So far as love is concerned, we would love more than ever. But we feel that it is too great an undertaking for the little strength that we preserve. Our eternal rest has already introduced intervals, in which we cannot go out, cannot speak. To place a foot on the step that is needed is a triumph, like not missing a somersault. To be seen in this state by a girl whom we love, even if we have kept the face and the fair hair we had as a young man! We can no longer assume the fatigue of falling into step with youth. So much the worse if the desires of the flesh are redoubled instead of being deadened! On their account, we send for a woman whom we shall make no effort to please, who will share our couch for one evening only and whom we shall never see again.

'We must still be without news of the violinist,' said Cottard. The event of the day amongst the little clan had indeed been the defection of Mme Verdurin's favoured violinist. He, who was doing his military service near Doncières, came three times a week to dine at La Raspelière since he had leave up until midnight. But two days before, for the first time, the faithful had not managed to discover him on the tram. It was assumed he had missed it. But for all that Mme Verdurin had sent to the tram following, and finally to the last one, the carriage had come back empty. 'He's been put on jankers for sure, there's no other explanation for his flight. In the soldiering trade, you know, with those strapping young fellows, it only takes a grumpy N C O. – It'll be all the more mortifying for Mme Verdurin, said Brichot, if he lets her down again this evening, because our charming hostess is entertaining to dinner for the very first time the neighbours who have let La Raspelière to her, the Marquis and Marquise de Cambremer. – This evening, the Marquis and Marquise de Cambremer! exclaimed Cottard. But I had absolutely no idea. Of course, I knew as you all did that they were due to come one day, but I didn't know it'd be so soon. Sapristi, he said, turning to me, what did I tell you? The Princesse Sherbatoff, the Marquis and Marquise de Cambremer.' And having repeated these names, savouring their melodiousness: 'You can see that we do well for ourselves, he said. Never mind, for your first time, you've scored a bull's-eye. It's going to be an exceptionally brilliant roomful.' And, turning to Brichot, he added: 'The Patronne must be furious. It was high time we arrived to lend her a hand.' Since Mme Verdurin had been at La Raspelière, she had indeed affected in front of the faithful to be under an obligation and in despair at having to invite the owners. In this way she would get better terms for the following year, she said, and was doing it only out of self-interest. But she claimed to feel such terror, to fuss so about nothing more than a dinner with people not from the little group, that she was always putting it off. It did frighten her a little as it happens, for the reasons that she proclaimed, even though she exaggerated them, if from another point of view it charmed her, for snobbish reasons about which she preferred to remain silent. She was thus half sincere, she thought the little clan something so unique in the world, one of those bodies such that it would take centuries to constitute its like, that she trembled at the thought of seeing introduced into it these provincials, unfamiliar with the Tetralogy and the Meistersinger, who would not know how to sustain their part in the concert of the general conversation and were capable, by coming to Mme Verdurin's, of ruining one of the famous Wednesdays, those fragile and incomparable masterpieces, like the Venetian glass that one false note is enough to shatter. 'What's more, they're bound to be as anti as can be, and all top brass, M. Verdurin had said. – Oh that, that's all one to me, that particular story's been being talked about for quite some time,' Mme Verdurin had replied, who was genuinely pro-Dreyfus but would still have liked to earn some worldly reward from the preponderant Dreyfusism of her salon. But Dreyfusism had triumphed politically, not socially. For society people, Labori, Reinach, Picquart and Zola remained traitors of a kind that could only alienate them from the little nucleus. And so, after this incursion into politics, Mme Verdurin was anxious to get back into art. Were d'Indy and Debussy not anyway 'in the wrong' over the Affair?[57] 'So far as the Affair is concerned, we'd only need to sit them next to Brichot, she said (the university man being the only one of the faithful who had taken the side of the General Staff, which had lowered him greatly in Mme Verdurin's esteem). We're not obliged to go on everlastingly about the Dreyfus Affair. No, the truth is that the Cambremers get on my nerves.' As for the faithful, as much excited by the unconfessed desire they felt to meet the Cambremers as taken in by the annoyance Mme Verdurin affected to feel at entertaining them, they daily took up again when talking with her the unworthy arguments she had herself used in favour of the invitation and attempted to make them irresistible. 'Make up your mind to it once and for all, repeated Cottard, and they'll knock something off the rent, they'll pay the gardener, you'll have the use of the field. All that's well worth an evening of boredom. I mention it only for your sake,' he added, although his heart had beaten faster one time when, in Mme Verdurin's carriage, he had met that of the old Mme de Cambremer along the road, and above all had been made to feel small in front of the porters when, at the station, he found himself next to the Marquis. For their part, the Cambremers, who lived much too far outside the social swim to be able even to suspect that certain fashionable women might speak of Mme Verdurin with a certain consideration, imagined the latter to be someone who could know only bohemians, was not even lawfully married perhaps, and, so far as people 'of birth' were concerned, would only ever meet themselves. They had resigned themselves to dining there only in order to keep in with a tenant who they hoped would return for many more seasons, especially since they had learned, the previous month, that she had just inherited all those millions. It was in silence and without any tasteless jokes that they prepared themselves for the fateful day. The faithful no longer expected it ever to arrive, so many times had Mme Verdurin already fixed in their presence a date that was forever shifting. These false resolutions had as their aim, not only to make display of the nuisance this dinner-party was causing her, but to keep in suspense those members of the little group who lived in the vicinity and were inclined at times to default. Not that the Patronne had guessed that the 'great day' was as agreeable for them as for her, but because, having persuaded them that for her this dinner-party was the most terrible drudgery, she could appeal to their devotion. 'You're not going to leave me on my own, hobnobbing with that lot! On the contrary, we need to be there in numbers to put up with the boredom. Of course we shan't be able to talk about anything that interests us. As a Wednesday it'll be a failure, but there you are!'

'In fact,' replied Brichot, addressing himself to me, 'I don't believe Mme Verdurin, who is highly intelligent and very fastidious in working out her Wednesdays, was very keen to entertain these squireens of high pedigree but no brains. She couldn't bring herself to invite the dowager Marquise but has resigned herself to the son and daughter-in-law. – Ah, we shall be seeing the Marquise de Cambremer?' said Cottard, with a smile that he thought he should make both suggestive and bantering, although he did not know whether Mme de Cambremer was pretty or not. But the title of Marquise had evoked dashing and glamorous images in him. 'Oh, I know her,' said Ski, who had met her once when out driving with Mme Verdurin. 'You don't know her in the biblical sense?' said the Doctor, one of whose favourite jokes this was, sliding a louche glance beneath his eye-glass. 'She's intelligent, Ski said to me. Of course,' he went on, noticing that I had said nothing and smilingly laying weight on every word: 'she's intelligent yet she isn't, she lacks education, she's frivolous, but she has an instinct for pretty things. She'll fall silent but she'll never say anything stupid. Besides, her colouring is pretty. Hers is a portrait it'd be amusing to paint,' he added, half closing his eyes, as if he were gazing at her posing in front of him. Since I thought the complete opposite of what Ski had expressed with so many qualifications, I contented myself with saying that she was the sister of a very distinguished engineer, M. Legrandin. 'Well, you see, you'll be introduced to a pretty woman, Brichot said to me, and one never knows what that may lead to. Cleopatra wasn't even a great lady, she was the little woman, the thoughtless and terrible little woman of our Meilhac,[58] and think of the consequences, not only for that simpleton of an Antony but for the Ancient World. – I've already been introduced to Mme de Cambremer, I answered. – Ah, so you're going to find yourself in familiar country. – I'll be all the more glad to see her, I replied, because she promised me a book by the former curé of Combray about the local place names, and I'll be able to remind her of her promise. I'm interested in the priest and in etymologies also. – Don't put too much trust in those he gives, replied Brichot. The book, which is at La Raspelière and which I've amused myself by looking through, tells me nothing of any value; it's littered with errors. I'll give you an example. The word bricq enters into the formation of a number of place-names hereabouts. The good cleric has had the somewhat cranky notion that it comes from briga, a height or fortified place. He finds it already in the Celtic tribes, Latobriges, Nemetobriges and so on, and traces it even in names like Briand, Brion, etc. To come back to the region we have the pleasure of traversing with you at this moment, Bricquebosc would signify the wood of the height, Bricqueville the habitation of the height, Bricquebec, where we shall be stopping in a moment before getting to Maineville, the height near the stream. Yet that's not it at all, for the good reason that bricq is the old Norse word signifying quite simply a bridge. Just as fleur, which Mme de Cambremer's protégé takes infinite pains to link at one point to the Scandinavian words floi and flo, and at others to the Irish words ae and aer, is, on the contrary, and beyond any doubt, the fiord of the Danes, and signifies a harbour. Similarly, the excellent priest thinks that the station of Saint-Martin-le-Vêtu, which is next door to La Raspelière, signifies Saint-Martin-le-Vieux (vetus). It's a fact that the word vieux has played a major role in the toponymy of the region. Vieux generally comes from vadum and signifies a ford, as in the place known as Les Vieux, or as in the English Oxford and Hereford. But in this particular instance, vieux comes not from vetus but from vastatus, a bare, de-vastated place. Near here you have Sottevast, the vast of Setold, Brillevast, the vast of Berold. I'm all the more certain that the curé is in error because Saint-Martin-le-Vieux was at one time called Saint-Martin-du-Gast or even Saint-Martin-de-Terregate. Now the v and the g in those words are the same letter. We say dévaster but also gâcher. Jachères and gâtines[59] (from the High German wastinna) have the same sense. Terregate, therefore, is terra vasta. As for Saint-Mars, in the old days (honni soit qui mal y pense!) Saint-Merd,[60] that is Saint-Medardus, which is sometimes Saint-Médard, Saint-Mard, Saint-Marc, Cinq-Mars, all the way to Dammas. It mustn't be forgotten, moreover, that very near here, places bearing this same name of Mars are evidence merely of a pagan origin (the god Mars) that's still very much alive in the region, but which the man of God refuses to acknowledge. The heights dedicated to the gods in particular are very numerous, like the mountain of Jupiter (Jeumont). Your curé is having none of it but, on the other hand, wherever Christianity has left traces, they elude him. He extended his travels as far as Loctudy, a barbarian name, he says, whereas it's Locus sancti Tudeni, nor, in Sammarcoles, has he divined Sanctus Martialis. Your curé, Brichot went on, noticing that he was interesting me, makes the words hon, home and holm come from the word holl (hullus), a hill, whereas it comes from the Norse holm, an island, which you're certainly familiar with in Stockholm, and which is so widespread throughout the region: La Houlme, Engohomme, Tahoume, Robehomme, Néhomme, Quettehou, and so on.' These names brought to mind the day when Albertine had wanted to go to Amfreville-la-Bigot (from the name of two of its successive lords, Brichot told me), and when she had then suggested we should eat together in Robehomme. As for Montmartin, we would be passing it in a minute. 'Is Néhomme, I asked, not near Carquethuit and Clitourps? – Exactly, Néhomme is the holm, the island or peninsula of the famous Vicomte Nigel, whose name has survived also in Néville. For Mme de Cambremer's protégé, Carquethuit and Clitourps, which you spoke of, are an opportunity for other errors. He can see easily enough of course that carque is a church, the Germans' Kirche. You're familiar with Querqueville and Carquebut, not to mention Dunkerque. For we'd do better then to pause at this famous word dun, which for the Celts signified an elevation. That you'll find throughout France. Your abbé has been hypnotized faced by Duneville. But in the Eure-et-Loir he'd have found Châteaudun; Dun-le-Roi in the Cher; Duneau in the Sarthe; Dun in the Ariège; Dune-les-Places in the Nièvre, and so on and so forth. This dun leads him to commit a curious error in connection with Douville, where we shall be getting out and where the comfortable carriages of Mme Verdurin await us. Douville, in Latin donvilla, so he says. Indeed, Douville is at the foot of the big heights. Your curè, who knows everything, senses all the same he has blundered. He has in fact read Domvilla in an old terrier. Then he retracts; Douville, according to him, is a fief of the abbé, domino abbati, of Mont Saint-Michel. That delights him, which is rather bizarre when one reflects on the scandalous life that, since the capitulary of Saint-Clair-sur-Epte, they led at Mont Saint-Michel, and which would be no more extraordinary than finding the King of Denmark as suzerain of this whole coast, where he celebrated the worship of Odin far more than that of Christ. On the other hand, the suppositions that the n got changed into a u doesn't shock me and requires less of a deformation than the very correct Lyon, which also comes from dun (Lugdunum). But the abbé has in fact got it wrong. Douville was never Donville, but Doville, Eudonis Villa, the village of Eudes. Douville was once called Escalecliff, where you scaled the rise. Around 1233, Eudes the Cupbearer, lord of Escalecliff, left for the Holy Land; at the moment of departure, he handed over the church to the Abbey of Blanchelande. An exchange of courtesies: the village took his name, whence present-day Douville. But I will add that toponymy, where I'm anyway quite ignorant, is not an exact science; did we not have this historical evidence, Douville might very well come from d'Ouville, i.e. les Eaux, the waters. Forms in ai (Aigues-Mortes), from aqua, very often turn into eu, or ou. And there were renowned waters very close to Douville. As you can imagine, the curé was only too happy to find some Christian vestige there, even if the region seems to have been hard enough to evangelize since it took successive attempts by Saint Ursal, Saint Gofroi, Saint Barsanore and Saint Laurent de Brèvedent, who finally made way for the monks of Beaubec. But where tuit is concerned, the author is mistaken, he sees it as a form of toft, a hovel, as in Criquetot, Ectot, Yvetot, whereas it's the thveit, or assart, land freshly cleared, as in Braquetuit, Le Thuit, Regnetuit, and so on. Similarly, if, in Clitourps, he recognizes the Norman thorp, which means village, he wants the first part of the name to derive from clivus, an incline, whereas it comes from cliff a rockface. But his grossest blunders stem less from ignorance than from his prejudices. However good a Frenchman you may be, do you have to deny what is self-evident and take Saint-Laurent-en-Bray to be the well-known Roman priest, whereas the saint in question is Saint Lawrence O'Toole, Archbishop of Dublin? But more than his patriotic sentiments, it's your friend's religious parti pris that leads him to commit crude errors. Thus, not far from the house of our hosts at La Raspelière, you have two Montmartins, Montmartin-sur-Mer and Montmartin-en-Graignes. With Graignes, the worthy curé has not made any mistake, he's seen clearly that Graignes, grania in Latin, krene in Greek, signifies ponds, marshland; how many Cresmays, Croens, Grennevilles, Lengronnes, could one not cite? But with Montmartin your purported linguist insists it's a question of parishes dedicated to St Martin. His authority for this is the fact that that saint is their patron, but he's unaware that he was only adopted as such after the event; or rather he's blinded by his hatred of paganism; he won't see that people would have said Mont-Saint-Martin as they say Mont-Saint-Michel, had it been a question of St Martin, whereas the name of Montmartin applies in a far more pagan fashion to temples consecrated to the god Mars, temples of which, it's true, we possess no other vestiges, but which would be made extremely likely by the undeniable presence in the vicinity of vast Roman camps, even without the name of Montmartin, which settles any doubts. So you can see, the little book that you'll find at La Raspelière is not so very well done.' I protested that in Combray the curé had often taught us interesting etymologies. 'He was probably better on his home ground, the journey to Normandy will have disoriented him. – And not cured him, I added, because he arrived with neurasthenia and left with the rheumatics. – Ah, that's the fault of the neurasthenia. He fell from neurasthenia into philology, as my good master Poquelin[61] would have said. I say, Cottard, does it seem to you that neurasthenia can have a harmful influence on philology, and philology a calming influence on neurasthenia, and that the cure for neurasthenia can lead to rheumatism? – Absolutely, rheumatism and neurasthenia are two vicarious forms of neuro-arthritis. You can pass from one to the other by metastasis. – The eminent professor, said Brichot, expresses himself, may God forgive me, in a French mixed in with as much Latin and Greek as M. Purgon himself might have done, of Molièrish memory! Help, Uncle, I mean Sarcey,[62] our national…' But he was unable to finish his sentence. The Professor had just given a start and let out a shout: 'Damn it all, what the…, he cried, finally moving on to articulated speech, 'we've passed Maineville (hey, what!) and even Renneville.' He had just noticed that the train had stopped at Saint-Mars-le-Vieux, where almost all the passengers alighted. 'They can't have gone through it without stopping, though. We can't have been paying attention, talking about the Cambremers. – Listen, Ski, wait, I'm going to tell you "a good thing" ', said Cottard, who had developed a fondness for this expression, common in certain medical circles. 'The Princesse must be on the train, she won't have seen us but has got into another compartment. Let's go and look for her. Just so long as all this isn't going to create ructions!' And he led all of us off in search of the Princesse Sherbatoff. He found her in the corner of an empty carriage, busy reading the Revue des Deux Mondes. Over long years, she had, from a fear of rejection, got into the habit of staying put, of remaining in her corner, and of waiting until someone wished her good day before giving her hand. She continued to read when the faithful entered her carriage. I recognized her instantly; this woman who might have come down in the world but was nevertheless of noble birth, who was in any case the pearl of a salon like that of the Verdurins, was the lady who, in this same train, two days earlier, I had thought might be the madam of a brothel. Her very uncertain social personality became clear to me the moment I learned her name, as when, having toiled over a riddle, we finally learn the solution, which makes clear everything that had remained obscure, and which in the case of people is their name. To learn two days later who the person was next to whom one had travelled on the train without managing to decide on their social standing is a far more amusing surprise than reading in the latest issue of a review the solution to the conundrum posed in the previous issue. Great restaurants, casinos, 'slowcoaches', these are the family museums of such social conundrums. 'Princesse, we must have missed you in Maineville! Will you allow us to come and sit in your compartment? – Why of course,' said the Princesse, who raised her eyes from her review only when she heard Cottard address her, eyes which, like those of M. de Charlus, although gentler, saw very clearly the people whose presence she had pretended not to have noticed. Cottard, reflecting on the fact that being invited with the Cambremers was for me a sufficient recommendation, took, after a moment, the decision to introduce me to the Princesse, who bowed with great courtesy, but gave the impression of hearing my name for the first time. 'Dammit, exclaimed the Doctor, my wife's forgotten to change the buttons on my white waistcoat. Oh, women, they never think. Don't ever get married, d'you hear,' he said to me. And as this was one of the pleasantries he thought appropriate when there was nothing to be said, he glanced out of the corner of his eye at the Princesse and at the other faithful, who, because he was a professor and an Academician, smiled in admiration of his good humour and lack of presumption. The Princesse informed us that the young violinist had been found. He had kept to his bed the previous day on account of a migraine, but would be coming this evening and bringing an old friend of his father's whom he had met again in Doncières. She had learned this through Mme Verdurin, with whom 'she had had lunch that morning,' she told us quickly, in a voice in which the rolled *r*s of her Russian accent were quietly mumbled at the back of her throat, as if they were not *r*s but *l*s. 'Ah, you had lunch with her this morning,' said Cottard to the Princesse; but looking at me, for the words were intended to demonstrate to me how intimate the Princesse was with the Patronne. 'You're truly one of the faithful! – Yes, I like the little gloup, intelligent, agleeable, without malice, velly simple, not snobbish and where they've blains all the way down to their fingertips. – Damnation, I must have lost my ticket, I can't find it,' exclaimed Cottard, without being unduly concerned, however. He knew that at Douville, where two landaus would be awaiting us, the porter would allow him through without a ticket and would simply doff his cap all the lower in order, by this salute, to give the explanation of his indulgence, to wit that he had indeed recognized Cottard to be a Verdurin regular. 'They won't be putting me in the police room for that, the Doctor concluded. – You were saying, Monsieur, I asked Brichot, that there were some renowned waters near here; how do you know? – The name of the next station confirms it, together with much other evidence. It's called Fervaches. – I don't complehend what he means,' grumbled the Princesse, in the tone of voice in which she might have said to me, out of kindness: 'He's getting on our nerves, isn't he?' 'But, Princesse, Fervaches means warm waters, fervidae aquae… But… apropos of the young violinist, Brichot went on, I was forgetting, Cottard, to speak to you about the big news. Did you know that our poor friend Dechambre, formerly Mme Verdurin's favourite pianist, has just died? It's frightening. – He was still young, replied Cottard, but he must have got something amiss with his liver, he must have had something nasty there, he'd looked rotten for some time. – But he wasn't that young, said Brichot, in the days when Elstir and Swann used to come to Mme Verdurin's, Dechambre already had a reputation in Paris and, what is admirable, without having received his baptism of success abroad. He was no adept of the Gospel according to St Barnum.[63] – You're getting him confused, he couldn't have been going to Mme Verdurin's at that time, he was still in swadddling-clothes. – But unless my old memory's playing me false, I fancy Dechambre was playing the Vinteuil sonata for Swann when that clubman, who'd broken with the aristocracy, hardly suspected he would one day become the embourgeoisé prince consort of our national Odette. – That's impossible, Vinteuil's sonata was played at Mme Verdurin's long after Swann was no longer going there,' said the Doctor, who, like those people who work a great deal and think they should retain many things that they imagine may be useful, forget many others, which enables them to go into ecstasies at the memory of people who have nothing to do. 'You're doing your knowledge an injustice, your mind isn't going, however,' smiled the Doctor. Brichot conceded his mistake. The train stopped. It was La Sogne. The name intrigued me. 'I'd love to know what all these names mean, I said to Cottard. – But ask M. Brichot, he'll know perhaps. – But La Sogne, is La Cicogne, Siconia, the stork,' replied Brichot, whom I was longing to question about many other names.

Forgetting how keen she was on her 'corner', Mme Sherbatoff kindly offered to change places with me so that I would be better able to talk with Brichot, whom I wanted to ask for other etymologies that interested me, and she assured me that it was a matter of indifference to her whether she travelled forwards, backwards, standing up, or any other way. She remained on the defensive for as long as she did not know the intentions of the new arrivals, but once she had recognized that these were friendly, she tried in every way possible to please each one of them. Finally, the train stopped in the station of Douville-Féterne, which, being more or less equidistant from the village of Féterne and that of Douville, bore on account of this peculiarity both their names. 'Zounds,' exclaimed Doctor Cottard, once we were in front of the barrier where the tickets were collected, and pretending only now to have noticed, 'I can't find my ticket, I must have lost it.' But the porter, removing his cap, assured him it was of no account and smiled respectfully. The Princesse (giving an explanation to the coachman, as a sort of lady-in-waiting to Mme Verdurin might have done, who, on account of the Cambremers, had not been able to come to the station, which she did only rarely in any case) took me, together with Brichot, with her in one of the carriages. Into the other there got the Doctor, Saniette and Ski.

The coachman, though very young, was the Verdurins' head coachman, the only one actually to bear the title; during the day, he took them on all their outings, for he knew all the roads, and in the evenings went to fetch and later take back the faithful. He was accompanied by auxiliaries (chosen by him) in case of need. He was an excellent lad, sober and skilful, but with one of those melancholy faces whose too fixed gaze signifies someone who is soon worked up, or even gets dark thoughts, over nothing at all. But at that moment he was very happy for he had managed to get his brother, another excellent sort, taken on by the Verdurins. We went first through Douville. Here, grassy hillocks ran right down to the sea, in ample grazing made lush, velvety and exceptionally vivid in colour from its saturation by the damp and the salt. The islets and indentations of Rivebelle, much closer together here than in Balbec, lent this part of the sea the appearance, new to me, of a relief map. We passed small chalets, almost all of them rented by painters; we took a track on which some loose cows, just as alarmed as our horses, barred our way for ten minutes, then we entered on the road along the corniche. 'But by the immortal gods, asked Brichot all of a sudden, to revert to poor Dechambre; do you think Mme Verdurin knows? has she been told?' Like almost all society people, Mme Verdurin, precisely because she had need of the company of others, never gave them another thought after the day they died, and were no longer able to come to her Wednesdays, or her Saturdays, or eat in a dressing-gown. And it could not have been said of the little clan, the image in this of all the salons, that it was made up more of the dead than the living, seeing that the moment you were dead it was as if you had never existed. But in order to avoid the nuisance of having to speak of the deceased, or even to suspend the dinners, something quite out of the question for the Patronne, as a sign of mourning, M. Verdurin would pretend that the death of the faithful so affected his wife that, in the interests of her health, it was not to be mentioned. Moreover, and perhaps indeed just because the death of others struck him as so common and final an accident, the thought of his own death filled him with horror and he avoided any reflection that might bear on it. As for Brichot, since he was a very decent man and completely taken in by what M. Verdurin had said about his wife, he dreaded on his friend's account the emotions of such an upset. 'Yes, she's known everything since this morning, said the Princesse, we couldn't keep it from her. – Oh, great thundering Zeus, exclaimed Brichot, oh, that must have been a terrible blow, a friend of twenty-five years' standing! And who was one of us! – How right, how right, but there you are, said Cottard. These are always painful circumstances; but Mme Verdurin is a strong woman, she's a cerebral even more than an emotive. – I'm not altogether of the Doctor's opinion,' said the Princesse, whose rapid way of speaking and muttered accent gave her an expression decidedly at once sullen and mischievous. 'Beneath a cold exterior, Mme Verdurin conceals treasures of sensitivity. M. Verdurin told me he had great difficulty stopping her from going to Paris for the ceremony; he was obliged to give her to believe it would all take place in the country. – Ah, good heavens, she wanted to go to Paris. But I know very well she's a woman of heart, too much heart perhaps. Poor Dechambre! As Mme Verdurin was saying not two months since, "Compared with him, Planté, Paderewski, Risler even,[64] none of them count". Ah, he had better reason than that show-off Nero, who has found a way of hoodwinking German learning itself, to say Qualis artifex pereo![65] But Dechambre at least must have died in the fulfilment of his ministry, in the odour of Beethovenian devotion; and bravely, I don't doubt; by rights, that officiant of German music would have deserved to pass away while celebrating the Mass in D.[66] For all that, he was a man to welcome the Grim Reaper with a trill, for that performer of genius sometimes rediscovered in his ancestry, Parisianized man of Champagne that he was, the swank and elegance of a garde-française.[67]

From the height at which we already were, the sea no longer looked, as it did from Balbec, like the undulations of upraised mountains, but on the contrary, the way a blue-coloured glacier, or a dazzling plain, situated at a lower altitude, appears from a peak, or from a road that hugs the mountainside. The jagged swirls seemed to have become immobilized and to have traced their concentric circles once and for all; the very enamel of the sea, which changed colour imperceptibly, took on, towards the end of the bay, where an estuary had been scooped out, the blueish whiteness of milk, in which small black ferryboats seemed trapped like flies, unable to advance. I fancied that from nowhere else could you have discovered so vast a tableau. But at each bend in the road, a new portion was added to it and when we reached the tollhouse of Douville, the spur of cliff that had hitherto hidden one half of the bay from us, drew back, and I suddenly saw to my left a gulf as deep as that which hitherto I had had in front of me, but whose proportions it altered while doubling its beauty. In this very elevated spot, the air had become of a keenness and purity that intoxicated me. I loved the Verdurins; that they should have sent a carriage for us seemed so kind as to be touching. I would have liked to kiss the Princesse. I told her I had never seen anything so beautiful. She, too, professed to love this country more than any other. But I had a strong sense that for her, as for the Verdurins, the important thing was not to gaze on it like tourists, but to eat well there, to entertain company that they enjoyed, to write letters, to read, in short to live in it, allowing its beauty to wash passively over them rather than making it the object of their concerns.

From the toll-house, the carriage having stopped for a moment at such a height above the sea that, as from a mountain-top, the view of the blue gulf almost gave you vertigo, I opened the window; the softness and clarity of the sound of each wave as it broke, distinct to the ear, had something sublime about it. Was it not like an index of measurement which, overturning our customary impressions, proves that vertical distances can be assimilated to horizontal distances, contrary to the representation our minds usually make of them; and that, bringing the sky closer to us as they do, they are not great; that they are less great even for a sound that covers them, as that of the little waves was doing, because the medium that it has to traverse is purer? Indeed, if you drew no more than two metres back from the tollhouse, you could no longer make out the sound of the waves, which two hundred metres of cliff had not robbed of its delicate, meticulous, gentle precision. I told myself that my grandmother would have felt for it the admiration inspired in her by all those manifestations of nature or of art into whose simplicity grandeur may be read. My exaltation was at its height, and raised up all that surrounded me. I was touched that the Verdurins should have sent to fetch us from the station. I said as much to the Princesse, who seemed to think I was making far too much of a quite simple courtesy. I know that she later confessed to Cottard that she found me very enthusiastic; he replied that I was too emotional, that I would have needed sedatives and to take up knitting. I remarked to the Princesse on each tree, each little house crumbling beneath its roses, I made her admire everything, I would like to have pressed her to my heart. She told me she could see I had a gift for painting, that I should draw, that she was surprised I had not been told that before. And she admitted that the country here was indeed picturesque. We went through, perched on its height, the little village of Englesqueville (Engleberti Villa, Brichot told us). 'But are you quite sure that this evening's dinner is taking place, despite Dechambre's death, Princesse? he added, without reflecting that the fact that the carriages in which we were had come to the station was in itself an answer. – Yes, said the Princesse, M. Veldulin was insistent it shouldn't be put off, plecisely in order to stop his wife 'thinking'. Besides, after all these years when she has never failed to entertain on a Wednesday, the change in her habits might have left its mark on her. She is tellibly nervous these days. M. Verdurin was especially pleased you were coming to dinner this evening because he knew it would be a great distraction for Mme Verdurin,' said the Princesse, forgetting her pretence of not having heard of me. 'I think you'd do well not to say anything in front of Mme Verdurin, added the Princesse. – Ah, you do well to tell me, replied Brichot artlessly. I'll pass that recommendation on to Cottard.' The carriage stopped for a moment. It started off again, but the noise the wheels had been making in the village ceased. We had entered on the grand driveway of La Raspelière, where M. Verdurin was waiting for us on the steps. 'I did right putting on a dinner-jacket, he said, ascertaining with pleasure that the faithful were in theirs, since I have such smart men.' And as I apologized for my own jacket: 'Oh come, that's ideal. Here we dine among friends. I'd gladly offer to lend you one of my dinner-jackets, but it wouldn't fit you.' The very feeling handshake which, as he entered the hallway of La Raspelière, and by way of condolences for the death of the pianist, Brichot gave the Patron, provoked no comment from the latter. I told him of my admiration for the region. 'Ah, so much the better, yet you've seen nothing, we'll show it to you. Why don't you come and stay here for a few weeks? The air is excellent.' Brichot feared that his handshake might not have been understood. 'Well, well, poor Dechambre!' he said, but in a low voice, for fear that Mme Verdurin might not be far away. 'It's frightful, replied M. Verdurin cheerfully. – So young,' Brichot went on. Annoyed at being detained by these futilities, M. Verdurin replied hurriedly and with a shrill groan, not of grief but of irritated impatience: 'Well, yes, but there you are, there's nothing we can do about it, our words aren't going to bring him back to life, are they?' And gentleness returning along with his joviality: 'Come on, my good Brichot, put your things down quickly. We've got a bouillabaisse which won't wait. Above all, in the name of goodness, don't go mentioning Dechambre to Mme Verdurin! You know she hides a lot of what she feels, but she's so sensitive it's like a genuine sickness. I swear to you, when she heard that Dechambre was dead, she almost wept,' said M. Verdurin in a profoundly ironic tone. Hearing him, you would have said that it required a sort of dementia to mourn for a friend of thirty years' standing, while gathering on the other hand that the perpetual union of M. Verdurin and his wife did not preclude the former from constantly passing judgment on her and the latter from frequently irritating him. 'If you mention it to her she'll go and get ill again. It's lamentable, three weeks after her bronchitis. And in these cases, it's me who's the sick-nurse. You can understand I've only just been through it. Grieve all you want for the fate of Dechambre in your heart. Think about it, but don't speak of it. I loved Dechambre dearly, but you can't begrudge me loving my wife even more dearly. Here, there's Cottard, you'll be able to ask him.' And indeed, he knew that there are many small services a family doctor is able to render, such, for example, as prescribing that we must not feel grief.

Cottard had said, docilely, to the Patronne: 'Upset yourself like that and tomorrow you'll be giving me a temperature of 39,' as he might have said to the cook: 'Tomorrow you can give me a ris de veau.' For want of curing us, medicine busies itself altering the meanings of verbs and pronouns.

M. Verdurin was happy to confirm that, despite the rebuffs he had suffered two days earlier, Saniette had not deserted the little nucleus. In their idleness, Mme Verdurin and her husband had in fact developed cruel instincts, for which the great occasions were too infrequent any longer to suffice. They had been able indeed to turn Odette against Swann, and Brichot against his mistress. And they would repeat it with others, that was understood. But the opportunity did not present itself every day. Whereas, thanks to his quivering sensitivity, and his fearful, quickly panic-stricken shyness, Saniette offered them an everyday whipping-boy. And so, for fear of his defaulting, they took care to invite him with friendly and persuasive words such as those who have been held back a year at the lycée, or old sweats in the army, use to a tyro whom they want to butter up so as to be able to grab hold of him, with the one aim of then tickling or bullying him once he can no longer escape. 'Above all, Cottard, who had not heard M. Verdurin, reminded Brichot, not a word in front of Mme Verdurin. – Fear not, O Cottard, you see before you a sage, as Theocritus has it.[68] M. Verdurin is right, moreover, what use are our lamentations?' he added, for, capable of assimilating forms of words and the ideas to which they gave rise in him, but being without finesse, he found M. Verdurin's words admirable for their very courageous stoicism. 'All the same, it's a great talent who has left us. – What, are you still talking about Dechambre?' said M. Verdurin, who had gone ahead of us but, noticing that we were not following, had turned back. 'Listen, he said to Brichot, there's never any need to exaggerate. Because he's dead isn't a reason to make him into the genius he wasn't. He played well, agreed, above all he had the right setting here; transplanted, he no longer existed. My wife became besotted with him and made his reputation. You know how she is. I shall say moreover that, for that same reputation's sake, he died at just the right moment, à point, just as the demoiselles de Caen are about to be, I hope, grilled in accordance with the incomparable recipes of Pampille[69] (unless you're going to keep on for ever with your jeremiads here in this Casbah open to all the winds). You surely can't want to kill all of us off just because Dechambre is dead, when for the last year he'd been obliged to play scales before giving a concert, so as to get his suppleness back temporarily, very temporarily. In any case, this evening you're going to hear, or at least encounter, for after dinner the young monkey too often abandons art for cards, someone who's far more of an artist than Dechambre, a youngster my wife discovered (just as she discovered Dechambre, and Paderewski and the others): Morel. The confounded fellow hasn't arrived yet. I'm going to be obliged to send a carriage to the last train. He's coming with an old friend of his family's who he's met again and who bores him to death, but who otherwise, so as not to have his father complaining, he'd have been obliged to remain with in Doncières, to keep him company: the Baron de Charlus.' The faithful went in. M. Verdurin, who had stayed behind with me while I took off my things, took me jokingly by the arm, like a host at a dinner party who has no lady guest to give you to take in. 'Did you have a good journey? – Yes, M. Brichot taught me things that interested me greatly,' I said, thinking of the etymologies and because I had heard that the Verdurins greatly admired Brichot. 'I'd have been surprised if he hadn't taught you something, said M. Verdurin, he's such a self-effacing man, who talks so seldom about the things he knows.' This compliment did not strike me as very accurate. 'He has a charming way with him, I said. – Exquisite, delightful, not at all pedantic, whimsical, light-hearted, my wife adores him, I do, too!' replied M. Verdurin, in a tone of exaggeration and as if reciting a lesson. Only then did I realize that what he had said about Brichot was ironic. And I wondered whether M. Verdurin, since those distant days of which I had heard speak, had not shaken off his wife's tutelage.

The sculptor was much surprised to learn that the Verdurins had consented to receive M. de Charlus. Whereas in the Faubourg Saint-Germain, where M. de Charlus was so well known, his habits were never referred to (not known to the great majority, an object of uncertainty for others, whose idea was more of intense but platonic friendships and indiscretions, and carefully concealed by those alone in the know, who would shrug their shoulders when some ill-natured Gallardon ventured an insinuation), these same habits, scarcely known about save to a few intimates, were on the contrary denounced daily far away from the circle in which he lived, like the gunfire that is heard only after the interference of a zone of silence. Moreover, in those bourgeois and artistic circles where he was looked on as the very embodiment of inversion, his high standing in society and his exalted origins were wholly unknown, through a phenomenon analogous to that whereby, among the people of Romania, the name of Ronsard is known for that of a great nobleman, whereas his poetic oeuvre is unknown there.[70] On top of which, Ronsard's nobility rests on an error in Romania. Similarly, if in the world of painters and actors, M. de Charlus had such a bad reputation, this stemmed from the fact that he had been confused with a certain Comte Leblois de Charlus, who was not even faintly, or only very distantly related to him, and who had been arrested, perhaps in error, during a police raid that was still talked about. In short, all the stories recounted of M. de Charlus applied to the false one. Many professionals swore that they had had dealings with M. de Charlus, and in good faith, believing the false Charlus to be the true one, and the false one perhaps encouraging, half as parading his noble birth, half as concealing his vice, a confusion which was for a long time prejudicial to the real Charlus (the Baron whom we have met), but which then, once he was on the slippery slope, became a convenience, since it enabled him also to say 'It wasn't me.' At present, indeed, the talk was not of him. What added to the falsehood of the comments about a true fact (the Baron's tastes) was that he had been the close and perfectly innocent friend of an author who, in the world of the theatre, had, no one knew why, the same reputation without in any way deserving it. When they were seen together at a first night, people said 'You know,' just as it was believed that the Duchesse de Guermantes had an immoral relationship with the Princesse de Parme; an indestructible legend, for it would have evaporated only at a proximity to these two great ladies to which the people who retailed it would most likely never attain, save when turning their lorgnettes on to them at the theatre and slandering them to the occupant of the next stall. The sculptor was all the less hesitant about concluding from M. de Charlus's habits that the Baron's standing in society also must be bad because he possessed no information of any kind about the family to which M. de Charlus belonged, neither his title, nor his name. Just as Cottard thought that everyone knows that the title of Doctor of Medicine means nothing, and that of house surgeon something, so society people are mistaken in imagining that everyone holds the same ideas as themselves and those of their circle concerning the social significance of their names.

The Prince d'Agrigente passed for a foreign vulgarian in the eyes of a club chasseur to whom he owed twenty-five louis, and resumed his importance only in the Faubourg Saint-Germain, where he had three sisters who were duchesses, for the great nobleman has some effect, not on people of modest means, in the eyes of whom he counts for little, but on the brilliant ones, well informed as to his status. For the rest, M. de Charlus was to be able to realize that same evening that the Patron had only very superficial notions concerning the most illustrious ducal families. Convinced that it would be a faux pas on the Verdurins' part to allow a tainted individual to be introduced into their very 'select' salon, the sculptor thought he should take the Patronne aside. 'You're entirely mistaken, anyway I never believe that sort of thing, and besides, even if it were true, I can tell you it wouldn't exactly be compromising me!' replied Mme Verdurin, furious, for Morel being the principal ingredient of her Wednesdays, she was anxious before all else not to upset him. As for Cottard, he could not give an opinion for he had asked to go upstairs for a moment 'on a brief errand' in the buen retiro,[71] and then to write a very urgent letter on behalf of a patient in M. Verdurin's bedroom.

An important publisher from Paris, there on a visit and who had thought he would be asked to stay, went abruptly off, without delay, understanding that he was not fashionable enough for the little clan. He was a tall, powerful man, very dark, studious, with something sharp-edged about him. He looked like an ebony paper knife.[72]

Mme Verdurin who, in order to receive us in her immense drawing-room, where trophies of ornamental grasses, poppies and wildflowers, picked that same day, alternated with the same motif painted in camaieu, two centuries earlier, by an artist of exquisite taste, had got up for a moment from a game of cards she was having with an old friend, and asked for two minutes' grace in order to finish it while going on talking to us. What I told her of my impressions was only half agreeable to her, however. For one thing, I was shocked to find that she and her husband came back in every day long before it was time for the sunsets that were held to be so beautiful, seen from these cliffs, and even more so from the terrace at La Raspelière, for the sake of which I would have travelled great distances. 'Yes, they're incomparable, said Mme Verdurin off-handedly, with a glance at the immense casements that formed a French window. For all that we see them all the time, we never grow tired of them', and her eyes went back to the cards. But my very enthusiasm had made me demanding. I complained of not being able to see from the drawing-room the rocks at Darnetal that Elstir had told me were adorable at this hour of the day, when they refracted so many colours. 'Oh, you can't see them from here, you'd need to go to the end of the garden, to the "Bay-view". From the seat there you can take in the whole panorama. But you can't go there on your own, you'd get lost. I'll take you there, if you like, she added, lamely. – No you don't, come on, weren't the pains you had the other day enough, d'you want to get more of them? He can come back, he'll see the view of the bay another time.' I did not insist, and I realized that for the Verdurins it was enough to know that the setting sun was here in their drawing-room or their dining-room, like a magnificent painting, or a precious Japanese enamel, justifying the high price at which they were renting La Raspelière fully furnished, but to which they seldom raised their eyes; their main business here was to live agreeably, to go on excursions, to eat well, to talk, to entertain agreeable friends whom they made play amusing games of billiards, have good meals and cheerful tea-parties. I found later on, however, how intelligently they had learned to know the locality, taking their guests on excursions as 'original' as the music to which they made them listen. The part that the flowers at La Raspelière, the roads along by the sea, the old houses and the unknown churches played in M. Verdurin's life was so great that those who saw him only in Paris, and who had themselves replaced the life of the seaside and the country with the luxuries of the city, could scarcely comprehend the idea he had formed of his own life, and the importance that his pleasures lent it in his own eyes. This importance had been further increased by the fact that the Verdurins were convinced that La Raspelière, which they were counting on buying, was a property unique in the world. As they saw it, the superiority that their amour propre had led them to ascribe to La Raspelière justified my enthusiasm, which would otherwise have somewhat irritated them, including as it did the disappointments (like those I had once suffered on first hearing Berma) of which I had made sincere confession to them.

'I hear the carriage returning. Let's hope it found them,' the Patronne suddenly murmured. Let it be said in a word that Mme Verdurin, aside even from the changes made inevitable by age, no longer resembled what she had been in the days when Swann and Odette were listening to the little phrase in her house. Even when it was being played, she was no longer obliged to wear that look of exhausted admiration she had adopted in the old days, for it had become her face. Under the impact of countless attacks of neuralgia, brought on by the music of Bach, Wagner, Vinteuil and Debussy, Mme Verdurin's forehead had assumed vast proportions, like limbs finally deformed by rheumatism. Her temples, like two beautiful burning spheres, pain-filled and milky white, in which Harmony rolls undyingly round, had pushed back her silvery tresses on either side and proclaimed, on the Patronne's behalf, without the latter having any need to speak, 'I know what awaits me this evening.' Her features no longer took the trouble to formulate the succession of too strong aesthetic impressions, for they were themselves their permanent expression as it were, in a face both ravaged and majestic. This attitude of resignation to the ever-imminent sufferings inflicted on her by the Beautiful, and of the courage that it took to put on a gown when one was scarcely recovered from the last sonata, meant that, even when listening to the cruellest music, Mme Verdurin kept a disdainfully impassive face and even hid herself in order to swallow her two spoonfuls of aspirin.

'Ah yes, here they are!' exclaimed a relieved M. Verdurin, seeing the door open on Morel, followed by M. de Charlus. The latter, for whom to dine chez Verdurin was certainly not to go into society, but into some place of ill-repute, was as self-conscious as a schoolboy entering for the first time into a brothel and overdoing his respects to the madam. Thus M. de Charlus's customary wish to appear virile and unmoved was overcome (when he appeared in the open doorway) by those notions of a traditional politeness which reawaken the moment self-consciousness destroys an artificial attitude and summons up the resources of the unconscious. When this sense of an instinctive, atavistic politeness towards strangers takes effect in a Charlus, whether he be a nobleman or a bourgeois for that matter, it is always the soul of a relative of the female sex, auxiliary like a goddess or incarnate like a double, who undertakes to introduce him into a new drawing-room and to shape his attitude until such time as he arrives in front of his hostess. Thus will a young painter, brought up by a saintly Protestant cousin, enter, his head on one side and tremulous, looking up at the sky, his hands clutching an invisible muff, the evoked shape of which, together with the real tutelary presence, will assist the self-conscious artist to cross, without any agoraphobia, the chasm-filled space leading from the ante-room into the small drawing-room. Thus it was that the pious relative, the memory of whom is guiding him today, had entered many years ago, with so mournful an expression that they wondered what misfortune she had come to announce, when, from her opening words, they realized, as now with the painter, that she had come to pay a digestive call. By virtue of the same law which holds that, in the interests of an action as yet unperformed, life should exploit, utilize, denature, by a perpetual prostitution, the most respectable, at times the most sacred, and sometimes only the most innocent legacies from the past, and although it might then engender a different aspect, that one of Mme Cottard's nephews who had caused distress to his family by his effeminate ways and the company that he kept, always made his entry joyfully, as if he had come to give you a surprise or announce an inheritance, radiating a happiness of which it would have been pointless to inquire the cause, but which derived from his unconscious heredity and his misplaced sex. He would walk on tiptoe, was himself astonished no doubt not to be holding in his hand a book of visiting-cards, held out his hand while opening his mouth into a heart-shape, as he had seen his aunt doing, and his one worried glance was at the mirror, where he seemed to want to make sure, bare-headed though he was, whether, as Mme Cottard had asked Swann one day, his hat was not on crooked. As for M. de Charlus, whom the society in which he had lived had provided, at this critical juncture, with different examples, other arabesques of affability, and the maxim that we must be able, in certain cases, even for members of the petty bourgeoisie, to show off and exploit our rarest charms, normally held in reserve, it was fluttering affectedly, and with the same ampleness to his waddlings as though they were hobbled and made broader by his being in a skirt, that he made for Mme Verdurin, wearing so flattered and honoured an expression that you might have thought that to be introduced to her was for him a supreme favour. His half-bowed face, on which self-satisfaction did battle with propriety, was creased by small lines of affability. You might have thought you saw Mme de Marsantes coming forward, so conspicuous at that moment was the woman that nature's error had introduced into M. de Charlus's body. It is true that the Baron had laboured hard to conceal that error, and to acquire a masculine appearance. But hardly had he succeeded before, having during this same time preserved the same tastes, the habit of feeling as a woman lent him a new feminine appearance, engendered this time not by his heredity but by his individual way of life. And since he had gradually come to think, even about social matters, in the feminine, and this without even noticing, for it is not only by dint of lying to others, but also of lying to ourselves, that we cease to notice that we are lying, although he had demanded of his body that it manifest (at the moment of entering the Verdurins' house) all the courtesy of a great nobleman, that body, which had clearly grasped what M. de Charlus had ceased to understand, deployed all the seductiveness of a grande dame, to the point where the Baron might have merited the epithet of 'lady-like'. Can we in any case entirely separate M. de Charlus's appearance from the fact that, sons not always taking after their fathers, even if they are not inverts and go in pursuit of women, they may consummate the profanation of their mothers in their faces? But let us here leave what would merit a chapter on its own: the profanation of mothers.

Although other reasons may have presided over this transformation in M. de Charlus, and purely physical ferments have caused matter to 'work' in him and his body gradually to pass over into the category of women's bodies, the change we are here registering was spiritual in origin. By dint of believing ourselves to be ill, we become so, we lose weight, we no longer have the strength to get up, we suffer from nervous enteritis. By dint of having tender thoughts about men, we become a woman and a false skirt impedes our steps. In such cases, the idée fixe can modify (as in other cases our health) our gender. Morel, who was behind him, came to greet me. From that moment on, because of a twofold change that had occurred in him, he created (I was unable to take account of it soon enough, alas!) a bad impression on me. Here is why. I have said that Morel, having escaped from servitude under his father, generally indulged in a very disdainful familiarity. On the day when he had brought me the photographs, he had spoken without even once calling me 'Monsieur', treating me condescendingly. How surprised I was then, at Mme Verdurin's, to find him bowing very low to me, and to me alone, and to hear, even before any other utterance, words of respect, most respectful – the words I had thought it impossible to bring beneath his pen or onto his lips – being addressed to me! I at once got the impression he had something to ask of me. Leading me aside a minute or two later: 'Monsieur would be doing me a very great service, he said, going so far this time as to address me in the third person, by concealing altogether from Mme Verdurin and her guests the kind of profession that my father exercised at his uncle's. It would be better to say that, in your family, he was the steward of estates so vast that it made him the equal practically of your parents.' Morel's request annoyed me very greatly, not because it forced me to exaggerate his father's situation, which was all one to me, but my own father's at least apparent wealth, which I thought ridiculous. But so unhappy and so urgent was his expression that I did not refuse. 'No, before dinner, he said in a tone of entreaty, Monsieur has countless pretexts for taking Mme Verdurin aside.' Which was what in fact I did, attempting as best I could to enhance the distinction of Morel's father, without exaggerating overmuch the 'standard of living' or the 'worldly wealth' of my family. This was accepted without a murmur, despite the astonishment of Mme Verdurin, who had known my grandfather slightly. But as she lacked tact, and detested families (that solvent of the little nucleus), after telling me that she had once caught sight of my great-grandfather, and speaking of him as of some semi-imbecile who would not have understood the first thing about the little group and who, as she put it, 'was not one of us', she said: 'Families are such a nuisance in any case, one aspires only to escape from them'; and she at once recounted one of my grandfather's traits of which I was unaware, although at home I had had suspicions (I never knew him, but he was much talked about) as to his uncommon avariciousness (as opposed to the rather too ostentatious generosity of my great-uncle, the friend of the lady in pink and Morel's father's employer): 'The very fact that your grandparents had such a smart steward proves that there are people of every stripe in a family. Your grandfather's father was so miserly that, almost gaga by the end of his life – between ourselves, he was never very bright, you make up for all of them – he couldn't bring himself to spend three sous on an omnibus. So that they were obliged to have someone go after him, to pay the conductor separately, and give the old skinflint to believe that his friend, M. de Persigny,[73] a minister of state, had arranged for him to travel on the buses gratis. Anyway, I'm very glad that our Morel's father should have been so respectable. I'd understood he taught at a lycée, but never mind, I'd misunderstood. But it hardly matters, for I must tell you that here we appreciate only people's inner worth, the personal contribution, what I call participation. Provided you are of the guild, provided in short you are of the brotherhood, the rest matters little.' Morel's way of being of it – so far as I could make out – was to be sufficiently fond of both men and women to give pleasure to either sex with the help of the experiments he had conducted on the other; as will be seen in due course. But what it is essential to say here is that, the moment I had given him my word to approach Mme Verdurin, the moment I had done so above all, when there was no going back, Morel's 'respect' for me took wing as if by magic, the respectful formulae vanished, and for a time he avoided me even, contriving to make it look as though he despised me, so that if Mme Verdurin wanted me to say something to him, to ask him for a particular piece of music, he went on talking to one of the faithful, then moved on to another, and changed his position if I went up to him. They were obliged to tell him up to three or four times that I had addressed him, after which he would answer me, briefly, with an air of constraint, unless we were alone. In which case, he was expansive and amicable, for he had charming sides to his character. I concluded nonetheless from that first evening that he must be low by nature, that he would not shrink when need be from any obsequiousness and knew nothing of gratitude. In which he resembled the common run of mankind. But as I had something of my grandmother in me, and took pleasure in men's diversity without expecting anything from them or holding anything against them, I overlooked his servility, took pleasure in his gaiety when it showed itself, and even in what I took to have been genuine friendship on his part when, having reviewed the full range of his false knowledge of human nature, he realized (in fits and starts, for he had strange regressions to his blind and primitive savagery) that my kindness towards him was disinterested, that my indulgence stemmed not from a lack of clear-sightedness but from what he called goodness of heart, and above all I was enchanted by his artistry, which was hardly anything more than an admirable virtuosity but which caused me (without his being in the intellectual sense of the word a true musician) to hear again, or to get to know, so much beautiful music. Moreover, a manager, M. de Charlus, of whose talents in this direction I had been unaware (although Mme de Guermantes, who had known a very different Charlus in their young days, claimed that he had written her a sonata, had painted a fan for her, and so on), modest where his own superior abilities, first-rate though they were, were concerned, had been able to harness this virtuosity to a manifold artistic sense, which magnified it tenfold. You are to imagine some merely skilful performer from the Ballets Russes, trained, taught and brought on in every sense by M. de Diaghilev.

I had just passed on to Mme Verdurin the message I had been entrusted with by Morel and was talking to M. de Charlus about Saint-Loup, when Cottard entered the drawing-room to announce, as if there were a fire, that the Cambremers were arriving. So as not to appear, in front of newcomers like M. de Charlus (whom Cottard had not seen) and myself, to attach too great an importance to the arrival of the Cambremers, Mme Verdurin did not stir, made no response to the announcement of this news, but contented herself with saying to the Doctor, fanning herself gracefully and in the same artificial tone of voice as a marquise at the Théâtre-Français: 'The Baron was just saying…' This was too much for Cottard! Less animatedly than would once have been the case, for his practice and his high positions had slowed down his delivery, but with the emotion all the same that he recovered at the Verdurins': 'A Baron! Where, where's a Baron? Where's a Baron?' he exclaimed, looking around for him with an astonishment bordering on incredulity. Mme Verdurin, with the affected indifference of a hostess one of whose servants has just smashed a precious glass in front of her guests, and with the artificial, over-shrill intonation of a first prizewinner at the Conservatoire playing in Dumas fils,[74] replied, indicating Morel's patron with her fan: 'But the Baron de Charlus, to whom I am about to introduce you… Monsieur le Professeur Cottard.' Mme Verdurin was not displeased as it happens to have an opportunity to play the lady. M. de Charlus held out two fingers, which the Professor shook with the benevolent smile of a 'prince of science'. But he stopped dead on seeing the Cambremers enter, while M. de Charlus drew me into a corner to say a word to me, not without feeling my muscles, which is a German custom. M. de Cambremer bore little resemblance to the old Marquise. He was, as she used affectionately to put it, 'altogether on his father's side'. For anyone who had only heard speak of him, or even of letters from him, of a lively and apt turn of phrase, his physical appearance was a surprise. No doubt you would grow accustomed to it. But his nose, in order to come and take up its crooked position above his mouth, had chosen perhaps the one oblique line, out of so many, that you would never have thought of tracing on that face, one which denoted a common stupidity, made even worse by the proximity of an apple-red Norman complexion. It is possible that M. de Cambremer's eyes had preserved in their lids something of that Le Cotentin sky, so soft on those beautiful sunny days when the stroller is amused to see, halted beside the road, and to count in their hundreds, the shadows of the poplar trees, but those heavy, rheumy, badly drooping eyelids would have prevented intelligence itself from passing through. And so, disconcerted by the thinness of that blue gaze, you turned back to the big, crooked nose. By a transposition of the senses, M. de Cambremer looked at you with his nose. This nose of M. de Cambremer's was not ugly, but rather a little too beautiful, too strong, too vain of its own importance. Hooked, polished, shiny, spanking new, it was quite prepared to make up for the spiritual insufficiency of his gaze; unfortunately, if the eyes are sometimes the organ in which intelligence is revealed, the nose (whatever their intimate solidarity and the unsuspected repercussions of one feature on the others), the nose is generally the organ in which stupidity exhibits itself the most readily.

For all that the decorousness of the sombre clothing that M. de Cambremer always wore, even in the mornings, reassured those dazzled and exasperated by the insolent brilliance of the beach costumes of the people whom they did not know, you could not understand why the wife of the First President should declare, with an air of expertise and of authority, as someone having had greater experience of Alençon's high society than yourself, that with M. de Cambremer you at once felt yourself, even before knowing who he was, in the presence of a man of great refinement, a man of perfect breeding, who made a change after the Balbec kind, a man in short in whose company you could breathe freely. On her, asphyxiated as she was by so many Balbec tourists, who knew nothing of her world, he had the effect of a flask of smelling-salts. He struck me, on the contrary, as one of those people whom my grandmother would have at once found to be 'quite unpresentable', and since she did not understand snobbery, she would no doubt have been amazed that he had managed to be married to Mlle Legrandin, who must have been very hard to satisfy when it came to refinement, she whose brother was so very 'presentable'. At best, it might have been said of M. de Cambremer's common ugliness that it rather belonged to the locality, possessing something of its ancient past; faced by his defective features, which one would have liked to rectify, you thought of the names of those small Normandy towns about whose etymology my curé had been mistaken, because the country people, articulating badly or having understood amiss the Norman or Latin word that designated them, had finally perpetuated a misconception and a corrupt pronunciation in a barbarism that was already to be found in the cartularies, as Brichot would have said. Life in these small old towns can anyway be spent agreeably, and M. de Cambremer must have had his good qualities, for if it was only natural that, as a mother, the old Marquise should have preferred her son to her daughter-in-law, she often declared in return, she who had several children, two or three of whom were not without talents, that the Marquis was in her opinion the best one of the family. During the short time he had spent in the army, his comrades, finding Cambremer too much of a mouthful, had given him the nickname of Cancan,[75] which he had as it happens in no way deserved. He knew how to adorn a dinner party to which he had been invited by saying on the arrival of the fish course (even were the fish to be high) or the entrée: 'I say though, what a fine beast we seem to have here.' And his wife, having, on entering the family, adopted all that she thought formed part of this society's style of living, put herself on to the same level as her husband's friends, and sought perhaps to please him like a mistress, as if in the old days she had been involved in his life as a bachelor, by saying with a detached air when talking about him to officers: 'You'll be seeing Cancan. Cancan has gone to Balbec, but he'll be back this evening.' She was furious to be jeopardizing her reputation this evening at the Verdurins' and had done so only at the entreaties of her mother-in-law and husband, for the sake of the tenancy. But being less well brought up than they, she made no secret of the motive and for the past fortnight had been having a good laugh with her woman friends about this dinner. 'You know we're having dinner with our tenants. That'll be well worth a rise. Basically, I'm rather curious to find out what they may have done to our poor old La Raspelière (as though she had been born there, and found it full of mementos of her family). Our old keeper told me only yesterday the whole place has become unrecognizable. I don't dare to think about all that must be going on in there. I think we'd do well to have it all fumigated before we move back in.' She arrived haughty and morose, with the air of a great lady whose château, on account of a war, has been occupied by the enemy, but who feels at home nonetheless and is keen to show the victors that they are intruders. Mme de Cambremer could not see me to start with, for I was in a bay to one side with M. de Charlus, who was telling me he had learned from Morel that his father had been a 'steward' in my family, and that he, Charlus, was relying sufficiently on my intelligence and my magnanimity (a term common to both him and Swann) to deny myself the mean and unworthy pleasure that common young imbeciles (I had been warned) would not fail to take in my position by revealing to our hosts details that the latter might think demeaning. 'The mere fact that I take an interest in him and extend my protection over him has something supereminent about it and abolishes the past,' concluded the Baron. Even as I was listening to him, and pledging him the silence which I would have kept even without the hope of being thought in exchange intelligent and magnanimous, I was looking at Mme de Cambremer. And I had difficulty recognizing the melting, toothsome article whose company I had enjoyed the other day at teatime, on the terrace in Balbec, in the Normandy galette I saw now, hard as a pebble, into which the faithful would have tried to sink their teeth in vain. Irritated in advance by the easy-going side that her husband had got from his mother, and which meant that he would assume an honoured expression when the faithful were being introduced to him, but anxious all the same to fulfil her functions as a woman of the world, once Brichot had been presented to her she wanted him to make the acquaintance of her husband, as she had seen the more elegant of her woman friends doing, but fury or pride prevailing over the flaunting of her savoir-vivre, she said, not as she should have done, 'Allow me to introduce my husband,' but 'Meet my husband,' so keeping the flag of the Cambremers flying high, in spite of themselves, for the Marquis bowed as low in front of Brichot as she had anticipated. But Mme de Cambremer's whole mood changed suddenly when she noticed M. de Charlus, whom she knew by sight. Never had she succeeded in getting herself introduced to him, even in the days of the liaison she had had with Swann. For M. de Charlus, who always took the woman's side, of his sister-in-law against M. de Guermantes's mistresses, of Odette, at that time not yet married, but an old liaison of Swann's, against the new ones, was a stern defender of morality and a loyal protector of married couples, and had given Odette – and kept – his word that he would not allow himself to be presented to Mme de Cambremer. The latter had certainly never suspected that it was at the Verdurins' that she would finally meet this unapproachable man. M. de Cambremer knew that it was so great a delight to her that he was himself affected, and he looked at his wife with an expression that signified: 'You're glad you decided to come, aren't you?' He spoke as it happens very little, knowing that he had married a superior woman. 'Me, unworthy,' he was forever saying, readily quoting a fable of La Fontaine's and another by Florian[76] which he saw as applying to his own ignorance, and as enabling him, on the other hand, under the guise of a disdainful flattery, to demonstrate to the men of learning who were not members of the Jockey Club that one could both be a sportsman and have read fables. The unfortunate thing was that he only really knew two. Thus these recurred frequently. Mme de Cambremer was not stupid but she had various very irritating habits. In her case, the deformation of people's names had absolutely nothing of aristocratic disdain about it. She would not have said, unlike the Duchesse de Guermantes (whose birth should have shielded her, more so than Mme de Cambremer, against such an absurdity), so as to appear not to know the far from fashionable name (whereas it is now that of one of the least approachable of women) of Julien de Monchâteau: 'a little Madame… Pico de la Mirandola'.[77] No, when Mme de Cambremer got a name wrong it was out of kindness, so as to appear not to know something, and when, out of sincerity, she all the same admitted it, she thought she could hide it by removing the name-tag. If she was defending a woman, for example, she would seek to disguise the fact, while wanting not to lie to someone who was begging her to tell the truth, that Madame Such-and-Such was currently the mistress of M. Sylvain Lévy, and would say: 'No… I know nothing whatsoever about her, I believe she's been criticized for having kindled a passion in some gentleman whose name I don't know, something like Cahn, Kohn, Kuhn; anyway, I believe that this gentleman has long since died and that there was never anything between them.' The procedure is similar – though the reverse of theirs – to that of those liars who, by editing their activities when recounting them to a mistress or simply to a friend, imagine that neither one nor the other will at once see that the sentence spoken (as in the case of Cahn, Kohn, Kuhn) is an interpolation, is of another species from those making up the conversation, that it has a false bottom.

Mme Verdurin asked in her husband's ear: 'Do I give my arm to the Baron de Charlus? Since you'll have Mme de Cambremer on your right, we could have swapped courtesies. – No, said M. Verdurin, as the other is higher in rank (meaning that M. de Cambremer was a Marquis), M. de Charlus is in fact his inferior. – Very well, I'll put him next to the Princesse.' And Mme Verdurin introduced Mme Sherbatoff to M. de Charlus; the pair of them bowed silently, as much as to say they knew all about one another but promised to keep a mutual secret. M. Verdurin introduced me to M. de Cambremer. Even before he had spoken, in his loud voice with its slight stammer, his tall stature and high colour had displayed in their oscillation the martial hesitation of a superior officer who tries to put you at your ease and says: 'They've had a word with me, we'll sort things out; I'll get your punishment lifted; we're not man-eaters; it'll all be all right.' Then, shaking my hand: 'I believe you know my mother,' he said. The verb 'believe' he thought appropriate to the wariness of a first introduction but in no way to express doubt, for he went on: 'Anyway, I have a letter from her for you.' M. de Cambremer was artlessly happy to revisit the place where he had lived for so long. 'I am rediscovering myself,' he said to Mme Verdurin, as his wondering gaze recognized the painted flowers on the trumeaux above the doors, and the marble busts on their tall pedestals. He may, however, have felt disoriented, for Mme Verdurin had brought in any amount of fine old things that she owned. From which point of view, Mme Verdurin, though regarded by the Cambremers as having turned everything upside down, was not a revolutionary but intelligently conservative, in a sense which they could not understand. Thus they accused her, wrongly, of hating the old house and of dishonouring it with simple fabrics in place of their own opulent plush, like an ignorant curé criticizing the diocesan architect for reinstating the old wooden carvings that had been stored away, for which the cleric had seen fit to substitute ornaments bought in the place Saint-Sulpice.[78] What was more, in front of the château, a small mixed garden had started to replace the flower-beds that had been the pride and joy not only of the Cambremers but of their gardener. The latter, who looked on the Cambremers as his sole masters, and groaned beneath the yoke of the Verdurins, as if the land had been temporarily occupied by an invader and a troop of marauding soldiery, went off secretly bearing his grievances to the dispossessed owner, waxed indignant at the contempt in which his araucarias, his begonias, his sempervivums and his double dahlias were held, and that anyone should dare, in so opulent a residence, to grow such commonplace flowers as anthemis or maidenhair fern. Mme Verdurin had sensed this stubborn resistance and had decided, should she take a long lease or even buy La Raspelière, to set as a condition the dismissal of the gardener, to whom the old owner was, on the contrary, exceedingly attached. He had served her for nothing in times of hardship, and adored her; but thanks to the bizarre compartmentalization of opinion among the common people, where the profoundest moral contempt may be enclosed within the most heartfelt esteem, the which in its turn overlaps with old, unended grudges, he often used to say about Mme de Cambremer, who, in '70, in a château she owned in the east, surprised by the invasion, had had, for a whole month, to endure the contact of the Germans: 'What Madame la Marquise's been much criticized for is, during the war, to have taken the Prussian side and even put them up in her house. At any other time, I'd have understood; but in time of war, she shouldn't have done. It's not right.' So that he was undyingly loyal to her, revered her for her kindness, yet credited that she had been guilty of treason. Mme Verdurin was piqued that M. de Cambremer should claim to recognize La Raspelière so easily. 'You must find a few changes all the same, she replied. First of all, there were those terrible great Barbedienne bronzes[79] and some nasty little plush chairs that I wasted no time packing off to the attic, which is still too good for them.' After which acerbic rejoinder directed at M. de Cambremer, she offered him her arm to go to the table. He hesitated for a moment, saying to himself: 'All the same, I can't go in ahead of M. de Charlus.' But imagining that the latter was an old friend of the household, seeing that he did not have the place of honour, he decided to take the arm he was being offered and told Mme Verdurin how proud he was to have been admitted into the cénacle (which is how he referred to the little nucleus, not without a short laugh of satisfaction at knowing the term). Cottard, who was sitting next to M. de Charlus, looked at him underneath his eyeglass so as to make his acquaintance and break the ice, with winks that were far more insistent than they would once have been, and not diluted by any shyness. His winning glances, magnified by their smile, were no longer contained by the eyepiece but overflowed it on every side. The Baron, who was quick to find men of his own kind wherever he was, did not doubt that Cottard was one such and was giving him the eye. He at once displayed to the Professor the severity of the invert, as contemptuous of those who feel attracted by him as he is all ardour and attentiveness towards those for whom he feels an attraction. Although everyone talks, untruthfully, of the comforts, forever denied to us by fate, of being loved, it is no doubt a general law, whose writ is very far from running to the Charluses alone, that we should find the person whom we do not love but who loves us unbearable. To such a person, to the woman of whom we will say not that she loves us but that she has her hooks into us, we prefer the company of any other woman at all, who has neither her charm, nor her attractions, nor her brains. She will only get these back so far as we are concerned once she has ceased loving us. In which sense, we might see, in the irritation produced in an invert by a man he finds unattractive but who seeks him out, simply the transposition, in a comical form, of this universal rule. With him, however, it is far more powerful. Thus, whereas the common run of men try to conceal it even as they experience it, the invert is implacable in letting the man who has provoked it know, as he would certainly not let a woman know, M. de Charlus, for example, with the Princesse de Guermantes, whose passion annoyed yet flattered him. But when they find another man displaying a particular proclivity towards them, then, whether it be incomprehension that it should be the same as their own, or an unfortunate reminder that this proclivity, found beautiful by them for as long as it is they who are experiencing it, is looked on as a vice, or a desire to rehabilitate themselves by an outburst in circumstances where it will not cost them anything, or out of a fear of detection which they suddenly rediscover when desire is no longer leading them on, blindfold, from one rash act to the next, or in fury at suffering, by virtue of someone else's equivocal attitude, the injury they would not have shrunk from causing that other person by their own attitude had they found him attractive, the men who are not embarrassed to follow a young man for miles on end, or never to take their eyes off him at the theatre even if he is with friends, thereby risking causing a rift between them, they can be heard to say, the minute someone for whom they feel no attraction looks at them: 'Who do you take me for, Monsieur? (simply because they are being taken for what they are), I don't understand you, no, no good insisting, you're making a mistake', going as far as a slap in the face if necessary, and, in front of someone who knows the rash individual in question, becoming indignant: 'What, you know this horror? The way it has of looking at one! Such manners!' M. de Charlus did not go as far as this, but he assumed the frosty, offended expression that women who are not loose have when people appear to think that they are, and even more the women who are so. Moreover, the invert brought face to face with an invert sees not simply a displeasing image of himself which, purely inanimate, could injure only his self-esteem, but another himself, alive, active in the same direction, and capable therefore of injuring him in his amours. Thus he is following his instinct for self-preservation when he runs this potential rival down, either to the people who are capable of doing the latter harm (without Invert No i concerning himself about being taken for a liar when thus condemning Invert No 2 in the eyes of people who may be well informed about his own case), or to the young man whom he has 'started', who is going perhaps to be taken away from him and who needs to be convinced that the same things that he would find every advantage in doing with him would be the greatest of misfortunes were he to allow himself to do them with the other. For M. de Charlus, mindful perhaps of the (quite imaginary) dangers that the presence of this Cottard, whose smile he had misinterpreted, would incur for Morel, an invert who did not attract him was not merely a caricature of himself, he was also a rival designate. If, when setting foot in the provincial town where he has come to settle permanently, a tradesman in an unusual line of business sees directly facing him, in the same square, the same business being carried on by a competitor, he is not any more discomfited than a Charlus who, having gone off to conduct his love-life privately in some tranquil spot, catches sight, on the day of his arrival, of the local squire, or the barber, whose appearance and mannerisms leave him in no doubt. The tradesman will often develop a hatred for his competitor; this hatred sometimes degenerates into melancholy, and if his heredity be even slightly tainted, the tradesman in small towns has been known to show the first signs of insanity, which can be cured only by persuading him to sell his 'good-will' and expatriate himself. The fury of the invert is more obsessional still. He has realized from the very first instant that the squire and the barber have desired his young companion. It is no good his repeating to the latter a hundred times a day that the barber and the squire are ruffians any contact with whom would dishonour him, he is obliged, like Harpagon,[80] to watch over his treasure and gets up during the night to see whether it is being stolen from him. Which is what no doubt, more even than desire or the convenience of a common habit, and almost as much as that experience of ourselves which is alone true, makes one invert able to sniff out another with an almost infallible rapidity and certainty. He may be momentarily mistaken, but is quickly able to redivine the truth. Thus M. de Charlus's error was short-lived. A godlike discernment showed him a moment later that Cottard was not of his own kind and that he had no need to fear his advances, either for himself, which would merely have exasperated him, or for Morel, which would have seemed to him more serious. He recovered his composure, and since he was still under the influence of the transit of Venus Androgyne, he smiled feebly now and again at the Verdurins without taking the trouble to open his mouth, but simply uncreasing one corner of his lips, and for a second allowed his eyes to light up affectionately, he who was so besotted with virility, just as his sister-in-law the Duchesse de Guermantes would have done. 'Do you do much hunting, Monsieur? Mme Verdurin said contemptuously to M. de Cambremer. – Has Ski told you about our great adventure? Cottard asked the Patronne. – I hunt mainly in the forest of Chantepie, answered M. de Cambremer. – No, I haven't told her anything, said Ski. – Does it deserve its name?'[81] Brichot asked M. de Cambremer, having glanced at me out of the corner of his eye, for he had promised to talk etymologies, while asking me to keep from the Cambremers the contempt with which those of the curé had filled him. 'It's no doubt because I'm incapable of understanding, but I don't follow your question, said M. de Cambremer. – I mean, do many magpies sing there?' answered Brichot. Cottard meanwhile was suffering from the fact that Mme Verdurin was not aware that they had all but missed the train. 'Come on now, said Mme Cottard to her husband, in order to encourage him, recount your odyssey. – Yes indeed, it's quite out of the ordinary, said the Doctor, who recommenced his narrative. When I saw that the train was in the station I was thunderstruck. And all by the fault of Ski. You're somewhat quaint with your information, mon cher! And with Brichot waiting for us at the station – I thought, said the university man, casting what remained of his gaze around him and smiling with his thin lips, that if you had been delayed at Graincourt, it was because you had encountered some lady of the peripatetic school. – Hold your tongue, will you? Supposing my wife were to hear you! said the Professor. The little woman, he jealous. – Oh, that Brichot,' exclaimed Ski, whose traditional gaiety had been aroused by Brichot's risqué joke, 'ever the same,' although he did not know truth to tell whether the university man had ever been dirty-minded. And in order to add the ritual gesture to these hallowed words, he made as if he were unable to resist the urge to pinch his leg. 'Quite a lad, he never changes,' Ski went on, and, not reflecting on how sad and how comic the academic's semi-blindness made the words seem, he added: 'Ever one eye on the ladies. – There, you see, said M. de Cambremer, that's what it's like when you encounter a scholar. I've been hunting in the forest of Chantepie these past fifteen years and not once did I ask myself what the name might mean.' Mme de Cambremer cast a stern glance at her husband; she would not have wanted him to humble himself like this in front of Brichot. She was even more displeased when, each time Cancan employed a 'ready-made' expression, Cottard, who knew both their strengths and their weaknesses, having learned them so laboriously, demonstrated to the Marquis, who had owned to being stupid, that they did not mean anything: 'Why "dull as ditchwater"? Do you think ditchwater is duller than anything else? You say "forty winks". Why forty particularly? Why "sleep like a log"? Why "go west"? Why "paint the town red"?' But then Brichot undertook to defend M. de Cambremer, by explaining the origins of each expression. But Mme de Cambremer was chiefly occupied in examining the changes the Verdurins had brought about at La Raspelière, so as to be able to criticize some of these and to import others, or the same ones perhaps, into Féterne. 'I ask myself what that chandelier is that's all askew. I have difficulty recognizing my old Raspelière,' she added, with a familiarly aristocratic air, as though she had been speaking of a retainer, and claiming less to be denoting his age than saying that he had seen her born. And as she was somewhat bookish in her language: 'All the same, she added, in an undertone, I fancy that, were I to live in someone else's house, I'd be rather ashamed to alter everything like this. – It's unfortunate you didn't come with them,' said Mme Verdurin to M. de Charlus and Morel, hoping that M. de Charlus would 'be back' and would yield to the rule of all arriving by the same train. 'You're sure Chantepie means the magpie that sings, Chochotte?' she added, to demonstrate that, great hostess that she was, she took part in all the conversations at once. 'Tell me a little bit about this violinist, Mme de Cambremer said to me, he interests me; I adore music, and I fancy I've heard speak of him, you must educate me.' She had found out that Morel had come with M. de Charlus and wanted, by getting the first to come, to try and make a friend of the second. She added, however, so that I might not guess this reason: 'M. Brichot, too, interests me.' For though she was highly cultivated, just as certain people predisposed to obesity eat hardly anything and walk all day long without ceasing visibly to put on weight, so, for all that Mme de Cambremer had delved more deeply, at Féterne especially, into an increasingly esoteric philosophy and an increasingly learned kind of music, she emerged from these studies only to contrive schemes that might enable her to 'drop' the bourgeois friendships of her young days and form relationships that she had thought at first were part of her in-laws' society but which she had then realized were situated much higher up and much further off. A philosopher who was not sufficiently modern for her, Leibnitz, has said that the journey from the intellect to the heart is a long one. Mme de Cambremer had proved no more up to making it than her brother. Stopping from reading Stuart Mill only to start reading Lachelier,[82] the less she came to believe in the reality of the external world, the greater the zeal with which she tried to create a position for herself in it before she died. Besotted as she was with realism in art, no object seemed to her humble enough to serve as the painter or the writer's model. A society picture or novel she would have found nauseating; Tolstoy's muzhiks, or Millet's peasants,[83] were the absolute limit, socially speaking, which she would not allow the artist to go beyond. Yet to overstep that which limited her own social dealings, to ascend to associating with duchesses, was the aim of all her endeavours, so ineffective was the spiritual discipline to which she subjected herself through the study of masterpieces against the morbid and congenital snobbery that had grown up in her. This last had in the end cured certain tendencies towards avarice and adultery to which she had been liable when young, in which it resembled those singular and permanent pathological states that appear to immunize those afflicted by them against other diseases. Listening to her, I could not for the rest help but acknowledge, without deriving any pleasure from it, the refinement of her expressions. They were those common, in any given period, to everyone of the same intellectual calibre, so that the refined expression at once supplies an arc of the circle as it were, the means of describing and limiting the whole circumference. Thus these expressions mean that the people who employ them at once annoy me, as being already familiar, yet also pass for being superior, and were often held out to me as delightful and unappreciated neighbours. 'You are not unaware, Madame, that many forest regions derive their names from the animals that populate them. Next to the forest of Chantepie, you have the woods of Chantereine. – I don't know who the queen in question is,[84] but you're not being very gallant to her, said M. de Cambremer. – Take that! Chochotte, said Mme Verdurin. Apart from which, did you have a good journey? – We encountered only vague specimens of humanity, who filled the train. But I must answer M. de Cambremer's question; the reine here isn't a queen, the wife of a king, but a frog. It's the name it kept for a long time in these parts, witness the station of Renneville, which ought to be written as Reineville. – You seem to have a fine beast there,' said M. de Cambremer to Mme Verdurin, pointing to a fish. This was one of the compliments with the help of which he thought he could pay his way at a dinner-party, and already return the courtesy. ('There's no point in inviting them, he would often say to his wife, referring to one or other lot of friends. They were delighted to have us. It was they who thanked me.') 'Anyway, I have to tell you that I've been going just about every day to Renneville for many years, and I've not seen any more frogs there than elsewhere. Mme de Cambremer brought the curé of a parish where she owns a lot of property here, who's of the same way of thinking as yourself, I fancy. He's written a book. – He has indeed, I read it with the utmost interest,' answered Brichot, hypocritically. The satisfaction that his vanity received indirectly from this answer brought a long laugh from M. de Cambremer. 'Ah, well, the author of, how shall I put it, this geography, this glossary, holds forth at length on the name of a small locality of which we were once, if I may say so, the lords, by the name of Pont-à-Couleuvre. Now I'm obviously just a common ignoramus compared with that fount of learning, but I've been to Pont-à-Couleuvre scores of times to his once, and I'll be damned if I've ever seen ever one of those nasty serpents,[85] I say nasty, despite the praise the good La Fontaine bestows on them ('The Man and the Snake' was one of his two fables.) – You've not seen any, and it's you who has seen aright, replied Brichot. True, the writer you speak of knows his subject backwards, he's written a remarkable book. – Indeed! burst out Mme Verdurin, that book, it's right to say, is a true labour of love. – No doubt he consulted a few terriers (meaning by that the lists of benefices and cures for each parish), which may have supplied him with the names of the lay patrons and ecclesiastical collators. But there are other sources. One of my most learned friends has drawn on them. He found that the same place was given the name of Pont-à-Quileuvre. This bizarre name inspired him to go further back still, to a Latin text where the bridge that your friend believes to be infested with snakes is given as Pons cui aperit. A closed bridge opened only on payment of a fair toll. – You talk of frogs. Finding myself in the midst of such learned people, I have the impression of being the frog before the Areopagus' (this was the second fable),[86] said Cancan, who made this joke frequently, laughing loudly, thinking by means of it, in his humility and very aptly, at once to profess his ignorance and make a display of his learning. As for Cottard, blocked by the silence of M. de Charlus and searching for air in other directions, he turned to me and put one of those questions which impressed his patients if he had guessed right and thus shown that he was, so to speak, inside their bodies; and if, on the contrary, he had guessed wrong, enabled him to rectify certain theories and broaden his former points of view. 'When you come to these relatively elevated situations, such as that where we find ourselves in at this moment, have you noticed whether it increases your tendency to breathless attacks?' he asked me, certain either of making me admire him, or else of completing his education. M. de Cambremer heard the question and smiled. 'I can't tell you how much it amuses me to hear you have breathless attacks,' he threw at me across the table. By which he did not mean that it cheered him up, although that was in fact the case. For this excellent man could not hear speak of another's misfortune without a sense of well-being and a spasm of hilarity which quickly made way for the compassion of a kind heart. But his words had another meaning, made clear by those that followed: 'It amuses me, he said, because in fact my sister does, too.' In short, it amused him as if he had heard me naming as one of my friends someone who had been a frequent visitor to their house. 'What a small world,' was the reflection that he formulated to himself and which I saw written on his smiling face when Cottard mentioned my breathless attacks. And, starting with that dinner-party, these became like a sort of common link, for news of which M. de Cambremer never failed to ask me, if only in order to pass it on to his sister.

Even as I replied to the questions his wife put to me concerning Morel, I was thinking about a conversation I had had with my mother during the afternoon. As, while not advising me against going to the Verdurins' if it might amuse me, she was reminding me that it was a milieu that would not have appealed to my grandfather but would have made him shout 'Turn out the guard!', my mother had added: 'Listen, President Toureuil and his wife told me they had had lunch with Mme Bontemps. I wasn't asked anything. But I thought I gathered that a marriage between you and Albertine would be her aunt's dearest wish. I think the real reason is they all find you very sympathetic. At the same time, I fancy the luxury they think you would be able to give her, the connections they more or less know we have, all that's not unconnected with it, I fancy, though secondary. I wouldn't have mentioned it to you, because I'm not keen on it, but as I imagine people will bring it up, I preferred to forestall them. – But you, what do you think of her? I had asked my mother. – Me? I shan't be marrying her. You could certainly do a thousand times better where marriage is concerned. But I don't think your grandmother would have liked you to be influenced. At present, I can't tell you what I think of Albertine, I don't think of her. I shall say to you, like Mme de Sévigné, "She has good qualities, or so I believe. But at the start, I am able to praise her only with negatives. She is not this, she does not have a Rennes accent. In time I shall perhaps say, she is that."[87] And I shall always think well of her if she is to make you happy.' But by these same words, which put the decision concerning my happiness back into my own hands, my mother had plunged me into that state of doubt in which I had been already when, my father having given me permission to go to Phèdre, and above all to become a man of letters, I had suddenly felt too heavy a responsibility, the fear of upsetting him, and the melancholy that comes when we cease to obey orders which, day by day, hide the future from us, and realize that we have at last begun to live life in earnest, as a grown-up person, to live the one life of which each of us is free to dispose.

It would be best perhaps to wait a little, to begin by seeing Albertine as in the past, so as to try and find out whether I truly loved her. I could amuse her by bringing her to the Verdurins', and that reminded me that I had come there myself this evening only in order to discover whether Mme Putbus was staying there, or would be coming. She was not dining at all events. 'Apropos of your friend Saint-Loup,' Mme de Cambremer said to me, thus making use of an expression that indicated a greater logic in her thoughts than her words might have given one to suppose, for though she had been talking to me about music, her mind had been on the Guermantes, 'you know everyone's talking about his marriage with the Princesse de Guermantes's niece. I must tell you that for my own part, I don't give a fig for all this social tittle-tattle.' I was seized by a fear of having spoken unsympathetically in front of Robert about a girl whose originality was false and whose mind was as second-rate as her character was violent. There is almost no piece of news that we learn which does not cause us to regret some remark of ours. I replied to Mme de Cambremer, what was in any case the truth, that I knew nothing about it, and that anyway his fiancée had struck me as still very young. 'That's perhaps the reason why it's not yet official; it's on everyone's lips, at all events. – I prefer to warn you,' said Mme Verdurin curtly to Mme de Cambremer, having heard that the latter had been talking to me about Morel and thought, when she dropped her voice to talk about Saint-Loup's engagement, that she was still talking about him. 'What we make here isn't light music. It's frightening how progressive they are, you know, in matters of art, my Wednesday faithful, my children as I call them, she added, with a look of vainglorious terror. I sometimes say to them: "My dear good people, you're marching faster than your Patronne, not that audacity was ever thought to frighten her." Every year, they go a bit further; I can see the day coming when they'll no longer march for Wagner or for d'Indy. – But it's very good being progressive, we're never progressive enough,' said Mme de Cambremer, while inspecting every corner of the dining-room, seeking to identify the things her mother-in-law had left behind, and those that Mme Verdurin had brought in, and to catch the latter red-handed in her lack of good taste. Meanwhile, she was trying to talk to me on the subject that interested her most, M. de Charlus. She found it touching that he should have a violinist for a protégé. 'He looks to be intelligent. – Extremely full of life even, for a man who's already getting on, I said. – Getting on? But he doesn't look as though he's getting on, see, his hair's still yellow.' (For the last three or four years, the normal word for 'hair', les cheveux, had been used in the singular, le cheveu, by one of those unknown launchers of literary fashions, and everyone on the same radius as Mme de Cambremer said le cheveu, not without an affected smile. At the present moment, people are still saying le cheveu, but out of a surfeit of the singular, the plural will be reborn.) 'What mainly interests me in M. de Charlus, she added, is that you can sense the gift in him. I must tell you that I lay little store by knowledge. What is learned doesn't interest me.' These words are not at variance with the particular virtue of Mme de Cambremer, which was indeed imitative, and acquired. But one of the things that you needed to know at that particular moment was that knowledge is nothing, is not worth a straw compared with originality. Mme de Cambremer had learned, like everyone else, that one must never learn anything. 'That's the reason why Brichot, she said to me, who has his intriguing side, for I don't turn up my nose at a certain appetizing erudition, interests me much less.' But Brichot, at that moment, had only one preoccupation: hearing that they were talking music, he was fearful lest the subject remind Mme Verdurin of the death of Dechambre. He wanted to say something that would dismiss that fateful memory. M. de Cambremer gave him the opportunity with this question: 'Wooded places are always named after animals, then? – Not so,' replied Brichot, happy to deploy his knowledge in front of so many newcomers, among whom, as I had told him, he was sure to interest at least one. 'You only need to see how, in the names of people themselves, a tree is preserved, like a fern in a lump of coal. One of our conscript fathers[88] is called M. de Saulces de Freycinet, which, if I'm not mistaken, signifies a place planted with willows and ash, salix et fraxinetum; his nephew, M. de Selves, unites even more trees, since his name is de Selves, sylva.'[89] Saniette was delighted to find the conversation taking so animated a turn. He was able, since Brichot was talking the whole time, to observe a silence that would avoid his becoming the target of M. and Mme Verdurin's gibes. And having become more susceptible still in his joy at being rescued, he had been touched to hear M. Verdurin, for all the solemnity of such a dinner-party, telling the maître d'hôtel to set a jug of water beside M. Saniette, who drank nothing else. (The generals who get the most soldiers killed insist that they be well fed.) And then at one moment Mme Verdurin had smiled at Saniette. No question about it, they were good people. He would never again be tortured. At that moment the meal was interrupted by a guest whom I have forgotten to mention, an illustrious Norwegian philosopher who spoke French very well but very slowly, for the twofold reason, first that having only recently learned it and wishing not to make mistakes (he made a few all the same), he referred for each word to a sort of internal dictionary; and then because, as a metaphysician, he was always thinking about what he meant as he was saying it, which, even in a Frenchman, is a cause of slowness. He was for the rest a delightful creature, though similar in appearance to many others, except in one respect. This man who was so slow of speech (there was a silence between each word) became vertiginously quick to make his escape the moment he had said his farewells. His precipitateness gave you to suppose, the first time, that he had a stomach-ache or some even more pressing need.

'My dear… associate,' he said to Brichot, having deliberated to himself whether 'associate' was the appropriate term, 'I have a sort of… desire to know whether there are other trees in the… nomenclature of your beautiful… French… Latin… Norman… language. Madame (he meant Mme Verdurin although he did not dare look at her) has told me that you know everything. Is this not the precise moment? – No, it's the moment to eat,' broke in Mme Verdurin, who could see the dinner never being over. 'Ah, very well!' replied the Scandinavian, lowering his head to his plate, with a sad smile of resignation. 'But I must point out to Madame that if I ventured on this questionnaire… I'm sorry, this questation… it's because tomorrow I must return to Paris to dine at the Tour d'Argent or at the Hôtel Meurice.[90] My French… colleague… M. Boutroux,[91] is to talk to us there about the spiritualist séances… I'm sorry, the spirituous evocations… that he has supervised. – It's not as good as they make out, the Tour d'Argent, said Mme Verdurin in irritation. I've even had some detestable dinners there. – But am I mistaken, or is the food that one eats at Madame's not the very finest French cuisine? – Good heavens, it's not positively bad, said Mme Verdurin, mollified. And if you come next Wednesday, it'll be better. – But I leave on Monday for Algiers, and from there I am going to the Cape. And once I'm at the Cape of Good Hope, I shan't be able to meet my illustrious associate any more… Forgive me, I shan't be able to meet my colleague any more.' And having supplied these retrospective excuses, he began obediently to eat at breakneck speed. But Brichot was only too happy to be able to provide further vegetable etymologies and he replied, so interesting the Norwegian that the latter stopped eating once again, but indicating that they could take away his full plate and move on to the next course: 'One of the Forty,[92] said Brichot, has the name Houssaye, or a place planted with houx or holly; in the name of a subtle diplomatist, d'Ormesson, you find orme, or elm, the ulmus beloved of Virgil and which gave its name to the town of Ulm; in that of his colleagues, M. de la Boulaye, the bouleau or birch; M. d'Aunay, the aulne or alder; M. de Bussière, the buis or box; M. Albaret, the albier or alburnum (I promised myself I would tell Céleste that); M. de Cholet, the chou or cabbage; and the pommier or apple tree in the name of M. de la Pommeraye, whom we heard lecture, Saniette, d'you remember, in the days when the good Porel had been sent off to the other end of the earth, as proconsul in Odéonia?'[93] Hearing Brichot pronounce the name of Saniette, M. Verdurin cast an ironic glance at his wife and at Cottard which unnerved that self-conscious man. 'You were saying that Cholet comes from chou, I said to Brichot. Does a station that I went through before getting to Doncières, Saint-Frichoux, also come from chou? – No, Saint-Frichoux is Sanctus Fructuosus, just as Sanctus Ferreolus gave Saint-Fargeau, but it's not Norman at all. – He knows evelything there is to be known, he's borling us,' gurgled the Princesse quietly. – There are so many other names that interest me, but I can't ask you everything at once.' And turning to Cottard: 'Is Mme Putbus here? I asked him. – No, thank God, replied Mme Verdurin, who had overheard my question. I tried hard to divert her holidays to Venice, we're rid of her for this year. – I shall myself have a right to two trees, said M. de Charlus, for I've more or less taken a small house between Saint-Martin-du-Chêne and Saint-Pierre-des-Ifs.[94] – But that's very near here, I hope you'll come over often, together with Charlie Morel. You'll only need to make arrangements concerning the trains with our little group, you're no distance from Doncières,' said Mme Verdurin, who hated people not coming by the same train and at the times when she had sent carriages. She knew how severe the climb was up to La Raspelière, even going round by the network of small roads behind Féterne, which delayed you by half an hour, and she was afraid that those looking to be independent might not find carriages to bring them, or might even, having in actual fact remained at home, seize on the pretext of not having found one at Douville-Féterne and not having felt up to making such an ascent on foot. In response to this invitation, M. de Charlus contented himself with a mute nod of the head. 'He can't always be so accommodating, he looks so stiff,' whispered the Doctor to Ski, having remained very simple despite the superficial coating of vanity, and who did not try to hide the fact that Charlus had snubbed him. 'He's no doubt unaware that in all the watering-places and even in Paris in the clinics, the doctors, for whom I am of course 'number one', make it a point of honour to introduce me to all the noblemen who are there and are afraid of hearing the worst. That even makes staying in a resort rather agreeable for me, he added off-handedly. Even in Doncières the major of the regiment, who is the doctor in attendance on the colonel, invited me to have lunch with him, telling me I was in a position to dine with the general. And this general is a Monsieur de something. I don't know whether his titles of nobility are more or less ancient than those of the Baron here. – Don't get all excited, it's not much of a coronet,' replied Ski in an undertone, and he added something indistinct with a verb, of which I could make out the final syllables 'arder',[95] preoccupied as I was with listening to what Brichot was saying to M. de Charlus. 'No, I regret to tell you, it's probable you have only one tree, for if Saint-Martin-du-Chêne is obviously Sanctus Martinus juxta quercum, the word if conversely may simply be the root, ave, eve, which means damp, as in Aveyron, Lodève, Yvette, and which you see surviving in our éviers, or kitchen-sinks. It's the "eau", the water, which in Breton is Ster, Stermaria, Sterlaer, Sterbouest, Ster-en-Dreuchen.' I did not hear the conclusion, for whatever pleasure I might have taken in hearing the name of Stermaria once again, I could not help hearing Cottard, near to whom I was sitting, saying in a low voice to Ski: 'Ah, but I didn't know! He's a gentleman who knows how to manage things, then. What, he's one of the brotherhood! Yet he hasn't got those puffy eyelids. I shall need to watch out for my feet underneath the table, he'd only have to squeeze one so far as I'm concerned. Anyway, it only half surprises me. I see several noblemen in the shower, in the altogether, they're degenerates more or less. I don't speak to them because after all I'm a public servant and it might do me harm. But they know perfectly well who I am.' Saniette, who had been alarmed by Brichot's interpellation, was beginning to breathe freely again, like someone who is afraid of storms but finds that the flash of lightning has not been followed by any sound of thunder, when he heard M. Verdurin question him while fixing him with a stare that did not leave hold of the poor wretch all the time he was speaking, in such a way as instantly to intimidate him and not allow him to gather his wits. 'But you've always kept it from us, Saniette, that you used to frequent matinées at the Odéon?' Trembling like a recruit in front of a bullying sergeant, Saniette answered, making his words occupy the smallest possible space so as to have a better chance of avoiding the blows: 'Once, to La Chercheuse.[96] – What's that he says?' shouted M. Verdurin, looking both disgusted and furious, and knitting his brows, as though his full attention would not be enough if he was to understand something unintelligible. 'For a start, we don't understand what you're saying, what have you got in your mouth?' demanded M. Verdurin with increasing violence, and alluding to Saniette's faulty pronunciation. 'Poor Saniette, I won't have you making him unhappy,' said Mme Verdurin in a falsely pitying tone and so as to leave no one in any doubt as to her husband's insolent intentions. 'I went to La Che… – Che, che, che, do try to speak clearly, said M. Verdurin, I can't even hear you.' Hardly one of the faithful could forbear from guffawing, and they looked like a band of cannibals whose taste for blood has been reawakened by a wound inflicted on a white man. For the instinct for imitation and lack of courage govern societies as they do crowds. And everyone laughs at someone who is seen being made fun of, while being quite prepared to venerate him ten years later in a circle where he is admired. It is in this same fashion that the common people drive out or acclaim a king. 'Come, it's not his fault, said Mme Verdurin. – It's not mine either, you don't dine out if you can no longer articulate. – I was at Favart's La Chercheuse d'esprit. – What, it's La Chercheuse d'esprit that you call La Chercheuse? Oh, that's magnificent, I could have gone on looking for a hundred years and not found that,' exclaimed M. Verdurin, who would, however, have decided straight off that someone was not well read or an artist, 'was not one of us', if he had heard him give certain works their full title. You had, for example, to say Le Malade, Le Bourgeois; and anyone adding 'imaginaire' or 'gentilhomme' would have made it clear they were not 'of the club', just as in a salon someone proves that he is not a member of society by saying M. de Montesquiou-Fezensac instead of M. de Montesquiou. 'But it's not so extraordinary,' said Saniette, breathless with emotion yet smiling, though he may not have wanted to. Mme Verdurin burst out: 'Oh yes it is! she sniggered. You can be sure that no one in the world could have guessed you meant La Chercheuse d'esprit.' M. Verdurin resumed more quietly, and addressing both Brichot and Saniette: 'It's a jolly play as it happens, La Chercheuse d'esprit.' Uttered in a serious tone, these simple words, in which no trace of malice was to be detected, did Saniette as much good and evoked as much gratitude in him as a kindness. He was unable to proffer a single word but maintained a contented silence. Brichot was more talkative. 'That's true, he replied to M. Verdurin, and were it to be passed off as the work of some Sarmatian or Scandinavian author, La Chercheuse d'esprit might be proposed as a candidate for the situation vacant of masterpiece. But let it be said without disrespect to the shade of the gentle Favart, his temperament was not that of an Ibsen. (He at once blushed up to the ears remembering the Norwegian philosopher, who wore an unhappy look because he had been trying in vain to identify what vegetable substance the buis might be that Brichot had mentioned just now in connection with Bussière.) Anyway, Porel's satrapy now being occupied by a functionary who is a Tolstoyan of the strict observance, maybe we shall be seeing Anna Karenina or Resurrection beneath the Odéonian architrave.[97] – I know the portrait of Favart you mean, said M. de Charlus. I saw a very good proof engraving of it at the Comtesse Molé's.' The name of the Comtesse Molé had a powerful effect on Mme Verdurin. 'Ah, so you go to Mme de Molé's,' she exclaimed. She thought that you said 'the Comtesse Molé' or 'Madame Molé' simply as an abbreviation, as she had heard people say 'the Rohans', or out of disdain, as she herself said 'Madame La Tremoïlle'. She was in no doubt that the Comtesse Molé, knowing as she did the Queen of Greece and the Princesse de Caprarola, had as good a right to the particule as anybody, and she had decided for once to grant it to this very brilliant person who had shown herself so well-disposed towards her. And so, to make quite clear that she had spoken as she had deliberately, and did not begrudge the Comtesse the de, she went on: 'But I had no idea you knew Madame de Molé!' as if it had been doubly extraordinary both that M. de Charlus should have known that lady and that Mme Verdurin should not have known that he knew her. Now society, or at least what M. de Charlus called by that name, forms a relatively homogeneous and closed whole. Just as it is understandable that in the disparate vastness of the bourgeoisie a barrister should say to someone who knows one of his schoolfriends, 'But how the devil did you come to meet so-and-so?', to be surprised on the other hand that a Frenchman should know the meaning of the word temple or forêt would be hardly any more extraordinary than to wonder by what accident M. de Charlus had been brought together with the Comtesse Molé. Moreover, even had such an acquaintance not followed naturally from the laws of society, if it had been fortuitous, how could it have been strange that Mme Verdurin should not know of it when she was meeting M. de Charlus for the first time, and his connection with Mme Molé was far from the only thing she did not know in relation to a man of whom, in truth, she knew nothing? 'Who was in that Chercheuse d'esprit, my dear Saniette?' asked M. Verdurin. Although feeling that the storm had passed, the former archivist hesitated before answering: 'There now, said Mme Verdurin, you're intimidating him, you make fun of everything he says and then you want him to respond. Come on, say who was in it, and we'll give you some galantine to take home,' said Mme Verdurin, making unkind allusion to the ruination Saniette had brought down on himself in trying to save a married couple with whom he was friends. 'I only remember that it was Mme Samary who played La Zerbine, said Saniette. – La Zerbine? What on earth's that? cried M. Verdurin, as though the house were on fire. – It's a stock role in the old repertoire, see Le Capitaine Fracasse,[98] as you might say the Braggart or the Pedant. – Ah, it's you who's the pedant. La Zerbine! No, but he's off his head,' exclaimed M. Verdurin. Mme Verdurin looked at her guests and laughed, as if to excuse Saniette. 'La Zerbine, he imagines everyone knows instantly what that means. You're like M. de Longepierre, the stupidest man I know, who said to us familiarly the other day "the Banat". Nobody knew what he was talking about. Finally we found out it was a province in Serbia.' To put an end to Saniette's ordeal, which was causing me more pain than it was him, I asked Brichot if he knew what Balbec meant. 'Balbec is probably a corruption of Dalbec, he told me. One would need to be able to consult the charters of the Kings of England, the suzerains of Normandy, because Balbec was a dependency of the barony of Dover, on which account it was often known as Balbec d'Outremer or Balbec-en-Terre. But the barony of Dover itself came under the bishopric of Bayeux, and despite the rights held momentarily over the Abbey by the Templars, starting with Louis d'Harcourt, the Patriarch of Jerusalem and Bishop of Bayeux, it was the bishops of that diocese who were collators of the benefice of Balbec. That's how the Dean of Doville explained it to me, a bald, eloquent, fanciful man and a gourmet, who lives in the obedience of Brillat-Savarin and expounded some dubious pedagogy to me in ever so slightly sybilline terms while making me eat some admirable pommes frites.'[99] While Brichot was smiling, to show how witty it was to associate such disparate matters and to employ an ironically elevated language on down-to-earth matters, Saniette was looking to introduce some shaft of wit that might set him back on his feet after his collapse of a moment before. The shaft of wit was what used to be known as an à-peu-près,[100] or pun, but which had changed its form because plays on words evolve as do literary genres, or epidemics, which vanish only to be replaced by others, and so on. In the old days, the form the à-peu-prés took was that of 'the last word'. But this was out of date, no one any longer used it, it was only Cottard now who might sometimes say in the middle of a game of piquet: 'Do you know the last word in absent-mindedness? Believing that the Édit de Nantes was an Englishwoman.'[101] Last words had been replaced by nicknames. Basically, it was still the old à-peu-prés, but because the nickname was in vogue people failed to notice. Unfortunately for Saniette, when these à-peu-près were not his own, and generally unfamiliar to the little nucleus, he came out with them so self-consciously that, despite the laugh by which he followed them in order to signal their humorous nature, no one understood them. But if, conversely, the bon mot was his own, since he had generally hit upon it when talking with one of the faithful, the latter had repeated it on taking possession of it and the witticism was then known, but not as coming from Saniette. Thus, when he slipped one of these in it was recognized, but because he was its author, he was accused of plagiarism. 'Now then, Brichot went on, bec in Norman is stream; there is the Abbey of Bec; Mobec, the stream of the marshland (mor or mer meant marsh, as in Morville, or in Bricquemar, Alvimare, Cambremer); Briquebec, the stream of the height, coming from briga, a fortified place, as in Bricqueville, Bricquebosc, Le Bric, Briand, or else from brice, a bridge, which is the same as Bruck in German (Innsbruck) and in English bridge, which ends so many place-names (Cambridge, etc.) You have a lot of other becs in Normandy: Caudebec, Bolbec, Le Robec, Le Bec-Hellouin, Becquerel. It's the Norman form of the Germanic Bach, Offenbach, Anspach. Varaguebec, from the old word varaigne, the equivalent of garenne, a private wood or pond. As for dal, Brichot went on, that's a form of Thal, a valley: Darnetal, Rosendal, and even, near Louviers, Becdal. The river that lent its name to Balbec is charming as it happens. Seen from a falaise or cliff (Fels in German, you even have, not far from here, on a height, the pretty town of Falaise), it adjoins the spires of the church, though in reality situated a long way off, and appears to be reflecting them. – I can believe that, I said, it's an effect Elstir is very fond of. I've seen several sketches of it in his house. – Elstir! You know Tiche? exclaimed Mme Verdurin. But you must know that he and I were once really close. Thank heaven, I no longer see him. No, but ask Cottard, or Brichot, he used to have his place laid at my table, he came every day. And he's one of whom it can be said it did him no good leaving our little nucleus. In a moment I'll show you some flowers he painted for me; you'll see the difference from what he's doing nowadays, which I don't like at all, not at all! Why, I got him to paint Cottard's portrait, not counting everything that he did from me. – And he gave the Professor mauve hair,' said Mme Cottard, forgetting that at that stage her husband was not even an agrégé.[102] 'I don't know whether you find that my husband has mauve hair, Monsieur. – That's of no account,' said Mme Verdurin, lifting her chin with an expression of disdain for Mme Cottard and admiration for the man of whom she had been speaking, 'that was the work of a famous colourist and a fine painter. Whereas, she added, addressing herself once again to me, I don't know whether you call that painting, all those terrible great compositions, those great contraptions he's been exhibiting since he's no longer been coming to me. I call them daubs, they're so trite, and then they lack any relief, any personality. There's a bit of everybody in them. – He is bringing back the grace of the eighteenth century, but in a modern form, said Saniette precipitately, invigorated and restored to the saddle by my friendliness. But I prefer Helleu.[103] – There's no connection with Helleu, said Mme Verdurin. – But there is, it's eighteenth-century febrile. He's a Watteau à vapeur,[104] and he started to laugh. – Oh, heard it, heard it a hundred times, I've been having that served up to me for years, said M. Verdurin, who had indeed once been told it by Ski, though as his own creation. You're out of luck when the one time you pronounce something intelligibly, it isn't your own. – It pains me, Mme Verdurin went on, for he was someone of ability, he's thrown away a fine artistic temperament. Oh, if only he'd stayed here! He'd have become the leading landscapist of the day. And it's a woman who's dragged him down so! Not that that surprises me, for he was an attractive man, if vulgar. Basically, a second-rater. I can tell you, I sensed that straight off. All in all, he never interested me. I was very fond of him, that's all. For one thing, he was so dirty! Do you much care for that, people who never wash? – What's this thing we're eating, of such a pretty shade? asked Ski. – It's called a strawberry mousse, said Mme Verdurin. – But it's ra-vish-ing. We ought to be opening bottles of Château-Margaux, Château-Lafite, port. – I can't tell you how amusing I find him, he only drinks water,' said Mme Verdurin, in order to disguise, beneath the charm she found in this flight of fancy, the alarm occasioned in her by such prodigality. 'But not so as to drink them, Ski went on, you will fill all our glasses with them, they'll bring in wonderful peaches, huge nectarines, there facing the setting sun; it'll have the luxuriance of a beautiful Veronese. – And cost almost as much, muttered M. Verdurin. – But take away these cheeses of such a villainous shade,' he said, trying to remove the Patron's plate, who defended his Gruyère with all his might. 'You can understand why I don't miss Elstir, Mme Verdurin said to me, this one has twice the talent. Elstir is hard work, the man who's incapable of letting go of his picture when he wants to. He's the good student, examination fodder. Ski on the other hand follows his fancy. You'll see him lighting his cigarette in the middle of dinner. – By the way, I don't know why you've refused to have his wife, said Cottard, it would be like the old days then. – Watch what you're saying, will you! No prize tart enters my house, Monsieur le Professeur.' said Mme Verdurin, who had, on the contrary, done her very best to get Elstir to return, even with his wife, but before they got married she had tried to come between them, she had told Elstir that the woman he loved was stupid, dirty, immoral and had stolen. For once, she had not succeeded in bringing about a split. Instead, Elstir had broken with the Verdurin salon; and he had congratulated himself on having done so, just as converts bless the illness or the setback that has impelled their withdrawal and set them on the road to salvation. 'He's splendid is the Professor, she said. Why not say that my drawing-room is a house of assignation. Anyone'd think you don't know what Mme Elstir is like. I'd rather entertain the lowest of street-girls! No, no, I'd rather starve. I tell you in any case, I'd have been all the more stupid to overlook the wife when the husband no longer interests me, it's out of date, it's not even drawn any more. – That's extraordinary for a man of such intelligence, said Cottard. – Oh no, replied Mme Verdurin, even in the days when he had talent, for he had that, the wretch, and to spare, what was tiresome about him was that he wasn't the least bit intelligent.' Mme Verdurin had not waited for their quarrel, and no longer to like his painting, to pass this verdict on Elstir. The fact was that, even in the days when he formed part of the little group, Elstir would sometimes spend entire days with some woman or other whom Mme Verdurin thought, rightly or wrongly, was 'bird-brained', which in her view was not the behaviour of an intelligent man. 'No, she said, with an air of being even-handed, I think his wife and he are just right for each other. God knows, I know of no more boring creature anywhere on earth and I'd go out of my mind if I had to pass two hours with her. But they say he finds her very intelligent. You simply have to admit the fact, our Tiche was above all excessively stupid! I've seen him bowled over by women you can't imagine, by honest-to-God idiots we'd never have wanted in our little clan. Well, he used to write to them, to argue with them! Him, Elstir! Not that that stops him having his charming side, oh charming, charming and delightfully absurd, of course.' For Mme Verdurin was convinced that truly remarkable men commit countless follies. A false idea, yet with some truth in it. Certainly, people's 'follies' are unbearable. But a lack of balance that we discover only with time is a consequence of the entry into a human brain of susceptibilities to which it is not customarily suited. With the result that the oddities of people that are charming exasperate us, but there are few if any charming people who are not, in some way, odd. 'Here, I'm going to be able to show you his flowers right away,' she said to me, seeing her husband signalling to her that we could get up from the table. And she took M. de Cambremer's arm once again. As soon as he had left Mme de Cambremer, M. Verdurin sought to make his apologies to M. de Charlus, and give his reasons, mainly for the pleasure of discussing these social nuances with a man of title, and momentarily the inferior of those who had assigned him the place to which they adjudged he had a right. But first of all he was anxious to demonstrate to M. de Charlus that he held too high an opinion of him intellectually to suppose that he paid any heed to such bagatelles: 'Forgive me for mentioning these trifles, he began, for I can well imagine the scant importance you attach to them. Bourgeois minds may heed them, but the others, the artists, the ones truly of our own kind, don't give a damn. And I realized you were one of us from the very first words we exchanged!' M. de Charlus, who had placed a very different interpretation on this expression, gave a sudden start. Following the Doctor's oglings, the Patron's insulting frankness made him choke. 'Don't protest, cher Monsieur, you are one of us, it's as clear as day, M. Verdurin went on. Note that I do not know whether you practise one or other art, but that isn't necessary, nor is it always sufficient. Dechambre, who has just died, played perfectly, with the most robust technique, but he wasn't one, you sensed straight away he wasn't. Brichot isn't one. Morel is, my wife is, I sense that you are. – What were you going to say to me?' M. de Charlus broke in, who was beginning to feel reassured as to M. Verdurin's meaning, but would rather he did not shout these ambiguous words from the rooftops. 'We put you only on the left,' M. Verdurin replied. M. de Charlus, with a good-natured, understanding, insolent smile, replied: 'Oh come! That's of no account at all, here!' And he gave a little laugh that was peculiar to him, a laugh that had probably come down to him from some Bavarian or Lorraine grandmother, who had herself got the identical laugh from one of her forebears, so that it had been ringing out like this, unchanged, for a good few centuries in the lesser courts of old Europe, and its precious quality been being enjoyed, like that of certain old musical instruments now grown very uncommon. There are times when, in order to depict someone in their entirety, a phonetic imitation would need to be added to the description, and that of the character which M. de Charlus was playing risks incompleteness for want of this little laugh, so delicate and so light, just as certain of Bach's suites are never rendered accurately because the orchestras lack the 'little trumpets', with their particular tone, for which the composer wrote one or other part. 'But, explained M. Verdurin, wounded, it was on purpose. I attach no importance at all to titles of nobility,' he added with that disdainful smile that I have seen so many people I have known, unlike my grandmother and my mother, have for all the things they do not possess, in front of people who will then, so they believe, be unable to use these to establish their superiority over them. 'But then, since M. de Cambremer was in fact there and he's a Marquis, and you're only a Baron… – Permit me, replied M. de Charlus with a haughty expression, to the astonished M. Verdurin, I am also Duc de Brabant, Damoiseau de Montargis, and Prince d'Oléron, de Carency, de Viareggio and des Dunes. It's of absolutely no importance, however. Do not torment yourself,' he went on, resuming his delicate smile, which grew broader at these final words: 'I could tell straight away that you weren't in the habit of it.'

Mme Verdurin came up to show me Elstir's flowers. If the act, long since become a matter of such indifference to me, of dining out had, on the contrary, in a form that had entirely revived it, of a journey along the coast, followed by an ascent by carriage up to two hundred metres above sea-level, produced a sort of intoxication, this last had not been dispelled at La Raspelière. 'Here, just look at that, the Patronne said to me, pointing to some large and magnificent roses by Elstir, but whose unctuous scarlet and frothy whiteness had boiled over with rather too creamy a relief against the jardinière on which they had been placed. D'you think he'd still have the touch to capture that? Is that not pretty good? Besides, the subject matter's so beautiful, it would be amusing to finger them. I can't tell you how amusing it was watching him painting them. You felt it interested him, searching for that effect.' And the Patronne's gaze paused dreamily on this present from the artist, in which was encapsulated, not only his great talent, but their long friendship, which survived only in these mementoes of it that he had left to her; behind the flowers once picked for her by him, she thought she could once again see the beautiful hand which had painted them, in a single morning, in their freshness, so that the ones on the table, and the other leaning against a chair in the dining-room, had been able to represent, for the Patronne's lunch-party, a tête-à-tête between the still living roses and the semi-likeness of their portrait. A semi-likeness only, Elstir being able to see a flower only by first transplanting it into that interior garden in which we are obliged always to remain. In this watercolour he had shown the roses as they had first appeared to him and which, but for him, we should never have known; so that they could be said to be a new variety with which the painter, like an ingenious horticulturist, had enriched the rose family. 'From the day he left the little nucleus, the man was finished. It seems that my dinner parties made him waste time, that I was harming the development of his genius, she said, in an ironic tone. As if associating with a woman such as myself could be anything but salutary for an artist!' she exclaimed in an impulse of vanity. Right beside us, M. de Cambremer, who had already sat down, and seeing M. de Charlus standing, made as if to get up and offer him his chair. This offer corresponded in the Marquis's mind perhaps simply to a vague intention of being polite. M. de Charlus preferred to attach to it the significance of a duty that a mere gentleman knew he must render to a prince, and thought that there was no better way of establishing his right to such precedence than by declining it. And so he exclaimed: 'What's this? I beg you! The idea!' There was already something very 'Guermantes' about the astutely vehement tone of this protestation, which was more strongly marked still in the imperious, useless and familiar gesture with which M. de Charlus pressed down with both hands, as if forcing him to be seated again, on the shoulders of M. de Cambremer, who had not got up: 'Oh, come now, my dear fellow, the Baron insisted, that'd be all we need! There's no reason! In our day we reserve that for princes of the blood.' The Cambremers were no more moved than Mme Verdurin by my enthusiasm for their house. For I was unresponsive to the beauties they pointed out to me but excited by my confused reminiscences; now and again I even confessed to my disappointment on finding that something did not conform to what its name had given me to imagine. I made Mme Verdurin indignant by telling her that I had thought it would be more countryfied. Conversely, I paused in ecstasy to sniff the fragrance of the air coming through the doorway. 'I see you like draughts,' they said. My praise of the piece of green lustre stopping up a broken window-pane was no more successful: 'But it's horrible!' exclaimed the Marquise. The last straw was when I said: 'My greatest joy was when I arrived. When I heard my footsteps echoing along the gallery, I thought I'd entered the offices of some village mairie or other, where there's a map of the canton.' This time, a determined Mme de Cambremer turned her back on me. 'You didn't find it all too badly arranged? her husband asked her, with the same pitying solicitude as if he were inquiring how well his wife had withstood some unhappy ceremony. There are some good things.' But since, when the fixed rules of a sure taste do not impose inevitable limits on it, malevolence finds fault with everything about the person or the house of the people who have supplanted you: 'Yes, but they're not in the right place. Indeed, are they all that good? – You'll have noticed, said M. de Cambremer, with a sadness restrained by a certain firmness, some of the Jouy cretonne is showing through, things worn completely out in this drawing-room! – And that piece of material with its big roses like a peasant woman's bedspread,' said Mme de Cambremer, whose quite spurious culture applied exclusively to idealist philosophy, Impressionist painting and the music of Debussy. And so as not to make her case solely in the name of luxury but also of good taste: 'And they've put up draught curtains! What a lack of style! But what d'you expect, such people don't know, where could they have learned? They must be retired wholesalers. They've not done so badly considering. – I thought the chandeliers were good,' said the Marquis, without anyone knowing why he should make an exception of the chandeliers, just as, inevitably, each time a church was mentioned, whether it be Chartres cathedral, or Rheims, or Amiens, or the church in Balbec, what he always hastened to cite as admirable was 'the organ-case, the pulpit and the workmanship on the misericords'. 'As for the garden, the less said the better,' said Mme de Cambremer. It's been massacred. 'The paths have gone all skew-whiff!'

I took advantage of the fact that Mme Verdurin was serving the coffee to go and take a look at the letter that M. de Cambremer had handed me, in which his mother had invited me to dinner. In these few lines of ink, the handwriting betrayed an individuality recognizable for me from now on among all others, without there being any need to resort to the hypothesis of special pens any more than rare pigments of mysterious manufacture are necessary to the painter to express his original vision. Even a paralytic, suffering from agraphia after a stroke, and reduced to seeing the characters as a pattern without being able to read them, would have realized that Mme de Cambremer belonged to an old family in which the enthusiastic cultivation of literature and the arts had let some air into its aristocratic traditions. He would also have guessed around what age the Marquise had learned simultaneously to write and to play Chopin. It was the epoch when people of breeding observed the rule of being agreeable and the so-called rule of the three adjectives. Mme de Cambremer combined the two. One laudatory adjective was not enough for her, she would follow it (after a dash) by a second, then (after a second dash) by a third. But what was peculiar to her is that, contrary to the social and literary objective she had set herself, in Mme de Cambremer's letters the sequence of the three epithets wore the aspect, not of a progression, but of a diminuendo. Mme de Cambremer told me in this first letter that she had met Saint-Loup and had appreciated more than ever his 'unique – rare – real' qualities, and that he was due to return with one of his friends (the one indeed who was in love with the daughter-in-law), and that if I cared to come, with or without them, to dinner at Féterne, she would be 'overjoyed – happy – pleased'. Perhaps it was because the desire to be agreeable was not matched in her by any fertility of imagination or richness of vocabulary that, keen to utter three exclamations, this lady had the resources to provide in the second and third only an enfeebled echo of the first. There need only have been a fourth adjective for nothing to have remained of her initial affability. Finally, out of a certain refined simplicity that can but have created a considerable impression amongst her family and even the circle of their connections, Mme de Cambremer had acquired the habit of substituting for the word 'sincère', which might end by appearing untruthful, the word 'vrai', or true. And to make quite clear that something sincere was indeed involved, she broke the conventional alliance that would have put vrai in front of the substantive and set it bravely down behind. Her letters would end with: 'Croyez à mon amitié vraie.' 'Croyez à ma sympathie vraie.'[105] Unfortunately, so much had this become a formula that the affectation of candour gave a stronger impression of a mendacious politeness than those ancient formulas to whose meaning we no longer give a thought. My reading was not helped in any case by the confused sound of conversations, dominated by the raised voice of M. de Charlus, not having let the topic drop and saying to M. de Cambremer: 'By wanting me to take your place, you reminded me of a gentleman who sent me a letter this morning addressed "To His Highness the Baron de Charlus" and which began "Monseigneur" – Indeed, your correspondent was exaggerating somewhat,' replied M. de Cambremer, giving way to a discreet merriment. M. de Charlus had provoked it; he did not share in it. 'But in actual fact, my dear fellow, he said, you'll observe that, heraldically speaking, it's he who is in the right; I'm not turning it into a personal matter, as you can imagine. I speak of it as though it concerned someone else. But what will you, history is history, there's nothing we can do about it and it's not up to us to rewrite it. I shan't cite the case of the Emperor William, who in Kiel has never stopped Monseigneuring me. I've heard it said that he called all French dukes that, which is improper, but is perhaps simply a thoughtful gesture aimed above our heads, at France. – Thoughtful and more or less sincere, said M. de Cambremer. – Oh, I'm not of your opinion. Personally speaking, you'll observe that a nobleman of the lowest rank such as this Hohenzollern, a Protestant what's more, and who dispossessed my cousin the King of Hanover,[106] is unlikely to appeal to me,' added M. de Charlus, who seemed to take Hanover more closely to heart than Alsace-Lorraine. 'But I believe that the inclination the Emperor bears towards us is deeply sincere. The imbeciles will tell you that he's a stage emperor. On the contrary, he's wonderfully intelligent. He knows nothing about painting, and he forced M. Tschudi[107] to withdraw the Elstirs from the national collections. But then Louis XIV didn't like the Dutch masters, also had a liking for ostentation, yet, when all's said and done, was a great sovereign. And then William II has armed his country from the military and naval points of view, as Louis XIV did not, and I trust that his reign will never experience the reverses that darkened the end of the reign of the man tritely referred to as the Sun-King. The Republic committed a grave error in my view in spurning the Hohenzollern's civilities, or in returning them in driblets. He himself is very conscious of this and says, with that gift for expression that he has: "What I am looking for is a handshake, not a sweep of the hat." As a man, he is despicable; he has abandoned, betrayed, reneged on his best friends in circumstances in which his silence was as wretched as theirs was magnificent,' continued M. de Charlus, who, borne off down the slope, was slithering towards the Eulenburg Affair,[108] and recalled the remark made to him by one of the highest placed of those inculpated: "What confidence the Emperor must have in our tact to have dared to permit such a trial! But then he was not wrong to have put his trust in our discretion. We'd have kept our mouths shut even on the scaffold." Anyway, all this has nothing to do with what I meant to say, namely that, in Germany, as mediatized princes we are Durchlaucht,[109] and that in France our rank of Highness was publicly recognized. Saint-Simon claims we acquired it improperly, in which he is completely mistaken. The reason he gives, namely that Louis XIV had us forbidden to call him the Most Christian King, and ordered us to call him the King and nothing more, merely proves that we were answerable to him and not at all that we did not have the rank of Prince. Otherwise, he would have had to deny it to the Duc de Lorraine and a great many others! As it happens, several of our titles come from the House of Lorraine through Thérèse d'Espinoy, my great-grandmother, who was the daughter of the Damoiseau de Commercy.' Having noticed that Morel was listening to him, M. de Charlus went into the reasons for his pretension more fully. 'I have pointed out to my brother that the entry on our family ought to be found, not in the third section of the Gotha but in the second, not to say in the first,' he said, not realizing that Morel did not know what the Gotha was. 'But that's his affair, he's my chef d'armes and so long as he finds it right the way it is and lets the matter rest, I have only to close my eyes. – M. Brichot interested me greatly,' I said to Mme Verdurin, who had come up to me, as I was putting Mme de Cambremer's letter into my pocket. 'A good man and with a cultivated mind, she answered coldly. He obviously lacks originality and taste, and has a terrible memory. It used to be said of the "forefathers" of the people we have here this evening, the émigrés,[110] that they had forgotten nothing. But at least they had the excuse, she said, taking over a bon mot of Swann's, of never having learned anything. Whereas Brichot knows everything and hurls piles of dictionaries at our heads during dinner. I imagine you now know everything there is to be known about what the name of this or that town or village means.' As Mme Verdurin was speaking, I was thinking that I had promised myself to ask her something, but I could not remember what it was. 'I'm sure you're talking about Brichot, said Ski. Chantepie, Freycinet, eh what, he spared you nothing. I had my eye on you, ma petite Patronne. – I saw you indeed, I nearly exploded.' I would not be able to say today how Mme Verdurin was dressed on that particular evening. I had no better idea at the time perhaps, for I am not observant by nature. But sensing that her toilette was not without its pretensions, I said something friendly or even admiring to her. She was like almost all women, who imagine that the compliment they receive is a strict expression of the truth, that it is a judgment passed impartially, irresistibly, as though it applied to an art object unconnected with a particular individual. And so it was with a seriousness which made me blush at my own hypocrisy that she put the vain and artless question customary in such circumstances: 'You like it? – You're talking about Chantepie, I'm sure,' said M. Verdurin coming up to us. I had been alone, with my mind on my green lustrine and a smell of wood, in not noticing that, as he enumerated his etymologies, Brichot was being laughed at. And since the impressions that for me gave things their value were of the kind that other people either do not experience or else suppress unthinkingly as insignificant, so that in consequence, had I been able to communicate them, they would have remained misunderstood or would have been scorned, they were quite unserviceable and had the additional drawback of making me appear stupid in the eyes of Mme Verdurin, who could see that I had 'swallowed' Brichot, as I had already seemed stupid to Mme de Guermantes because I had enjoyed myself at Mme d'Arpajon's. However, where Brichot was concerned, there was another reason. I was not one of the little clan. And in every clan, be it social, political or literary, they develop a perverse capacity for discovering in a conversation, an official speech, an item of news, a sonnet, all that the straightforward reader would never have dreamed of finding there. How many times has it not happened that, reading with a certain emotion a tale artfully spun by a wordy and somewhat antiquated Academician, I have been on the point of saying to Bloch, or to Mme de Guermantes, 'It's very jolly!', when, before I had opened my mouth, they would exclaim, each in a different language: 'If you want to have a moment's enjoyment, read a short story by so-and-so. Human stupidity has never gone so far.' Bloch's contempt derived above all from the fact that certain, as it happens agreeable, effects of style were somewhat jejune; that of Mme de Guermantes from the fact that the story seemed to prove the exact reverse of what the author had intended, for factual reasons that she was ingenious enough to deduce but of which I would never have thought. I was as surprised to find the irony that lay concealed behind the apparent amiability of the Verdurins towards Brichot as to hear, a few days later at Féterne, the Cambremers say to me, faced by the enthusiastic praises I was bestowing on La Raspelière: 'You can't possibly mean it, after what they've done there.' It is true they admitted that the dinner service was good. I had not noticed it, any more than the scandalous draught-curtains. 'So now, when you go back to Balbec, you'll know what Balbec signifies,' said M. Verdurin, ironically. It was indeed the things that Brichot had taught me which interested me. As for what they called his wit, it was exactly the same as that which had once been so much enjoyed among the little clan. He spoke with the same irritating facility, but his words no longer carried, had to overcome a hostile silence or disagreeable echoes; what had changed was, not what he trotted out, but the acoustics of the drawing-room and the attitude of mind of the audience. 'Careful!' said Mme Verdurin in an undertone, pointing to Brichot. The latter, having kept his hearing, more acute than his eyesight, cast at the Patronne a myopic philosopher's glance, soon averted. If his eyes were not so good, those of his mind in return took a broader view of things.

He had seen how little was to be expected from human affection, and had resigned himself to the fact. Admittedly, it pained him. It happens that even the man who, on the same evening, in a circle where he is accustomed to please, guesses that he has been found too frivolous, or too pedantic, or too clumsy, or too cavalier, and so on, returns home unhappy. Often it is over a matter of opinion, or a system, that he has appeared absurd to others or passé. Often he knows perfectly well that these others are his inferiors. He would have no difficulty dissecting the sophisms with the aid of which they have tacitly condemned him, he wants to go and visit someone, or to write a letter; wiser to do nothing, but wait for the following week's invitation. Sometimes also, instead of ending in a single evening, these falls from favour last for months. They further increase the instability of social judgments to which they are attributable. For the man who knows that Mme X despises him, feeling himself to be appreciated at Mme Y's, declares her to be much superior and emigrates to her salon. This, however, is not the place to depict the men who are above the life of society but have not been able to realize themselves outside of it, glad to be received, embittered by being misunderstood, and discovering year by year the flaws in the hostess they had been idolizing, and the genius of the one whose true worth they had not appreciated, only to return to their first love once they have endured the disadvantages that the second love had also, and once those of the first have been somewhat forgotten. From these brief falls from favour you can judge of the unhappiness produced in Brichot by one that he knew was final. He was not unaware that Mme Verdurin sometimes made fun of him in public, of his infirmities even, and although knowing how little was to be expected of human affection, having accepted that, he still looked on the Patronne as his best friend. But from the flush that covered the university man's face, Mme Verdurin realized that he had heard her and promised herself she would be kind to him in the course of the evening. I could not help saying to her that she had not been at all so to Saniette. 'What, not nice! But he adores us, you don't know how much we mean to him! My husband is a little irritated at times by his stupidity, and you have to admit, with good reason, but why at such times doesn't he bridle up more, instead of wearing that hangdog expression? It's not being open. I don't like that. That's not to say I don't always try to calm my husband down, because, if he went too far, Saniette would only have not to come back; and I wouldn't want that because I can tell you he's penniless, he needs his dinners. But then, after all, if he takes offence, if he doesn't come back, that's no concern of mine, when you have need of other people you try not to be so idiotic. – The dukedom of Aumale was in our family for a long time before entering the House of France, M. de Charlus was explaining to M. de Cambremer, in front of an open-mouthed Morel, for whom this whole discourse was, if not addressed to him, intended. We took precedence over all the foreign princes; I could cite you a hundred examples. When, at the burial of Monsieur,[111] the Princesse de Croy attempted to kneel after my great-great-grandmother, the latter pointed out to her in no uncertain terms that she had no right to the cushion, had it removed by the officer on duty and took the matter to the King, who ordered Mme de Croy to go to Mme de Guermantes's and make her apologies. The Duc de Bourgogne having come to us with the ushers, with their rods of office raised, we obtained the King's consent to have them lowered. I know it's bad form to speak of the virtues of one's own kinsfolk. But it's well known that ours were always to the fore in times of danger. Our battle cry, once we had given up that of the Ducs de Brabant, was "Passavant".[112] So that all in all it was quite legitimate that the right everywhere to be first to which we had laid claim during all those centuries in war we should then have obtained at Court. And it's always been recognized there, I can assure you. For further proof, I shall cite the Princesse de Baden. She having so far forgotten herself as to try to dispute her rank with that same Duchesse de Guermantes of whom I spoke just now, and having sought to go in ahead of her to the King by taking advantage of a momentary hesitation on my kinswoman's part (although there was no need for one), the King quickly called out, "Enter, cousin, enter, Madame de Baden knows all too well what is due to you." And it was as Duchesse de Guermantes that she held that rank, even though she was well enough born in her own right, since through her mother she was niece to the Queen of Poland, the Queen of Hungary, the Elector Palatine, the Prince de Savoie-Carignan and the Prince of Hanover, later King of England.[113] – Maecenas atavis edite regibus![114] said Brichot, addressing M. de Charlus, who responded to this compliment with a slight nod of the head. – What were you saying? Mme Verdurin asked Brichot, with whom she would have liked to try and make amends for her words of a little earlier. – I was referring, may God forgive me, to a dandy who was the ornament of the upper crust (Mme Verdurin gave a frown) in roughly speaking the century of Augustus (Mme Verdurin, reassured by the remoteness of this 'upper crust', adopted a more serene expression), to a friend of Virgil and Horace, who carried their toadying to the point of acclaiming his more than aristocratic, his royal, ascendancy to his face, in short I was referring to Maecenas, to a bookworm who was the friend of Horace, of Virgil and of Augustus. I'm sure M. de Charlus knows very well, in every respect, who Maecenas was.' Looking graciously at Mme Verdurin out of the corner of his eye, because he had heard her arranging a rendezvous with Morel in two days' time, and was afraid of not being invited: 'I fancy, said M. de Charlus, that Maecenas was something like the Verdurin of the Ancient World.' Mme Verdurin could only half suppress a smile of satisfaction. She went up to Morel. 'He's agreeable, your parents' friend, she said. You can tell he's an educated man, well bred. He'll do well in our little nucleus. Where does he live in Paris?' Morel maintained a haughty silence and simply asked to play a game of cards. Mme Verdurin first demanded something on the violin. To general astonishment, M. de Charlus, who never spoke of the great gifts he possessed, accompanied, in the purest style, the last part (uneasy, tormented, Schumannesque, though in fact earlier than the Franck sonata) of Fauré's sonata for piano and violin.[115] I felt that he would give Morel, wonderfully gifted where tone and virtuosity were concerned, precisely what he lacked, culture and style. But I reflected with curiosity on what unites a physical taint and a spiritual gift within the same man. M. de Charlus was not very different from his brother, the Duc de Guermantes. He had even, a moment or two earlier (which was rare with him), spoken in equally bad French. Berating me (no doubt so that I might speak warmly about Morel to Mme Verdurin) for never going to see him, and I having pleaded discretion, he had replied: 'But since it's I who am asking you, it's only I who might've taken umbrage.' It could have been the Duc de Guermantes speaking. M. de Charlus was in sum only a Guermantes. But it was enough that nature should have thrown his nervous system out of balance sufficiently for him to prefer, instead of a woman, as his brother the Duc would have done, one of Virgil's shepherds or Plato's pupils, and qualities foreign to the Duc de Guermantes but often linked with this imbalance, had turned M. de Charlus into a delightful pianist, an amateur painter who did not lack taste and an eloquent talker. Who could have divined that the quick, anxious, charming style in which M. de Charlus had played the Schumannesque passage from Fauré's sonata had its correlation in – I do not dare say, was caused by – the purely physical elements of M. de Charlus, in the defectiveness of his nerves? We shall explain the term 'defectiveness of his nerves' later on, and the reasons why a Greek from the time of Socrates, or a Roman from the time of Augustus, could be what we know they were while remaining absolutely normal men, and not men-women such as we see today. In addition to a real aptitude for the arts, never brought to fruition, M. de Charlus had, far more than the Duc, loved their mother, and loved his wife, and even years later, when people spoke of them, tears would come, but superficial tears, like the perspiration of an overweight man, whose brow is beaded with sweat at the least exertion. With the difference that to the latter people say, 'You're overheated!' whereas they pretend not to notice other people's tears. They, that is to say, society; for the common people are concerned by seeing someone cry, as if a sob were more serious than a haemorrhage. His sadness following the death of his wife did not, thanks to his habit of lying, debar M. de Charlus from a way of life that was out of keeping. Later on, he stooped so low as to let it be understood that, during the funeral ceremony, he had found a means of asking the altar-boy for his name and address. And this may have been true.

The piece having finished, I took the liberty of demanding some Franck, which seemed to cause Mme de Cambremer so much pain that I did not insist. 'You can't like that,' she said. She asked instead for Debussy's Fêtes,[116] which brought cries of 'Oh, it's sublime!' from the very first note. But Morel realized that he knew only the opening bars and out of a sense of mischief, without any intention of mystifying, he began a march by Meyerbeer. Unfortunately, as he left few transitions and made no announcement, everyone thought it was still Debussy, and they went on calling out 'Sublime!' By revealing that the composer was that not of Pelléas but of Robert le Diable,[117] Morel cast a certain chill. Mme de Cambremer scarcely had time to experience it for her own part, as she had just come upon a book of Scarlatti[118] and had flung herself on it with the impulsiveness of a hysteric. 'Oh, play this, look, this, it's divine,' she cried. And yet what, in her fever of impatience, she had selected from that long-despised composer, recently promoted to the highest honours, was one of those accursed pieces that have so often stopped you from sleeping and which a merciless learner begins over and over again on the floor adjoining yours. But Morel was done with music and, since he insisted on playing cards, M. de Charlus, in order to take part, wanted whist. 'He told the Patron just now he was a Prince, Ski said to Mme Verdurin, but that's not true, his family's bourgeois merely, of minor architects. – I want to know what you were saying about Maecenas. It amuses me, so there!' Mme Verdurin repeated to Brichot, out of an amiability that went to the latter's head. To shine in the eyes of the Patronne, therefore, and perhaps in my own: 'Well truth to tell, Madame, Maecenas interests me mainly because he was the first apostle of note of that Chinese god who numbers more sectaries today in France than Brahma, than Christ himself, the almighty god Je-Men-Fou.'[119] Mme Verdurin was no longer content in such cases to sink her face into her hands. She descended with the abruptness of the insects known as mayflies on the Princesse Sherbatoff; if the latter was within range, the Patronne would clutch at the Princesse's armpit, digging in her nails, and hide her head there for a moment or two like a child playing hide-and-seek. Masked by this protective screen, she was presumed to be laughing until the tears came but was as likely to be thinking of nothing at all as those people who, while reciting a somewhat lengthy prayer, take the sensible precaution of burying their face in their hands. Mme Verdurin imitated them when listening to Beethoven quartets, at once to show that she regarded these as a prayer and not to let it be seen that she was asleep. 'I speak in all seriousness, Madame, said Brichot. Too many in number I think are the people today who spend their time contemplating their navel as if it were the centre of the universe. As sound doctrine, I raise no objection to some nirvana or other that tends to dissolve us into the Great All (which, like Munich and Oxford, is much closer to Paris than Asnières or Bois-Colombes),[120] but it is not the mark of a good Frenchman, or even of a good European, when the Japanese are perhaps at the gates of our Byzantium, that collectivized anti-militarists should be solemnly debating the cardinal virtues of free verse.' Mme Verdurin thought she could now let go of the Princesse's bruised shoulder and she allowed her face to reappear, not without pretending to wipe her eyes and to catch her breath two or three times. But Brichot wanted that I should share in the feast, and having remembered, from the soutenances de thèses[121] over which he presided so incomparably, that there is no better way of flattering the young than by taking them to task, by granting them some importance and getting them to treat you as a reactionary: 'I wouldn't want to blaspheme against the Gods of Youth, he said, casting at me one of those furtive glances which an orator accords on the sly to someone present in the audience whom he has mentioned by name. I wouldn't want to be damned as a heretic or a backslider in the Mallarméan chapel, in which our new friend, like all those of his age, will have served at the esoteric Mass, as an altar-boy at least, and proved himself a deliquescent or a Rosicrucian.[122] But really, we've seen too many of these intellectuals worshipping Art with a capital A and who, when taking to the bottle with Zola is no longer enough, inject Verlaine into their veins. Having become etheromanes in their devotion to Baudelaire, they'd no longer be capable of the manly effort their homeland may some day demand from them, anaesthetized as they are by the great literary neurosis in the hot, enervating atmosphere, heavy with the unwholesome effluvia from an opium-den symbolism.' Unable to feign even the faintest admiration for Brichot's motley and inept declamation, I turned away towards Ski and assured him that he was entirely mistaken as to the family to which M. de Charlus belonged; he replied that he was sure of his facts and added that I had even told him that his real name was Gandin, Le Gandin. 'I told you, I replied, that Mme de Cambremer was the sister of an engineer, M. Legrandin. I've never mentioned M. de Charlus. He and Mme de Cambremer are about as closely connected by birth as the Great Condé[123] and Racine. – Oh, I thought they were,' said Ski offhandedly, no more apologizing for his mistake than a few hours earlier for that which had almost caused us to miss the train. 'Are you planning to stay long on the coast?' Mme Verdurin asked M. de Charlus, whom she could foresee being one of the faithful and was fearful of seeing him return too soon to Paris. 'Good Lord, one never knows, replied M. de Charlus in a nasal drawl. I should like to stay until the end of September. – You're right, said Mme Verdurin, that's when we get the good storms. – To be perfectly truthful, that's not what would decide me. For some time I've been too neglectful of the archangel St Michael, my patron, and I would like to make amends by remaining until his feast-day, the 29th of September, at the Abbaye du Mont.[124] – Does that sort of thing much interest you?' asked Mme Verdurin, who might perhaps have managed to suppress the injury to her anti-clericalism had she not been afraid that so lengthy an excursion might lead to the violinist and the Baron 'defaulting' for forty-eight hours. 'You are perhaps afflicted by an intermittent deafness, replied M. de Charlus insolently. I have told you that St Michael was one of my glorious patrons.' Then, smiling in a benevolent ecstasy, his eyes fixed on the distance, and his voice swelling with an exaltation that seemed to me more than aesthetic, but religious: 'It's so fine at the Offertory, when Michael stands beside the altar, in a white robe, swinging a gold censer and with such a mass of perfumes that the fragrance of them rises all the way up to God! – We might go as a group, suggested Mme Verdurin, for all her horror of the cassock. – At that moment, from the Offertory,' M. de Charlus went on, who, for different reasons but in the same manner as the good orators in the Chamber, never responded to an interruption but pretended not to have heard it, 'it would be gorgeous to see our young friend Palestrina-ing or even performing an aria by Bach. He would be wild with joy, the good Abbé also, and it's the greatest homage, the greatest public homage at any rate, that I can render to my patron. So very edifying for the faithful! We will discuss it in a little while with the young musical Angelico, a soldier, like St Michael.'

Called on to be dummy, Saniette declared that he did not know how to play whist. And Cottard, noticing that there was not now long to go before the time of the train, at once started on a game of écarté with Morel. M. Verdurin, furious, marched on Saniette wearing a terrible expression: 'You don't know how to play anything then!' he shouted, furious at having lost an opportunity for a game of whist, but overjoyed at finding one for insulting the former archivist. The latter, terror-stricken, adopted a humorous expression: 'Yes I do, I know how to play the piano,' he said. Cottard and Morel had sat down facing one another. 'Your honour, said Cottard. – Suppose we move a bit closer to the table, M. de Charlus said to M. de Cambremer, worried at seeing the violinist with Cottard. It's as interesting as those questions of etiquette which, in our own day, no longer much signify. The only kings left to us, in France at any rate, are the ones in a pack of playing-cards, and I fancy there are kings galore in our young virtuoso's hand,' he soon added, out of an admiration for Morel that even extended to the way he played cards, to flatter him also, and indeed to justify the movement he was making, of leaning over the violinist's shoulder. 'Me terrump you,' said Cottard, putting on his vulgar rich foreigner's voice, whose children used to burst out laughing, as did his students and the chef de clinique, when, even at the bedside of a seriously ill patient, the Master, wearing the expressionless mask of an epileptic, came out with one of his customary jests. 'I don't quite know what I ought to play, said Morel, consulting M. de Cambremer. – As you like, you'll be beaten either way, this one or that one, it matters not, c'est égal. – Égal… Galli-Marié?[125] said the Doctor, sliding a kindly and insinuating glance in the direction of M. de Cambremer. She was what we call a true diva, a dream, a Carmen such as we shan't see again. The role was made for her. I liked hearing Ingalli-Marié[126] in it, too.' The Marquis stood up with the contemptuous vulgarity of the well-born, who do not realize that they are insulting their host by appearing not to be sure whether their guests are be associated with, and who take the English custom as their excuse for employing a disdainful expression: 'Who is that gentleman playing cards? What's his occupation in life? What does he sell? I rather like to know who I find myself with, so as not to become intimate with just anyone at all. But I didn't catch his name when you did me the honour of introducing me to him.' If M. Verdurin had, on the strength of these last words, indeed introduced him to his guests, M. de Cambremer would have thought it very wrong. But knowing that it was the opposite that had taken place, he thought it gracious and to be running no risks to assume a modest, good-natured expression. The pride that M. Verdurin took in his intimacy with Cottard had only grown since the Doctor had become an illustrious Professor. But it no longer expressed itself in the naïve form of old. Then, when Cottard was scarcely known, should anyone speak to M. Verdurin of his wife's facial neuralgia: 'There's nothing you can do,' he would say, with the naïve smugness of the people who suppose that those whom they know are famous and that everyone has heard the name of their daughter's singing teacher. 'If her doctor were in the second rank, we might be looking for a different treatment, but when your doctor's name is Cottard (a name he pronounced as though it had been Bouchard or Charcot),[127] there's no point in looking elsewhere.' Employing a contrary procedure, and knowing that M. de Cambremer had certainly heard speak of the famous Professor Cottard, M. Verdurin assumed a simple-minded expression. 'He's our family doctor, a dear good soul whom we adore and who'd go through fire and water for us; he's not a doctor, he's a friend; 'I don't suppose you know him or that his name means anything to you; at all events, for us it's the name of a thoroughly good man, of a very dear friend, Cottard.' This name, murmured wearing a modest expression, deceived M. de Cambremer, who had thought someone else had been meant. 'Cottard? You're not speaking of Professor Cottard?' At which exact moment the voice of the said Professor was to be heard who, the play having gone against him, said as he held up his cards: 'And then it was prepare to meet thy doom.' – Oh yes, the very same, he's a professor, said M. Verdurin. – What, Professor Cottard! You're not mistaken! You're quite sure it's the same one, the one who lives in the rue de Bac! – Yes, he lives in the rue de Bac, No 43. You know him? – But everyone knows Professor Cottard. He's a top man! It's as though you were asking me whether I know Bouffe de Saint-Blaise or Courtois-Suffit.[128] I could tell by listening to him right enough that he was no ordinary man, that's why I took the liberty of asking you. – Let's see now, what do I need to put down, a trump?' asked Cottard. Then abruptly, with a vulgarity that would have been irritating even in heroic circumstances, where a soldier tries to give a familiar expression to his contempt for death, but which became doubly foolish in the safe pastime of cards, Cottard, making up his mind to play a trump, assumed a grim, 'fire-eater' air and, in an allusion to those who risk their skins, staked his card as though it were his life, exclaiming 'After all, I don't give a damn!' It was not what he should have played, but he found a consolation. In the middle of the drawing-room, in a wide armchair, Mme Cottard, yielding to the effects, irresistible in her case, of after-dinner, had, after a losing struggle, succumbed to the vast if light sleep that had taken possession of her. For all that she straightened up now and again, to smile, either in self-mockery or else out of a fear of leaving some friendly word that might have been addressed to her unanswered, she would then fall helplessly back, in the grip of an implacable but delightful sickness. Rather than the noise, what had thus aroused her, for a second only, was the glance (which, in her fondness, she could see even with her eyes closed, could foresee, for the same scene took place every evening and haunted her sleep, like the hour when we shall have to get up), the glance by which the Professor indicated his spouse's slumbers to those present. He was content at the start to look at her and smile, for if, as a doctor, he was critical of this after-dinner sleep (he at any rate gave this scientific reason so as to become angry towards the end, but it is not certain that it was determinant, so various were the views he held on the matter), as an all-powerful husband and a tease, he was delighted to make fun of his wife, to only half wake her at first, so that she might go back to sleep and he have the pleasure of waking her again.

Mme Cottard was now fast asleep. 'Here, I say, Léontine, you're napping! the Professor called out to her. – I'm listening to what Mme Swann is saying, mon ami, Mme Cottard replied, weakly, and sank back into her lethargy. – It's nonsensical, exclaimed Cottard, in a minute she'll be declaring she hasn't been asleep. It's like the patients who come to a consultation and claim that they never sleep. – They imagine it perhaps,' laughed M. de Cambremer. But the Doctor was as fond of contradicting as he was of teasing, and above all could not allow a layman to dare to talk medicine to him. 'We can't imagine that we don't sleep, he proclaimed in a dogmatic tone. – Ah, replied the Marquis, bowing respectfully, as Cottard would once have done. – One can easily tell, Cottard went on, that you've haven't, as I have, administered up to two grammes of trional without managing to induce somnolescence. – Indeed, indeed, laughed the Marquis with a superior air, I've never taken trional, or any of the drugs that soon cease to have any effect but which do things to your stomach. When you've been shooting all night as I have in the forest of Chantepie, I can assure you you don't need trional in order to get to sleep. – It's the ignoramuses who say that, replied the Professor. Trional can sometimes raise nerve-tone in a remarkable way. You talk about trional, do you even know what it is? – But… I've heard that it's a medicine for sleeping. – You're not answering my question,' replied the Professor pompously, who, three times a week, in the Faculty, acted as an 'examiner'. 'I'm not asking you whether it makes one sleep or not, but what it is. Can you tell me what proportion it contains of amyl and ethyl? – No, replied M. de Cambremer, in embarrassment. I prefer a good glass of brandy or even 345 port.[129] – Which are ten times more toxic, broke in the Professor. – As for trional, ventured M. de Cambremer, my wife subscribes to all that sort of thing, you'd do better to talk with her about it. – Who must know just about as much as you do. Anyway, if your wife takes trional to make her sleep, you can see that my wife has no need of it. Come, Léontine, move yourself, you'll get stiff, do I go to sleep after dinner? What'll you be like when you're sixty if you drop off like an old woman now? You'll start to get stout, you're stopping the circulation… She can't even hear me any more. – These little naps after dinner are bad for the health, are they not, Doctor? said M. de Cambremer, in order to rehabilitate himself with Cottard. After a good meal one should take some exercise. – An old wives' tale! replied the Doctor. They've taken equal quantities of food from the stomach of a dog that hadn't moved, and from the stomach of a dog that had been running and digestion was more advanced in the first. – So it's sleep that shortens digestion? – That depends on whether we're talking about oesophageal, stomachal or intestinal digestion; no point in giving you explanations you wouldn't understand since you've never studied medicine. Come on, Léontine, by the front… quick march! It's time we went.' This was not true, for the Doctor was merely about to go on with his game of cards, but he was hoping by this more abrupt means to interfere with the sleep of this speechless woman to whom he had been addressing the most scientific exhortations without receiving any further response. Either because the will to keep sleep at bay persisted in Mme Cottard, even in the somnolent state, or because the armchair lent it no support, her head was being jerked mechanically about in space, from left to right and up and down, like some lifeless object, and Mme Cottard, well-balanced where her head was concerned, appeared now to be listening to music and now to have entered on the final phase of her death agony. But where the increasingly vehement remonstrations of her husband had failed, a sense of her own foolishness succeeded: 'My bath is just the right temperature, she murmured, but the feathers of the dictionary… she exclaimed, coming upright. Oh good heavens, I'm so silly! What am I saying? I was thinking about my hat, I must have said something foolish, I was just about to doze off, it's that wretched fire.' Everyone started to laugh, for there was no fire.

'You're making fun of me, said Mme Cottard, laughing herself, as she wiped the last traces of sleep from her brow with her hand, with the light touch of a mesmerist and the neatness of a woman rearranging her hair. I would like to present my humble apologies to dear Madame Verdurin and to learn the truth from her.' But her smile quickly turned unhappy, because the Professor, who knew that his wife was seeking to please him, and was fearful of not having succeeded, had just called out to her: 'Look at yourself in the mirror, you're as red as if you'd come out in acne, you look like an old peasant woman. – He's charming, you know, said Mme Verdurin, he's got a lovely bantering, good-natured side to him. Besides, he brought my husband back from the edge of the grave when the whole Faculty had given him up. He spent three nights beside him, without going to bed. So for me, you know, she added, in a solemn, almost menacing tone, raising her hand to the twin spheres of her musical temples with their white tresses, and as if we had wanted to lay hands on the Doctor, Cottard is sacred! He could ask for whatever he wanted. Moreover, I don't call him Doctor Cottard, I call him Doctor God! And even when I say that I'm slandering him, for this God does everything in his power to put right some of the evils the other one is responsible for. – Play a trump, M. de Charlus told Morel, with a happy expression. A trump, so as to see, said the violinist. You should have declared your king first, said M. de Charlus, you're distracted, but how well you play! – I've got the king, said Morel. – He's a fine-looking man, replied the Professor. – What's that affair up there with the pickets? asked Mme Verdurin, indicating to M. de Cambremer a superb carved escutcheon above the fireplace. Are they your arms? she added, with ironic disdain. – No, they're not ours, replied M. de Cambremer. We bear Or with three bars embattled, counter-embattled Gules of five pieces each charged with a trefoil of the field. No, those are the arms of the Arrachepels, who weren't of our stock, but from whom we inherited the house, and those of our line have never wanted to change it. The Arrachepels (Pelvilains in the old days, so it's said) bore Or with five piles couped Gules. When they intermarried with the Féternes their coat of arms changed but remained cantoned with twenty crosses crosslet with pile pery fitchy Or with dexter a vol ermine. – So much for you, said Mme de Cambremer under her breath. – My great grandmother was a d'Arrachepel or de Rachepel, as you wish, because both names are found in the old charters, M. de Cambremer went on, suddenly blushing, for only now did the thought occur to him that his wife had put him in dread of and he was afraid that Mme Verdurin might have applied to herself words that were in no way aimed at her. History has it that in the eleventh century, the first Arrachepel, Macé, known as Pelvilain, showed himself particularly skilled during a siege at uprooting stakes. Whence the nickname of Arrachepel[130] under which he was ennobled, and the stakes you see persisting through the centuries in their arms. The stakes in question are those which, to make the fortifications harder to approach, they planted, they bedded, if you'll allow the expression, in the ground in front of them, and then joined them together. It's they that you quite rightly called pickets and which had no connection with the floating sticks of our good La Fontaine.[131] For they were held to make a place impregnable. That brings a smile obviously, what with modern artillery. But you must remember we're talking about the eleventh century. – It lacks topicality, said Mme Verdurin, but the little campanile has character. – You have, said Cottard, the luck of a… cuckoo-clock, a word he happily repeated in order to avoid Molière's word.[132] – Do you know why the king of diamonds failed his Army medical? – I wish I'd been in his shoes,' said Morel, who was bored by his military service. – Oh, he's no patriot, exclaimed M. de Charlus, who could not restrain himself from pinching the violinist's ear. –

No, you don't know why the king of diamonds failed his medical? Cottard went on, who insisted on his jokes, it's because he's only got one eye. – You've got a hard game on your hands, Doctor, said M. de Cambremer, to show Cottard that he knew who he was. – This young man is astonishing, M. de Charlus broke in artlessly, pointing to Morel. He plays like a god.' This observation did not much appeal to the Doctor, who replied: 'Time will show. He may be too cunning by half. – Queen, ace,' announced Morel triumphantly, the luck having been with him. The Doctor bowed his head as if unable to deny this good fortune and admitted, fascinated: 'That's good.' – We're so glad to have dined with M. de Charlus, said Mme de Cambremer to Mme Verdurin. – You didn't know him? He's quite agreeable, he's unusual, he's from another era' (she would have found it hard to say which), replied Mme Verdurin, with the self-satisfied smile of a dilettante, a judge and a hostess. Mme de Cambremer asked me whether I would be coming to Féterne with Saint-Loup. I could not contain a cry of admiration on seeing the moon suspended like an orange-coloured lantern from the vault of oak trees that led away from the château. 'It's nothing as yet; in a minute, when the moon is higher and the valley is lit up, it'll be a thousand times more beautiful. That's something you don't have at Féterne!' she said scornfully to Mme de Cambremer, who did not know how to reply, not wishing to run her own property down, especially in front of her tenants. 'Will you be staying some time yet in these parts, Madame? M. de Cambremer asked Mme Cottard, which might have passed for a vague intention to invite her but which excused him for the present from any more precise arrangement. – Oh certainly, Monsieur, I insist on this annual exodus for the children's sake. No matter what people say, they need the fresh air. I'm perhaps very primitive in these matters, but I find that there's no treatment for children like good air, even though the contrary were to be proved to me by A plus B. Their dear little faces are quite altered already. The Faculty wanted to send me to Vichy; but it's too airless and I'll start worrying about my stomach once these great big lads have grown a bit more. Besides, the Professor, with the examinations he puts them through, always has his nose to the grindstone and the heat tires him out. I consider that you need frankly to relax when you've been hard at it like him all year long. We shall be here for a good month yet, whatever happens. – Ah, then we shall be seeing one another again. – I'm all the more obliged to remain in any case because my husband has to do a tour of Savoie and it'll be another fortnight before he's stationed here permanently. – I like the valley side even more than the sea side, Mme Verdurin went on. You're going to have splendid weather for your return. – We'll even have to see whether the carriages are harnessed up, in the event of your absolutely insisting on going back to Balbec this evening, M. Verdurin said to me, because I don't see the necessity for it myself. We could have you driven back tomorrow morning by carriage. It'll certainly be fine. The roads are admirable.' I said that it was out of the question. 'It's not time, in any case,' objected the Patronne. 'Let them be, they've plenty of time. Much good it'll do them arriving at the station an hour ahead of time. They're better off here. And you, my young Mozart, she said to Morel, not daring to address herself directly to M. de Charlus, will you not stay? We have some lovely bedrooms overlooking the sea. – But he can't, replied M. de Charlus, on behalf of the attentive card-player, who had not heard. He has leave only up to midnight. He must go back there to sleep, like a very good, very obedient little boy,' he added, in a voice at once self-satisfied, affected and insistent, as though he were deriving a sadistic and voluptuous pleasure from employing this chaste comparison, as well as letting his voice dwell in passing on what concerned Morel, from touching him, for want of a hand, with words that seemed to be palpating him.

From the sermon that Brichot had directed at me, M. de Cambremer had concluded that I was a Dreyfusard. Since he was as anti-Dreyfusard as it was possible to be, out of courtesy towards an enemy, he began to eulogize a Jewish colonel to me who had always treated a cousin of the Chevregnys with great fairness and had got him the promotion he deserved. 'And my cousin's ideas were absolutely opposed to his,' said M. de Cambremer, sliding over what these ideas were, but which I sensed to be as ancient and ill-formed as his own face, ideas that a few families in certain small towns must have held for a long time past. 'Well, you know, I find that very fine!' M. de Cambremer ended. It is true that he was hardly using the word 'fine' in the aesthetic sense, where, in the case of his mother or his wife, it might have described different works, but works of art. M. de Cambremer preferred to make use of this qualifier when, for example, congratulating someone delicate on having put on a little weight. 'What, you've put back three kilos in two months? You know, that's fine!' Refreshments were being served from a table. Mme Verdurin invited the gentlemen to go themselves to choose the drink that suited them. M. de Charlus went and drank his glass and came quickly back, to sit beside the card-table, and did not stir again. Mme Verdurin asked him: 'Did you have some of my orangeade?' Then M. de Charlus, with a gracious smile and in a crystalline tone that was rare with him, and with endless pursings of the lips and wigglings of his torso, replied: 'No, I preferred its neighbour, the fraisette[133] I fancy, it's delicious.' It is strange that a certain category of secret actions should have as their external consequence a manner of speaking or of gesticulating which betrays them. If a gentleman believes, or not, in the Immaculate Conception, or in Dreyfus's innocence, or in the plurality of worlds, but wishes to keep it to himself, you will find nothing in his voice, or in his bearing, that enables you to see his thoughts. But on hearing M. de Charlus say, in that high-pitched voice, and with that smile and those movements of the arm, 'No, I preferred its neighbour, the fraisette', you could have said: 'Aha, he likes the strong sex', with the same certainty as that which enables a judge to condemn a criminal who has not confessed, or a doctor a general paralytic who perhaps does not know himself what is wrong with him but who has made certain mistakes in pronunciation from which it can be deduced that he will be dead within three years. Perhaps the people who infer from the way of saying 'No, I preferred its neighbour, the fraisette' to a so-called anti-physical love, have no need of so much science. But that is because in this case there is a more direct relationship between the tell-tale sign and the secret. Without quite putting it into words, we sense that it is a gentle, smiling lady who is answering and who appears affected because she is passing herself off as a man and because we are not accustomed to seeing men put on so many airs and graces. And it is more gracious perhaps to imagine that for a long time now a certain number of angelic women have been included by mistake in the male sex, where, as exiles, even as they vainly beat their wings at the men whom they fill with a physical repulsion, they know how to arrange a drawing-room or create an 'interior'. M. de Charlus was unconcerned that Mme Verdurin should be standing up, and remained installed in his armchair so as to be closer to Morel. 'Do you not think it a crime, said Mme Verdurin to the Baron, that that person there, who might be enthralling us with his violin, should be at the écarté table. When you can play the violin like he does! – He plays cards well, he does everything well, he's so intelligent,' said M. de Charlus, keeping an eye on the cards in order to advise Morel. This was not as it happens his only reason for not getting up from his chair for Mme Verdurin. With the peculiar amalgam that he had created out of his social conceptions, as at once a great nobleman and an amateur of the arts, instead of being polite in the same way as another man from his world would have been, he had created for himself tableaux vivants of a sort based on Saint-Simon; at this moment, he was amusing himself playing the Maréchal d'Huxelles, other aspects also of whom were of interest to him, whose vanity was such, so it was said, that he refused to rise from his seat, seemingly out of laziness, for the most distinguished members of the Court. 'I say, Charlus, said Mme Verdurin, who was beginning to grow familiar, you wouldn't have in your Faubourg some broken-down old nobleman who might come and be my porter? – But of course… of course, replied M. de Charlus, smiling jovially, but I don't advise it. – Why? – I'd be afraid for your sake that fashionable visitors might not get any further than the lodge.' This was the first of the skirmishes between them. Mme Verdurin hardly heeded it. There were, alas, to be others in Paris. M. de Charlus continued not to leave his chair. He could not, however, help smiling imperceptibly when he saw, in the submission so readily obtained from Mme Verdurin, confirmation of his favourite maxims as to the prestige of the aristocracy and the cravenness of the bourgeoisie. The Patronne appeared in no way surprised by the Baron's posture and if she left him, it was only because she had been concerned to see me being badgered by M. de Cambremer. Before that, however, she wanted to elucidate the question of M. de Charlus's relations with the Comtesse Molé. 'You told me you knew Mme de Molé. Do you go there?' she asked, giving to the words 'go there' the sense of being received by her, of having being authorized to call on her. M. de Charlus replied with an inflection of disdain and an affectation of precision, and in a sing-song tone: 'But yes, now and again.' This 'now and again' sowed doubts in Mme Verdurin, who asked: 'Have you met the Duc de Guermantes there? – Well, I don't recall. – Ah, you don't know the Duc de Guermantes? – But how could I not know him?' replied M. de Charlus, a smile causing his mouth to undulate. This smile was ironic; but as the Baron was afraid of allowing a gold tooth to show, he suppressed it beneath a reflux of his lips, so that the resulting sinuosity was that of a smile of benevolence: 'Why do you say, "How could I not know him?" – But when he's my brother,' said M. de Charlus off-handedly, leaving Mme Verdurin plunged in stupefaction and uncertainty as to whether her guest was making fun of her, or was a natural child or the son of another marriage. The idea that the Duc de Guermantes's brother might be called the Baron de Charlus never entered her head. She made her way over to me: 'I heard M. de Cambremer inviting you to dinner just now. That's all right with me, you understand. But in your own best interest, I very much hope you won't go. For one thing, it's infested with bores. Oh, if you enjoy dining with provincial counts and marquises that no one knows, you'll have your fill of them. – I think I shall be obliged to go there once or twice. I'm not so free as it happens, for I have a young cousin whom I can't leave on her own (I had found that this purported kinship simplified things where going out with Albertine was concerned). But where the Cambremers are concerned, since I've already introduced her to them… – You must do as you wish. I can tell you this: it's excessively unhealthy; and what good is it going to do you to pick up an inflammation of the chest, or a nice little family rheumatism? – But is it not a very pretty spot? – Mmmyesss… if you like. But I confess to you frankly that I like the view over the valley a hundred times better from here. For one thing, even if they'd paid us, I wouldn't have taken the other house, because the sea air is fatal for M. Verdurin. Your cousin only needs to be a bit high-strung… But then you're high-strung, I fancy… you have breathless attacks. Well, you'll see! Go there once and you won't sleep for a week. No, it's not the place for you.' And without thinking how contradictory her next words would be of the earlier ones: 'If it'd amuse you to see the house, which isn't bad, pretty would be overstating it, but amusing after all, with the old moat, the old drawbridge, as I shall have to go through with it and dine there one time, well, come here that day, I'll try to bring all my little circle, then it'll be nice. The day after tomorrow we're going to Arembouville by carriage. The road is magnificent, they have delicious cider. Come with us. You, Brichot, you must come, too. And you too, Ski. It'll make an outing that my husband must have planned in advance in any case. I'm none too sure who he's invited. Monsieur de Charlus, are you one of them?' The Baron, who heard only these final words and did not know they had been talking about an excursion to Arembouville, gave a start: 'Strange question,' he murmured in a sardonic tone, by which Mme Verdurin felt piqued. 'Anyway, she said to me, while we wait for the Cambremer dinner-party, why shouldn't you bring your cousin here? Does she like conversation, intelligent people? Is she agreeable? Yes, well then, very good! Come with her. The Cambremers aren't the only people in the world. I can understand them being glad to invite her, they can't manage to get anyone. Here she'll have good air, and always men who are intelligent. At all events, I'm counting on you not letting me down next Wednesday. I've heard you were having a tea-party in Rivebelle with your cousin, M. de Charlus and I don't know who else. You ought to plan to transport the whole lot here, it'd be nice, a small consignment en masse. Communications couldn't be simpler, the roads are ravishing; if need be, I'll have you fetched. I don't know for that matter what you can find attractive in Rivebelle, it's infested with mosquitoes. Perhaps you're thinking of the reputation of its galettes. The ones my cook makes are in a different class. 'I'll make you eat Normandy galettes, the real thing, and the local shortbread, I say no more. Oh, if you insist on the filth they serve in Rivebelle, I want none of it, I don't murder my guests, Monsieur, and even if I wanted, my cook would refuse to make those unspeakable objects and would change establishments. You don't know what they're made from, the galettes from there. I know a poor girl who got peritonitis from them, which carried her off in three days. She was only seventeen. It's sad for her poor mother, added Mme Verdurin, with a melancholy expression, beneath the spheres of her temples, weighed down by sorrow and experience. But there, go and have tea in Rivebelle if it amuses you to be fleeced and to throw money out of the window. Only, I beg you, I'm entrusting you with a confidential mission: on the stroke of six o'clock, bring all your people here, don't let them disband and all go off home one by one. You can bring whom you please. I wouldn't say that to everyone. But I'm sure your friends are nice, I can see here and now that we understand one another. Apart from the little nucleus, some very agreeable people are coming on Wednesday in fact. You don't know little Mme de Longpont? She's a delight and so quick, not in the least bit snobbish, you'll see, you'll really take to her. She's also due to bring a whole group of friends, added Mme Verdurin, to show that this was quite the thing and to encourage me by example. We'll see who has the most influence and brings the most people, out of Barbe de Longpont and you. Besides, I believe they're due to bring Bergotte, too, she added with a vague expression, the collaboration of that celebrity having been rendered all too improbable by a notice that had appeared in the papers that morning, to the effect that the great writer's health was giving rise to the gravest anxiety. Anyway, you'll see, it'll be one of my most successful Wednesdays, I don't want any women who are tiresome. Don't judge by this evening's, in any case, that was a total failure. Don't protest, you can't have been any more bored than I was, I found it tedious myself. It won't always be like this evening, you know! I'm not talking about the Cambremers, moreover, who are impossible, but I've known society people who passed for being agreeable, well, compared to my little nucleus, they didn't exist. I heard you say you thought Swann intelligent. My opinion first of all is that that was much exaggerated, but not even to speak of the man's character, which I always found fundamentally unsympathetic, sly, underhand, I often had him to dinner on Wednesdays. Well, you can ask the others, even compared with Brichot, who's certainly no genius, but a good fifth-form teacher whom I got into the Institute just the same, Swann was nothing any more. He was so dreary!' And as I was emitting a contrary opinion: 'That's the way it was. I don't want to say a word against him, since he was your friend; he was very fond of you for that matter, he spoke about you in a delightful way, but ask these people whether he ever said anything interesting at our dinners. That's the acid test after all. Well, I don't know why, but Swann when he came to me never produced, never gave us anything. And yet the little that he was worth, he acquired it here.' I assured her that he was very intelligent. 'No, you only thought that because you hadn't known him for as long as I had. Basically, you very soon got the measure of him. He bored me. (Translation: he went to the La Trémoilles and the Guermantes and knew that I didn't.) And I can stand anything, except boredom. That, no, never!' Her horror of being bored was now the reason on which Mme Verdurin relied to explain the make-up of her little circle. She had not yet entertained duchesses because she was unable to be bored, as she was to go on a cruise on account of sea-sickness. I told myself that what Mme Verdurin had been saying was not wholly false and, whereas the Guermantes might have declared Brichot to be the stupidest man they had ever met, I remained unsure whether he was not at bottom superior, if not to Swann himself, then at least to those people having the Guermantes sense of humour, who would have had the good taste to avoid and the decency to blush at his pedant's facetiousness, or so I asked myself, as if a measure of light might be thrown on the nature of intelligence by the answer I gave, with the seriousness of a Christian, influenced by Port-Royal, posing the problem of Grace to himself.[134] 'You'll see, Mme Verdurin continued, when you have society people together with truly intelligent people, people from our circle, that's where you need to see them, the cleverest man of the world in the kingdom of the blind is no more than a one-eyed man here. He freezes the others, moreover, who no longer feel any confidence. To the point where I ask myself whether, instead of trying out the combinations that ruin everything, I shan't have series for the bores alone, so as to enjoy my little nucleus properly. We must end: you shall come with your cousin. That's agreed. Good. At least, here, the two of you'll get to eat. At Féterne, it's hunger and thirst. Oh, I mean, if you like rats, go there this instant, you'll be offered your fill of them. And they'll keep you there as long as you like. I mean, you'll die of hunger. Anyway, when I go, I shall dine before setting out. And to make it jollier, you must come and fetch me. We'll have a hearty tea and supper when we get back. Do you like tarte aux pommes? Yes, well, our chef's better at them than anybody. You can see, I was right to say you were meant to live here. So come and stay. You know the house is far roomier than it looks. I don't tell people so as not to attract bores. You could bring your cousin here permanently. She'd get quite different air here from Balbec. With the air here, I claim I can cure the incurable. Take my word for it, I've cured some, and not just recently. Because I lived quite near here in the old days, something I'd unearthed, that I got for a crust of bread and which had far more character than their Raspelière. I'll show you it if we take a drive. But I acknowledge that even here, the air is really bracing. But then I don't want to talk about it too much, the Parisians would only have to start liking my little hideaway. That's always been my luck. Anyway, tell your cousin. We'll give you two pretty rooms overlooking the valley, you'll see it in the mornings, the sun in the mist! And who's this Robert de Saint-Loup you were talking about? she said anxiously, for she had heard that I was due to go and visit him in Doncières and was afraid he might cause me to default. You could bring him here instead if he's not a bore. I've heard about him through Morel, I fancy he's one of his great friends,' said Mme Verdurin, telling a complete lie, because Saint-Loup and Morel did not even know of one another's existence. But having heard that Saint-Loup knew M. de Charlus, she thought that this was through the violinist and wanted to appear to be in the swim of things. 'He isn't doing medicine by any chance, or literature? You know, if you need a word putting in with examinations, Cottard can do anything, and I can do what I like with him. As for the Academy, for later on, for I imagine he's not yet of an age, I can call on several votes. Your friend'll be on familiar ground here and it'd perhaps amuse him to see the house. It's not much fun, Doncières. Anyway, you must do as you like, whatever suits you best,' she ended, without insisting, so as not to appear to be trying to get an introduction to the nobility, and because her claim was that the name of the regime under which she made the faithful live, her tyranny, was liberty. 'Hello, what's the matter?' she said, catching sight of M.

Verdurin, who, gesturing impatiently, had gone out on to the wooden verandah that stretched above the valley on one side of the drawing-room, like a man who is choking with rage and has need of fresh air. 'Is it Saniette again who's been annoying you? But since you know he's an idiot, resign yourself to the fact, and don't get into these states… I don't like it, she said to me, because it's bad for him, he goes blue in the face. But I have to say, too, that you sometimes need the patience of an angel to put up with Saniette and to remind yourself above all that it's an act of charity to take him in. For my own part, I confess, such is the magnificence of his stupidity, it delights me rather. I imagine you heard his bon mot after dinner: "I can't play whist, but I can play the piano!" Isn't that lovely! The greatest thing you've ever heard, and a lie as it happens, because he can't play one any more than the other. But my husband, underneath his rough exterior, is very sensitive, very kind, and that sort of selfishness in Saniette, forever taken up with the effect he's going to create, drives him wild… Come, mon petit, calm yourself, you know very well Cottard told you it was bad for your liver. And it's I who'll have to bear the brunt, said Mme Verdurin. Tomorrow Saniette's going to come with his little crise de nerfs and his tears. Poor man! He's very ill. But then, that's no reason why he should kill others. Besides, even at the times when he's too unwell, when you'd like to feel sorry for him, his silliness stops pity dead. He's simply too stupid. You just need to tell him very gently that these scenes are making the two of you ill, that he mustn't come back; since that's what he most dreads, it'll have a calming effect on his nerves,' whispered Mme Verdurin to her husband.

You could barely make out the sea through the right-hand windows. But those on the other side showed the valley, on which there had now fallen the snow of the moonlight. From time to time, the voice of Morel and that of Cottard could be heard. 'Have you got a trump?' A 'yes' in English. 'Oh, you've got some good ones, vous en avez de bonnes,' said M. de Cambremer to Morel, in answer to his question, for he had seen that the Doctor's hand was full of trumps. 'Here's the wife of diamonds,' said the Doctor. That's a trump, you know? Oy play, oy take… But there isn't a Sorbonne any more, said the Doctor to M. de Cambremer; there's only the University of Paris now.' M. de Cambremer confessed himself ignorant of why the Doctor had made this remark. 'I thought you were talking about the Sorbonne, the Doctor went on. I heard you say "You're bringing out the right one, tu nous la sors bonne," he added with a wink, to show that this was a witticism. Wait, he said, pointing to his adversary, I'm getting ready to deliver the knock-out blow'. And the blow had to be an excellent one so far as the Doctor was concerned, for in his delight he began as he laughed to shake both shoulders voluptuously, which in the family, in the Cottard 'genus', was an almost zoological mark of satisfaction. In the previous generation, the movement of rubbing the hands together as if one were soaping them had accompanied this movement. Cottard himself had originally used this double mimicry simultaneously, but one fine day, without anyone knowing to what conjugal, or perhaps magisterial, intervention it was to be attributed, the rubbing of the hands had disappeared. Even at dominoes, when he forced his partner to 'draw' and take the double-six, which was for him the keenest of pleasures, the Doctor contented himself with the movement of the shoulders. And when – as rarely as possible – he went to his native village for a few days, and met his first cousin again, who for his part was still at the hand-rubbing stage, he would say on returning to Mme Cottard: 'I thought poor René very common.' 'Have you got any of these little theengs? he said, turning to Morel. No? Then I shall play this old David.[135] – But you've got five then, you've won! – A fine victory, Doctor, said the Marquis. – A victory à la Pyrrhus,' said Cottard, turning to the Marquis and peering over his eyeglass to judge of the effect of his bon mot. 'If we've still got time, he said to Morel, I'll give you your revenge. It's me to… Ah, no, here are the carriages, it'll be for Friday, and I'll show you a trick you don't see every day.' M. and Mme Verdurin led us outside. The Patronne was especially ingratiating with Saniette, so as to be sure he would come back the next day. 'But you don't look covered up to me, mon petit, M. Verdurin said to me, his advanced years sanctioning this fatherly form of address. It's as though the weather had changed.' These words filled me with joy, as if the profound life, the sudden appearance of different combinations that they implied in nature, must herald other changes, occurring this time in my own life and creating new possibilities there. Merely by opening the door on to the gardens before leaving, you felt that a different 'weather' had just then occupied the scene; breaths of cool air, one of summer's delights for the senses, were stirring in the pine wood (where Mme de Cambremer had once dreamed of Chopin) and almost imperceptibly, in caressing meanders and capricious eddies, had begun their faint nocturnes. I refused the rug that I would accept on the subsequent evenings when Albertine would be there, more for the secrecy of our pleasures than against the risks of the cold. The Norwegian philosopher was searched for in vain. Had he been taken with a stomach-ache? Had he been afraid of missing the train? Had an aeroplane come to fetch him? Had he been carried up in an Assumption? The fact was that he had vanished without anyone having had the time to notice, like a god. 'You're wrong, M. de Cambremer said to me, it's as cold as charity. – Why charity? asked the Doctor. Beware of breathless attacks, the Marquis went on. My sister never goes out in the evenings. But then she's none too good at present. Don't stay bare-headed like that, anyway, get your headgear on quickly. – They're not breathless attacks a frigore, said Cottard sententiously. Oh, in that case, said M. de Cambremer, bowing, since that's your opinion… – Get a second opinion,' said the Doctor, sneaking glances outside his eyeglass for a laugh. M. de Cambremer did laugh but, convinced that he was right, he insisted. 'Yet each time my sister goes out in the evenings he said, she has an attack. – There's no point in quibbling, answered the Doctor, without being aware of his own rudeness. I don't practise medicine at the seaside in any case, unless summoned to a consultation. I'm here on holiday.' He was even more so as it happens than he might have wished. M. de Cambremer having said to him as they got into the carriage together: 'We're fortunate in having another medical celebrity, Doctor du Boulbon, so close by (not on your side of the bay, on the other, but it's so shut in at that point),' Cottard, who normally, on deontological grounds, abstained from criticizing his colleagues, could not help exclaiming, as he had in front of me on that fateful day when we had gone into the little casino: 'But he's not a doctor. He practises literary medicine, a therapeutics of fantasy, quackery. We're on good terms even so. I'd take the boat to go and visit him one time were I not obliged to absent myself.' But from the expression that Cottard assumed in order to discuss du Boulbon with M. de Cambremer, I sensed that the boat on which he would have gladly gone in search of him bore a close resemblance to the vessel which the doctors of Salerno had fitted out to go and destroy the waters discovered by another literary doctor, Virgil (who had also taken away their entire clientèle), but which foundered with them during the crossing.[136] 'Good-bye, mon petit Saniette, don't fail to come tomorrow, you know that my husband is very fond of you. He likes your wit, your intelligence; yes, he does, you know that, he likes putting on a show of brusqueness, but he can't do without seeing you. It's always the first question he puts to me: "Is Saniette coming? I so love seeing him!" – I've never said that,' said M. Verdurin to Saniette, with a simulated candour that seemed perfectly to reconcile what the Patronne had been saying with his own treatment of Saniette. Then, looking at his watch, no doubt so as not to to prolong the farewells in the evening damp, he advised the coachmen not to dawdle, but to be careful on the descent, and assured us that we would get there before the train. The latter would be setting down the faithful, one at one station, another at another, ending with myself, none of the others going as far as Balbec, and starting with the Cambremers. They, so as not to make their horses go all the way up to La Raspelière in the dark, took the train with us to Douville-Féterne. The nearest station to them was not in fact this one, which is some little way from the village and even further from the château, but La Sogne. On arriving at the station of Douville-Féterne, M. de Cambremer insisted on 'crossing the palm', as Françoise used to put it, of the Verdurins' coachman (the same gentle, sensitive coachman, with the melancholy ideas), for M. de Cambremer was generous, being 'from his mama's side' rather in this. But whether it was that 'his papa's side' intervened at this juncture, even as he gave it, he felt qualms that a faux pas was being committed – either by himself because, unable to see properly, he might for example be giving a sou instead of a franc, or by the recipient, who could not notice the size of the gift he was getting. He drew attention to it, therefore. 'That is a franc I'm giving you, isn't it?' he said to the coachman, causing the coin to reflect the light, and so that the faithful might report it to Mme Verdurin. 'Isn't it? It's twenty sous, as it's only a short ride.' He and Mme de Cambremer left us at La Sogne. 'I shall tell my sister that you have breathless attacks, he repeated to me. It's sure to interest her.' I realized he meant: to please her. As for his wife, in taking leave of me, she employed two of those abbreviations which, even when written, used in those days to shock me in a letter, although we have grown used to them since, but which, when spoken, seem to me still, even today, to have about them, in their studied familiarity, something intolerably pedantic: 'Glad to have spent the evening with you, she said to me; regards to Saint-Loup if you see him.' In saying which words, Mme de Cambremer pronounced it Saint-Loupe. I have never found out who had pronounced it like that in her presence, or what had given her to believe that it was to be so pronounced. The fact remains that for several weeks she pronounced it Saint-Loupe, and that a man who had great admiration for her and followed her in everything, did likewise. Were other people to say Saint-Lou, they insisted, emphasizing the Saint-Loupe, either indirectly to put these other people right, or else to mark themselves off from them. But no doubt women more brilliant than Mme de Cambremer told her, or gave her indirectly to understand, that it should not be pronounced that way, and that what she had taken to be originality was an error which would have it thought that she was not au fait with the ways of society, for shortly afterwards Mme de Cambremer was again saying Saint-Lou, and her admirer likewise abandoned all resistance, either because she had lectured him, or because he had noticed she was no longer sounding the final consonant, and had told himself that if a woman of her worth, her energy and her ambition had given in, it had to be with good reason. The worst of her admirers was her husband. Mme de Cambremer loved teasing other people, often very impertinently. As soon as she set about someone in this way, whether myself or somebody else, M. de Cambremer began looking at the victim, and laughing. As the Marquis had a squint – which can lend an intention of wit to the amusement even of an imbecile – the effect of this laugh was to bring a bit of the pupil back into the otherwise unbroken white of his eye. Thus does a bright interval produce a patch of blue in a sky fleecy with clouds. The monocle, moreover, protected this delicate operation like the glass over a valuable painting. As for the actual intention behind the laugh, one hardly knew whether it was friendly: 'Ah, you rascal, you're to be envied, and no mistake. You've found favour with a woman with a strong sense of humour'; or catty: 'Well Monsieur, I hope that's taught you a lesson, put that in your pipe and smoke it'; or obliging: 'I'm here, you know, I can laugh because it's all in fun, but I shan't let you be maltreated'; or cruelly complicit: 'I don't have to add my own pennyworth, but, you can see, I find the insults she's heaping on you hilarious. I'm convulsed, so I approve, I her husband. And so if you take it into your head to return the compliment, you'll find you've got me to deal with, mon petit Monsieur. First you'd receive two good sound slaps on the cheek, then we'd go and cross blades in the forest of Chantepie.'

Whatever the truth of these various interpretations of the husband's mirth, the wife's passing whims soon came to an end. M. de Cambremer would then leave off laughing, the temporary prunella would vanish, and as you had, for the past few minutes, lost the habit of that completely white eye, it lent this red-faced Norman something at once bloodless and ecstatic, as though the Marquis had just been operated on, or were imploring Heaven, beneath his monocle, for a martyr's crown.

CHAPTER 3

Sorrows of M. de Charlus. – His fictitious duel. – The stations of the 'Transatlantic'. – Weary of Albertine, I want to break with her.

I could not keep awake. I was taken up as far as my floor in the lift, not by the liftboy, but by the cross-eyed chasseur, who struck up a conversation to relate to me that his sister was still with the very rich gentleman, and that one time, because she had wanted to return home rather than behave responsibly, her gentleman had sought out the mother of the cross-eyed chasseur, and of the other, more favoured children, who had taken the nonsensical girl back to her friend as quickly as possible. 'You know, Monsieur, she's a great lady, my sister. She plays the piano and can speak Spanish. You mightn't believe it, of the sister of the mere employee who takes the lift up, but she denies herself nothing; Madame has her own maidservant, it wouldn't amaze me if one day she had her own carriage. She's very pretty, if you could see her, a bit too stuck-up, but Lord, that's understandable! She's quite a humorist. She never leaves a hotel without relieving herself in a wardrobe or a chest of drawers, so as to leave a small memento for the chambermaid who'll have to clean up. Sometimes, she even does it in a cab, and after she's paid her fare, she hides in a corner, so's to have a good laugh watching the driver curse and swear who's got to wash down his cab again. My father had a stroke of luck, too, finding that Indian prince he'd met in the old days for my young brother. Of course, that's a different kind of arrangement. But it's a superb position. If it weren't for the travelling, what you dream of. There's only me up till now who's been left out. But you can never tell. Luck runs in my family; who knows whether I won't one day be President of the Republic? But I'm making you chatter on (I had not said a single word and was starting to fall asleep listening to his words). Good night, Monsieur. Oh, thank you, Monsieur! If everyone was as kind-hearted as yourself, there'd be no poor people any more. But as my sister says, there'll always need to be some so that now I'm rich, I can tell them to go to blazes. Pardon the expression. Good night, Monsieur.'

Every night perhaps we accept the risk of experiencing, while we sleep, sufferings that we consider to be null and void because they will be endured only in the course of a sleep that we believe is without consciousness. In fact, on the evenings when I returned home late from La Raspelière, I was very sleepy. But as soon as the cold weather arrived, I was unable to get to sleep straight away because the brightness from the fire was as if a lamp had been lit. It had only flared up, however, and – as with a lamp, or the daylight when dusk falls – its too bright light was not long in dying down; and I entered into sleep, which is like a second apartment that we have, into which, abandoning our own, we go in order to sleep. It has its own system of alarms, and we are sometimes brought violently awake there by the sound of a bell, heard with perfect clarity, even though no one has rung. It has its servants, its particular visitors who come to take us out, so that, just when we are ready to get up, we are obliged to recognize, by our almost immediate transmigration into the other apartment, that of our waking hours, that the room is empty, that no one has come. The race which inhabits it, like that of the earliest humans, is androgynous. A man there will appear a moment later in the aspect of a woman. Objects have the ability to turn into men, and men into friends or enemies. The time that elapses for the sleeper, in sleep of this kind, is utterly different from the time in which a waking man's life transpires. Its passage may now be far more rapid, a quarter of an hour seeming like a whole day; or at other times much longer, we think we have just dozed off, and have slept right through the day. And then, on sleep's chariot, we descend into depths where the memory can no longer keep pace with it and where the mind stops short and is forced to turn back. Sleep's horses, like those of the sun, move at so uniform a pace, in an atmosphere where no resistance can any longer arrest them, that some small alien aerolith is needed (hurled from the azure by what Unknown Hand?) if this regular sleep is to be affected (which would otherwise have no reason to stop but would endure with a similar motion until the end of time) and made to return, wheeling suddenly about, towards reality, traversing without drawing breath the borderlands of life – the sounds of which, vague almost as yet, but already perceptible, though distorted, the sleeper will soon be hearing – and comes abruptly to earth at our waking. From these deep sleeps we then awake in a dawn, not knowing who we are, being nobody, quite new, prepared for anything, our brain finding itself emptied of the past that had hitherto been our life. And perhaps it is better still when the return to earth of our waking is a brutal one and when our sleeping thoughts, concealed behind a vestment of oblivion, do not have time progressively to return before sleep has ended. Then, from the black storm through which we seem to have passed (but we do not even say we) we emerge lying prostrate, without any thoughts: a 'we' it may be without content. What hammer-blow has this person or thing that is here received that it should be aware of nothing, be stupefied, up until such time as the memory comes hurrying back, and restores its consciousness or personality? For these two kinds of reawakening, however, we must not go to sleep, not even deeply, under the law of habit. For habit keeps watch over all that it imprisons in its nets; we must elude it, find sleep at the moment when we thought we were doing something quite other than sleeping, find the sleep in short that does not dwell under the tutelage of foresight, in the company, even concealed, of reflection. At all events, in reawakenings such as I have just described them, and which were mine most often after I had dined the evening before at La Raspelière, everything took place as if this were how it was, and I can testify, I, the strange human being who, while waiting for death to deliver him, lives behind closed shutters, knows nothing of the world, stays unmoving as an owl and, like an owl, can see with any clarity only in the dark. Everything takes place as if this were how it was, but perhaps only a layer of cotton-wool has prevented the sleeper from perceiving the inner dialogue between his memories and the incessant verbiage of sleep. For (which can be explained just as readily for that matter in the first, vaster, more mysterious, more astral system), at the moment when waking occurs, the sleeper hears an inner voice that says to him: 'Will you be coming to that dinner this evening, my dear friend? How pleasant that would be!' and thinks: 'Yes, since it'll be pleasant, I shall go'; then, his wakefulness increasing, he suddenly remembers: 'My grandmother has only a few weeks to live, so the doctor assures us.' He rings the bell, weeps at the thought that, unlike in the past, it will not be his grandmother, his dying grandmother, who will come to answer it, but an indifferent valet de chambre. Moreover, when sleep carried him so far away from the world inhabited by memory and thought, through an ether in which he was alone, more than alone, without that companion even in whom we perceive ourselves, he was outside of time and its measurement. The valet de chambre is already entering, and he does not dare ask him the time, for he does not know whether he has been asleep, nor how many hours he has slept (he wonders whether it is not how many days, having returned so broken in body, so rested in spirit, and so homesick in his heart, as if from a journey too distant not to have lasted for a long time). True, we can claim that there is only one time, for the futile reason that it is by looking at the clock that we have confirmed that what we thought was a whole day was only a quarter of an hour. But at the moment when we confirm it, we are of course a man awake, plunged into the time of waking men, we have deserted the other time. Perhaps even more than another time: another life. We do not include the pleasures we have during sleep when reckoning up those we have experienced in the course of our existence. To allude only to the most crudely sensual of them, which of us, on waking, has not felt some irritation at having experienced, while we slept, a pleasure which, unless we want to overtax ourselves, we cannot, once awake, repeat indefinitely on that particular day? It is as if a part of our substance has been wasted. We have felt pleasure in another life that is not ours. Were we to include the pains and pleasures of our dreams (which generally vanish very quickly on waking) in a budget, it would not be in that of our everyday life.

Two kinds of time, I have said; perhaps there is only one, not because that of the waking man holds good for the sleeper, but perhaps because the other life, that in which we sleep, is not – in its profound part – subject to the category of time. That is what I imagined when, in the aftermath of the dinners at La Raspelière, I went so completely asleep. Here is why. I was beginning to feel desperate when, on waking, I found that, after I had rung ten times, the valet had not arrived. At the eleventh, he entered. It was only the first time. The other ten had been mere adumbrations in my still continuing sleep of the summons that I wanted. My numbed hands had not even moved. On these mornings (which is what makes me say that sleep perhaps knows nothing of the law of time), my attempt to wake up consisted above all in an attempt to introduce the obscure, undefined block of sleep that I had just been living into the framework of time. This is no easy task; the sleep that does not know whether we have slept for two hours or for two days cannot provide us with a point of reference. And if we do not discover one outside of it, and do not succeed in re-entering time, we go back to sleep again, for five minutes that seem to us like three hours.

I have always said – and proved by experience – that sleep is the most potent of hypnotics. Having slept deeply for two hours, fought with any number of giants, and formed any number of undying friendships, it is far more difficult to come awake than after taking several grams of veronal. And so, reasoning from one to the other, I was surprised to learn through the Norwegian philosopher, who had had it from M. Boutroux, 'his eminent associate – forgive me, his colleague', what M. Bergson thought about the particular ill effects on the memory produced by hypnotics. 'Of course, M. Bergson will have said to M. Boutroux, if the Norwegian philosopher is to be believed, hypnotics taken from time to time in moderate doses do not affect the solid memory of our everyday lives, so firmly fixed in us. But there are other kinds of memory, higher and more unstable ones. One of my colleagues is lecturing on ancient history. He has told me that if, the night before, he had taken a pill to get to sleep, he had difficulty, during his lecture, in recovering the Greek quotations that he needed. The doctor who had recommended the pills to him assured him they did not affect the memory. "Perhaps that's because you don't have to give Greek quotations," the historian had replied, not without a mocking vanity.'

I do not know whether this conversation between M. Bergson and M. Boutroux is accurate. The Norwegian philosopher, very profound and lucid though he was, and so passionately attentive, may have misunderstood. My personal experience has given me the opposite results. The moments of oblivion that ensue, the next day, after we have ingested certain narcotics, bear only a partial, if troubling, resemblance to the oblivion that reigns in the course of a night of deep, natural sleep. Now, what I forget in either case is not some line of Baudelaire's which wearies me rather, 'like a dulcimer',[1] not some concept from one of the philosophers I have been citing, but the very reality of the common objects that surround me – if I am asleep – my non-perception of which turns me into a madman; it is – if I am awake and emerging after an artificial sleep – not the system of Porphyry or Plotinus, which I am as able to discuss as on any other day, but the answer I have promised to give to an invitation, the memory of which has been replaced by a complete blank. The elevated idea has remained in place; what the hypnotic has disabled is our capacity to act in minor matters, in everything that calls for action if we are to repossess it just in time, to seize hold of some memory of our everyday life. Despite all that may be said about survival after the destruction of the brain, I observe that to every deterioration in the brain there corresponds a fragment of death. We possess all our memories, if not the faculty of recalling them, says, following M. Bergson, the great Norwegian philosopher, whose language I have not tried to imitate, so as not to slow things down any further. If not the faculty of recalling them. But what is a memory that we cannot recall? Or let us go further. We do not recall our memories of the last thirty years; but we are totally steeped in them; why then stop at thirty years, why not continue this previous existence back beyond our birth? Given that I do not know a whole portion of the memories that are behind me, given that they are invisible to me, that I do not have the faculty of summoning them, who is to say that in this mass which is unknown to me, there are not memories that date back long before my life as a man? If I can have, in me and around me, so many memories that I do not remember, this oblivion (a de facto oblivion at least, since I do not have the faculty of seeing anything) may apply to a life that I have lived in the body of another man, or even on another planet. The one oblivion erases everything. But what then would the immortality of the soul signify whose reality the Norwegian philosopher had asserted? The person that I shall be after death has no more reason to remember the man that I have been since my birth than this latter remembers what I was before it.

The valet de chambre had entered. I did not tell him that I had rung several times, for I realized that hitherto all I had done was to dream that I had rung. I was alarmed to think, however, that this dream had had the clarity of a cognition. Could cognition, by the same token, have the unreality of a dream?

I asked him on the other hand who had rung so many times during the night. He told me 'no one', and could say that with certainty, because it would have shown up on the 'board'. Yet I had heard repeated, almost furious peals, which vibrated still in my ear and were to remain audible for several days. It is rare, however, for sleep thus to discharge into waking life memories which do not die with it. Such aeroliths can be counted. If it is an idea that sleep has forged, this quickly disintegrates into tenuous, irretrievable fragments. But here sleep had fabricated sounds. Being more physical and simpler, they had lasted longer. I was astonished at the relatively early hour the valet de chambre told me that it was. I felt rested nonetheless. It is light sleeps that are of long duration, because, being intermediate between waking and sleeping, and preserving a partly erased but permanent notion of the former, they require an infinitely longer time to refresh us than does a deep sleep, which may be short. I felt thoroughly at ease for another reason. If reminding ourselves that we are tired is enough to make us painfully aware of our tiredness, to say to ourselves 'I feel rested' is enough to create repose. Now I had dreamed that M. de Charlus was a hundred and ten years old and had just twice slapped his mother, Mme Verdurin, in the face for spending five billion on a bunch of violets; I was assured therefore of having slept deeply, and of having dreamt the contrary of my notions of the day before and of all the possibilities of my current life; that was enough for me to feel fully rested.

I would have greatly astonished my mother, who could not understand M. de Charlus's assiduousness chez Verdurin, if I had told her (on the very day on which Albertine's toque had been ordered, without my saying a word to her, so that it might come as a surprise) with whom M. de Charlus had come to dine in a private room at the Grand-Hôtel in Balbec. His guest was none other than the footman of a cousin of the Cambremers. This footman was dressed with great elegance, and when he crossed the hall with the Baron, 'played the man-of-the-world' in the eyes of the tourists, as Saint-Loup would have put it. Even the young chasseurs, the 'Levites', a crowd of whom were descending the steps of the temple at that moment, which was that of their going off duty, paid no attention to the two new arrivals, one of whom, M. de Charlus, was anxious to show, by his lowered gaze, how very little he was according them. He seemed to be pushing his way through their midst. 'Prospérez, cher espoir d'une nation sainte,'[2] he said, recalling some lines from Racine, quoted in a very different sense. 'I beg your pardon?' asked the footman, none too well versed in the classics. M. de Charlus did not answer, for he took a certain pride in discounting questions and in walking straight ahead of him, as if there were no other guests in the hotel and as if he alone, the Baron de Charlus, existed in the world. But having continued with Josabeth's lines: 'Venez, venez, mes filles'[3], he felt distaste and did not add, as she does, 'il faut les appeler',[4] for these children had not yet reached the age when sexuality is fully developed, and which appealed to M. de Charlus. Although, moreover, he had written to Mme de Chevregny's footman, because he did not doubt his docility, he had hoped he would be more virile. On seeing him, he found him more effeminate than he would have liked. He told him that he would have expected to be dealing with someone else, for he knew another of Mme de Chevregny's footmen by sight, having in fact noticed him on her carriage. This was a sort of country bumpkin, the complete opposite of the present one, who, adjudging his fancy ways to be so many marks of superiority, and not doubting that it was these man-of-the-world qualities that had seduced M. de Charlus, could not even understand who the Baron meant. 'But I've no workmates except for one and you can't have had your eye on him, he's a fright, he looks like a great fat peasant.' And at the thought that it was perhaps this yokel whom the Baron had seen, he felt punctured in his self-esteem. The Baron guessed as much, and widening his inquiries: 'But I haven't made a special vow to know only Mme de Chevregny's people, he said. Couldn't you, whether here or in Paris, since you'll soon be going, introduce many of your workmates to me, from one house or another? – Oh no, replied the footman, I don't associate with anyone from my own class. I only speak to them when on duty. But there's one highly respectable person – could introduce you to. – Who? asked the Baron. – The Prince de Guermantes.' M. de Charlus was greatly put out that he should be offered only a man that old, and with whom, what was more, he had no need of a recommendation from a footman. Thus he curtly declined the offer and, not allowing himself to be deterred by the flunkey's social pretensions, he began again to explain to him what he would like, the style, the type, a jockey maybe, and so on. Afraid that the lawyer who was passing at that moment might have overheard him, he thought it canny to show that he had been talking about something quite other than what might have been supposed, and said with insistence, and to the company at large, but as if all he were doing was continuing the conversation: 'Yes, despite my years, I have kept my taste for curio-hunting, my taste for pretty curios, I'll spend more than I can afford on an old bronze or an antique chandelier. I worship Beauty.' But to get the footman to understand the change of subject that he had executed so rapidly, M. de Charlus laid so much stress on each word, and in addition, so that the lawyer should hear, shouted them all out so loudly, that this whole bit of play-acting would have sufficed to reveal what it was concealing to ears more alert than those of the legal official. The latter no more suspected anything than any other of the hotel guests, all of whom saw an elegant foreigner in the very well-turned-out footman. On the other hand, if the men of the world were deceived and took him for an ultra-smart American, hardly had he appeared before the servants before they saw through him, just as one convict will recognize another convict, even quicker, nosed out from afar, as one animal is by certain others. The chefs de rang raised an eyebrow. Aimé cast a suspicious glance. The sommelier, shrugging his shoulders, said behind his hand, because he thought this was politeness, a disobliging phrase that everyone heard. And even our old Françoise, whose sight was failing and who was passing the bottom of the stairs at that moment, to go and eat with the guests' servants, looked up, recognized a domestic where the hotel guests had not suspected one – just as the old nurse Euryclea recognizes Ulysses long before the suitors at the banquets[5] – and, seeing M. de Charlus walking with him in this familiar manner, appeared overcome, as if all of a sudden, wicked things that she had heard spoken but had not believed had assumed in her eyes a distressing probability. She never mentioned this incident, to me or to anyone else, but it must have set her brain to working hard, for later on, whenever in Paris she had occasion to see 'Julien', of whom she had hitherto been so fond, she always treated him with politeness, but which had cooled and was always diluted by a strong admixture of reserve. This same incident led someone else to entrust me with a confidence, on the other hand; this was Aimé. When I passed M. de Charlus, the latter, who had not been expecting to come across me, had called out, raising his hand, 'Good evening', with the indifference, apparent at least, of a great nobleman who believes he is a law unto himself and deems it more adroit not to appear to be hiding. But Aimé, who had just then been observing him with a distrustful eye and saw that I greeted the companion of the man in whom he was sure of having recognized a domestic, asked me that same evening who he was. For Aimé had for some time now liked to chat or rather, as he put it, no doubt in order to mark the, as he saw it, philosophical nature of these chats, to 'debate' with me. And as I had frequently told him it embarrassed me that he should remain standing beside me as I ate, when he could have sat down and shared my meal, he declared that he had never come across a guest having 'such sound powers of argument'. He was talking at that moment with two waiters. They had bowed to me, I did not know why; their faces were not known to me, although there sounded in their conversation a confused murmur that did not seem new. Aimé was upbraiding the two of them for having become engaged, of which he disapproved. He called me as a witness, I said I could not have an opinion, not knowing them. They reminded me of their names, and that they had often waited on me in Rivebelle. But one of them had let his moustache grow, the other had shaved his off and been shorn; as the result of which, although it was the old heads that were set on their shoulders (and not a different one, as in the faulty restorations at Notre-Dame),[6] they had remained as invisible for me as those objects that elude the most painstaking search, yet are simply lying in full view, unnoticed by anyone, on a mantelpiece.[7] The moment I learned their names, I recognized exactly the uncertain music of their voices, for I could again see the old faces that had determined it. 'They want to get married and they don't even know English!' Aimé said to me, without reflecting that I was not well up in the profession of hotelier and hardly understood that if you do not know foreign languages you cannot rely on finding a position. I, who had expected him to find out soon enough that this new diner was M. de Charlus, and even imagined that he must remember him, having waited on him in the dining-room when the Baron had come to see Mme de Villeparisis during my first stay in Balbec, told him his name. Not only did Aimé not remember the Baron de Charlus, but the name appeared to make a strong impression on him. He told me that the next day he would hunt among his belongings for a letter that I might be able to explain to him. I was all the more surprised in that M. de Charlus, when he had wanted to give me one of Bergotte's books in Balbec, that first year, had made a special point of asking for Aimé, whom he must have come across again subsequently in the restaurant in Paris where I had had lunch with Saint-Loup and his mistress, and where M. de Charlus had come to spy on us. It is true that Aimé had not been able to carry out these missions in person, having been, in the one instance, in bed, and the second time busy serving. I had serious doubts, however, as to his sincerity when he claimed not to know M. de Charlus. For one thing, he must have suited the Baron. Like all the chefs d étage at the Balbec hotel, and like several of the Prince de Guermantes's valets de chambre, Aimé belonged to a race more ancient than that of the Prince and hence more noble. When you asked for a private room, you thought at first you were alone. But soon, in the pantry, you observed a sculptural maître d'hôtel, of that red-haired Etruscan kind of which Aimé was the type, somewhat aged by an excess of champagne and seeing the moment for Contrexéville water unavoidably approaching. Not all the guests asked them only to wait on them. The commis waiters, who were young, scrupulous and in a hurry, with a mistress waiting for them in the town, made their escape. And so Aimé would criticize them for their irresponsibility. He had the right. He was responsible. He had a wife and children, and was ambitious for them. Thus he did not repel the advances made to him by a stranger, male or female, even though he might have to remain all night. For work must come before anything else. He was so much the kind of person to appeal to M. de Charlus that I suspected him of a falsehood when he told me he did not know him. I was wrong. It was the simple truth when the chasseur told the Baron that Aimé (who had hauled him over the coals the next day) had gone to bed (or gone out), and on the other occasion was busy serving. But the imagination goes beyond the reality in supposition. And the chasseur's embarrassment had probably sown doubts in M. de Charlus as to the genuineness of his excuses, doubts which had wounded feelings in him that Aimé had not suspected. We have seen also that Saint-Loup had prevented Aimé from going to the carriage, in which M. de Charlus, who had somehow or other obtained the maître d'hôtel's new address, had suffered a fresh disappointment. Aimé, who had not noticed him, felt the astonishment one can imagine when, on the evening of the same day on which I had had lunch with Saint-Loup and his mistress, he received a letter sealed with the Guermantes arms, from which I shall quote a few passages as an example of unilateral madness in an intelligent man addressing an imbecile of good sense. 'Monsieur, I have not succeeded, in spite of efforts that would surprise many people seeking uselessly to be received and acknowledged by me, in getting you to listen to the few explanations for which you did not ask me but which I thought it befitting both my dignity and your own to offer you. I shall therefore write here what it would have been simpler to say to you in person. I shall not hide from you that the first time I set eyes on you in Balbec, I found your face frankly unsympathetic.' There then followed reflections on the resemblance – remarked only on the second day – to a deceased friend for whom M. de Charlus had felt great affection. 'I then had the idea for a moment that you might, without it at all hindering you in your profession, come and have with me the games of cards with which his gaiety was able to dispel my sadness, and give me the illusion that he was not dead. Whatever the nature of the more or less foolish supposition that you have probably arrived at, and more within reach of a servant (who does not even deserve that name since he has refused to serve) than the comprehension of so elevated a sentiment, you probably thought to make yourself seem important, not knowing who I was and what I was, by sending reply, when I made them ask you for a book, that you were in bed; but it is a mistake to believe that an incivility can ever add to one's charms, of which you are in any case totally devoid. I would have broken things off then had I not, by chance, been able to speak to you the following morning. Your resemblance to my poor friend became so marked, causing even the unbearable shape of your protuberant chin to vanish, that I realized that it was the deceased who, at that moment, was lending you something of his own very kindly expression so as to enable you to take hold of me again, and prevent you from wasting the unique good fortune that was being offered to you. Indeed, although I do not wish, since all this has no longer any object, and I shall have no further occasion to meet you in this life, to bring into all this brutal questions of self-interest, I would have been only too happy to obey my dead friend's prayer (for I believe in the communion of saints and their impulse to intervene in the destiny of the living), to behave towards you as towards him, who had his own carriage and his servants, and to whom it was perfectly natural that I should devote the greater part of my resources since I loved him like a son. You have decided otherwise. To my request that you bring me a book, you sent reply that you had to go out. And this morning, when I sent to ask you to come to my carriage, you, if I can so put it without committing a sacrilege, denied me for a third time. You will forgive me for not enclosing in this envelope the elevated gratuities that I had counted on giving you in Balbec, and to which I would find it too painful to adhere in respect of someone with whom I had thought for a moment to share everything. You might at the very least spare me making a fourth futile approach to you, in your restaurant, to which my patience will not extend. (And here M. de Charlus gave his address, an indication of the times when he could be found in, etc.) Farewell, Monsieur. Since I believe that, resembling as you do the friend that I have lost, you cannot be entirely stupid, as otherwise physiognomy would be a false science, I am persuaded that if, one day, you think back on this incident, it will not be without experiencing a certain regret and a certain remorse. For my own part, believe me when I quite genuinely say that I harbour no bitterness. I would have preferred us to part on a less unhappy memory than this third futile overture. It will be quickly forgotten. We are like those vessels that you must have seen now and again from Balbec, which have crossed for a moment; it might have been to the advantage of either one to stop; but one of them has seen things differently; soon they will be out of sight of one another on the horizon, and the encounter is erased; but before this final separation, each salutes the other, as does here, Monsieur, wishing you every good fortune, the Baron de Charlus.'

Aimé had not even read this letter to the end, able to make neither head nor tail of it, but suspecting a hoax. Once I had explained to him who the Baron was, he appeared somewhat thoughtful and experienced that regret which M. de Charlus had predicted. I would not even swear that he did not then write to apologize to a man who gave carriages to his friends. But in the interim, M. de Charlus had made the acquaintance of Morel. At most, his relations with the latter being perhaps Platonic, M. de Charlus would now and again seek out company for an evening such as that in which I had just met him in the hall. But he could no longer turn away from Morel the violent sentiments which, free a few years earlier, had asked for nothing better than to attach themselves to Aimé and had dictated the letter that made me feel embarrassed for M. de Charlus's sake and which the maître d'hôtel had shown me. It was, because M. de Charlus's love was of an anti-social kind, a more striking example of the imperceptible yet mighty force of these currents of passion, in which the lover, like a swimmer being swept away unawares, very soon loses sight of land. Doubtless the love of a normal man also can, when, by the successive inventions of his desires, his regrets, his disappointments and his projects, the lover constructs an entire novel around a woman whom he does not know, enable us to measure the notable divergence between the two legs of the compass. At the same time, this divergence was singularly widened by the nature of a passion that is not usually shared, and by the difference in status between M. de Charlus and Aimé.

I went out with Albertine every day. She had made up her mind to go back to painting and had chosen to work first at the church of Saint-Jean-de-la-Haise, which no one any longer visits and is known to very few, hard to get directions to, impossible to find without being guided, and takes a long time to reach in its isolation, more than half an hour from the station at Epreville, the last houses in the village of Quetteholme having been left well behind. Where the name Epreville was concerned, I found no agreement between the curé's book and Brichot's indications. According to the one, Epreville was the ancient Sprevilla; the other gave Aprivilla as the etymology. The first time we took the little railway in the opposite direction to Féterne, that is to say towards Grattevast. But it was the dog-days and terrible enough in itself to be leaving straight after lunch. I would have preferred not to go out so soon; the burning, luminous air awoke thoughts of indolence and refreshment. It filled my and my mother's rooms, according to their exposure, with unequal temperatures, like rooms at a spa. Mama's bathroom, festooned with sunlight, of a brilliant, Moorish whiteness, seemed plunged in the bottom of a well, on account of the four plaster walls on which it looked out, while up above, in the square left empty, the sky, whose fleecy, superimposed billows of cloud could be seen gliding past, one above the other, resembled (because of the longing you felt) a pool, situated on a terrace (or seen inverted in a mirror attached to the window) and filled with blue water, reserved for your ablutions. Despite the burning temperature, we had gone to catch the one o'clock train. But Albertine had felt very hot in the compartment, and hotter still during the long journey on foot, and I was afraid she might catch cold by then remaining motionless in that damp hollow to which the sun does not reach. On the other hand, having realized, ever since our first visits to Elstir, that she would appreciate not simply the luxury, but even a certain measure of comfort of which her lack of money had deprived her, I had arranged with a livery stable in Balbec that a carriage should come to fetch us every day. To avoid the heat, we took the road through the forest of Chantepie. The invisibility of the innumerable birds, some of them half seabirds, that were calling to one another in the trees beside us, gave the same impression of repose as you get with your eyes shut. At Albertine's side, imprisoned by her arms in the back of the carriage, I listened to these Oceanides. And when I chanced to catch sight of one of these musicians, passing from one leaf underneath another, there was so little apparent connection between it and its songs that I could not believe I was seeing their source in that humble little body, as it hopped, surprised and unseeing. The carriage could not take us right to the church. I made it stop on the way out of Quetteholme and said good-bye to Albertine. For she had alarmed me by saying about this church, as about other monuments and about certain paintings: 'It'd be such a pleasure to see it with you!' That was a pleasure I did not feel capable of giving. I felt it in front of beautiful things only if I was alone, or pretended to be so, and was silent. But since she had thought she would be able to experience, thanks to me, artistic sensations that cannot be communicated in this way, I found it wiser to tell her that I was leaving her, would come to fetch her at the end of the day, but that meanwhile I needed to go back with the carriage to pay a call on Mme Verdurin or the Cambremers, or even to spend an hour with Mama in Balbec, but never any further. The first times, at least. For Albertine having once said to me out of caprice: 'It's a nuisance that nature has arranged things so badly and put Saint-Jean-de-la-Haise on one side and La Raspelière on the other, so that you're incarcerated for the whole day in the place that you've chosen', as soon as I had received the toque and the veil, I ordered, as my ill-fortune would have it, a motor-car in Saint-Fargeau (Sanctus Ferreolus, according to the curé's book). Albertine, whom I had kept in ignorance, and who had come to fetch me, was surprised to hear the throb of the engine in front of the hotel and overjoyed when she learned that the car was for us. I made her come upstairs to my room for a moment. She was jumping for joy. 'Are we going to pay a call on the Verdurins? – Yes, but it would be better not to go there dressed like that since you're going to have your car. Here, you'll look better in these.' And I brought out the toque and veil, which I had hidden. 'Are they for me? Oh, you're so sweet!' she exclaimed, jumping at my neck. Aimé encountered us on the stairs and, proud of Albertine's elegance and of our means of transport, for such vehicles were something of a rarity in Balbec, granted himself the pleasure of descending the stairs behind us. Albertine, wanting to be seen for a moment in her new outfit, asked me to have the hood folded back, which we could lower later on so as to have greater freedom together. 'Come on, said Aimé to the mechanic, whom he did not in fact know and who had not stirred, didn't you hear them say to fold the hood back?' For Aimé, educated in the ways of the world by life in a hotel, where he had moreover achieved an eminent rank, was not as shy as the cab-driver, for whom Françoise was a 'lady'; despite the lack of any earlier introduction, he addressed plebeians whom he had never met as tu, without your quite knowing whether this was aristocratic disdain on his part or a fraternizing with the people. 'I'm not free, replied the chauffeur, who did not know me. I was ordered for Mademoiselle Simonet. I can't drive Monsieur.' Aimé gave a guffaw: 'Come on, you great oaf, he replied to the mechanic, whom he at once convinced, this is Mademoiselle Simonet in fact and Monsieur, who is ordering you to fold your hood back, is in fact your employer.' And since Aimé, although personally not feeling any sympathy for Albertine, was, on account of me, proud of the outfit she was wearing, he whispered to the chauffeur: 'You'd be happy to drive a princess like her every day if you could, wouldn't you!' On this first occasion, it was not I alone who was able to go to La Raspelière, as I did on other days while Albertine was painting; she wanted to go with me. She intended for us to stop here and there along the way, but thought it impossible to start by going to Saint-Jean-de-la-Haise, that is to say in a different direction, and to make an excursion that seemed meant for another day. She learned on the contrary from the mechanic that nothing could be simpler than to go to Saint-Jean, where he would be in twenty minutes, and where we could remain, if we wanted, for several hours, or push on much further, for from Quetteholme to La Raspelière he would not take more than thirty-five minutes. We realized this the moment the car leaped forward and in a single bound covered twenty paces of an excellent horse. Distances are simply the ratio of space to time and vary with it. We express the difficulty that we have in getting to a place in a system of leagues and kilometres, which becomes false the moment that difficulty decreases. The art of distance, too, is modified, since a village that had seemed to be in a different world from some other village, becomes its neighbour in a landscape whose dimensions have altered. At all events, learning that there perhaps exists a universe in which 2 and 2 make 5, and where a straight line is not the shortest distance between two points, would have surprised Albertine much less than hearing the mechanic tell her that it was easy to go in one afternoon to Saint-Jean and to La Raspelière. Douville and Quetteholme, Saint-Mars-le-Vieux and Saint-Mars-le-Vêtu, Gourville and Balbec-le-Vieux, Tourville and Féterne, prisoners hitherto as hermetically locked away in the cells of separate days as Méséglise and Guermantes of old, and on which the same pair of eyes could not rest in a single afternoon, released now by the giant in the seven-league boots, came to congregate around our tea-time, their towers and their belfries, and their old gardens, which the nearby wood had been eager to disclose.

Having arrived at the foot of the corniche road, the car climbed it in a single movement, with a continuous sound, like a knife being ground, while the sea dropped away and broadened out beneath us. The ancient rustic houses of Montsurvent came rushing up, clutching their vines and rosebushes tightly to them; the pine trees of La Raspelière, more agitated than when the evening wind got up, ran off in all directions to avoid us, and a new manservant whom I had never seen before came to open the door to us on the front steps, while the gardener's son, betraying a precocious aptitude, gazed hungrily at the driving seat. As it was not a Monday, we did not know whether we would find Mme Verdurin, for except on that day, when she was 'at home', it was unwise to call on her without warning.

No doubt she stayed in 'in principle', but this expression, which Mme Swann had used in the days when she, too, was attempting to form her little clan and attract a clientèle without having to stir, even though this often failed to pay its way, and which she translated mistakenly into 'on principle', simply meant 'as a general rule', that is to say, with numerous exceptions. For not only did Mme Verdurin like going out, but she carried her duties as a hostess to extremes, and when she had had company for lunch, immediately after the coffee, the liqueurs and the cigarettes (despite the first torpor from the heat and from having to digest, when they would have preferred to watch the Jersey packet passing across the enamel sea through the foliage on the terrace), the programme included a series of excursions in the course of which the guests, forcibly installed in carriages, were taken willy-nilly to one or other of the viewpoints that abound round Douville. This second part of the entertainment was not, however (the effort of getting up and climbing into the carriage having been achieved), found any less attractive by guests already prepared, by the succulent dishes, the fine wines or the sparkling cider, to let themselves be easily intoxicated by the purity of the breeze and the magnificence of the beauty spots. Mme Verdurin showed these off to strangers a little as if they were (more or less distant) annexes of her own property, which you could not fail to go and see once you came to lunch with her and which, conversely, you would not have known about had you not been entertained by the Patronne. This pretension, of arrogating to herself the sole rights to their excursions, as to Morel's and, in the old days, Dechambre's playing, and of constraining the landscape to form part of the little clan, was not, however, as absurd as it may at first seem. Mme Verdurin made fun of the lack of taste which, as she saw it, the Cambremers had shown in the furnishing of La Raspelière and the arrangement of the garden, as well as in the excursions they took, or made others take, in the neighbourhood. Just as, according to her, La Raspelière had only begun to be what it should have been since it became the asylum of the little clan, so she declared that the Cambremers, forever retracing in their barouche, along the railway line, beside the sea, the one unpleasant road to be found in the vicinity, had always lived in the district but did not know it. There was some truth in this assertion. From routine, a lack of imagination and a want of curiosity about a region that seemed trite for being so close by, the Cambremers only ever left home to visit the same places and by the same roads. To be sure, they laughed heartily at the Verdurins for presuming to teach them about their own neighbourhood. But had they been cornered, they, and even their coachman, would have been incapable of taking us to the splendid, slightly secret, places to which M. Verdurin conducted us, here lifting the gate into a private but abandoned property, where others would not have felt free to venture; there getting down from the carriage in order to follow a lane that was not negotiable, but always with the certain reward of a marvellous landscape. Let me say for the rest that the garden at La Raspelière was in some sense a summation of all the excursions one could make for many kilometres around. First of all on account of its commanding situation, overlooking the valley on one side, and the sea on the other, and then because, even on the one side, that of the sea for example, clearings had been created amidst the trees, so that from here you took in one horizon, from there a different one. At each of these viewpoints, there was a garden seat; you went and sat by turns on that from which you could make out Balbec, or Parville, or Douville. In one direction even, seats had been placed more or less above the sheer cliff, and a little way back from it. From these, you had a foreground of greenery and a horizon that already seemed the vastest possible, but which became infinitely larger if, by continuing along a small path, you went as far as the next seat, from which you took in the whole amphitheatre of the sea. Here you could perceive the precise sound made by the waves, which did not, on the other hand, penetrate to the more sunken parts of the garden, from where the waves still allowed themselves to be seen, but no longer heard. For our hosts, these places of repose at La Raspelière bore the name of 'views'. And indeed, they had gathered round the house the best 'views' of the neighbouring villages, beaches and woodlands, glimpsed much reduced by the distance, like Hadrian assembling in his villa scale reproductions of the most celebrated monuments from various provinces. The name that accompanied the word 'view' was not necessarily that of a place on the coast, but often on the opposite side of the bay, which you could make out and which had preserved a certain relief despite the extensiveness of the panorama. Just as you might take down a volume from M. Verdurin's shelves to go and read for an hour at 'the Balbec view', so, if the weather was clear, you went to have liqueurs at 'the Rivebelle view', on condition, however, that there was not too much wind, for, despite the trees planted on either side, the air there was keen. To come back to the excursions by carriage that Mme Verdurin used to organize in the afternoons, if, on her return, the Patronne found the cards of some society person who was 'passing along the coast', she pretended to be overjoyed, but was desolate at having missed their visit and (although they might have come only to see 'the house' or to meet for a day with a woman whose artistic salon in Paris was celebrated, but unfre-quentable) quickly made M. Verdurin invite them to dinner for the following Wednesday. As, frequently, the tourist was obliged to leave before then, or was afraid of returning late at night, Mme Verdurin had agreed that on Saturdays, she was always to be met with at tea-time. There were not so very many of these tea-parties, and I had known more brilliant ones in Paris at the Princesse de Guermantes's, Mme de Gallifet's or Mme d'Arpajon's. But then this was no longer Paris and for me the charm of the setting reacted not only on the attractions of the gathering but on the quality of the visitors. The encounter with some society person which, in Paris, afforded me no pleasure at all, but which, at La Raspelière, where he had come from some way off via Féterne or the Forest of Chantepie, changed in character and significance, became an agreeable incident. Now and again it was someone I knew perfectly well and would not have taken a single step to meet again at the Swanns'. But his name had a different ring to it on these cliffs, like that of an actor, whom you often hear in a theatre, appearing on the playbills, in a different colour, for some unscheduled or gala performance, where his celebrity is suddenly magnified by the unexpectedness of the context. Since, in the country, there is no standing on ceremony, the society person would often take it upon himself to bring the friends with whom he was staying, emphasizing to Mme Verdurin in an undertone by way of an excuse that he could not leave them behind, living as he was in the house; to his hosts, in return, he made out that it was as a sort of courtesy that he was offering to introduce them to this distraction, amidst the monotony of seaside life, of going into a centre of the mind, of touring a magnificent house and of eating an excellent tea. This at once made up a gathering of several half-worthy individuals; and if a small patch of garden with a few trees, which would look mean in the country, acquires an extraordinary charm in the avenue Gabriel or the rue de Monceau, where multi-millionaires alone can treat themselves to one, inversely, noblemen who take a back seat at a Paris soirée acquired their full value on Monday afternoons at La Raspelière. No sooner seated around the table, covered with a cloth embroidered in red on which, beneath the trumeaux painted in camaieu, they were served galettes, Normandy feuilletés, boat-shaped tarts filled with cherries, like coral pearls, and 'diplomats',[8] than these guests at once underwent, from their closeness to the deep bowl of azure on to which the windows gave and which one could not help seeing at the same time, an alteration, a profound transmutation which turned them into something more precious. What was more, even before having seen them, when you came to Mme Verdurin's on a Monday, the people who in Paris looked only with a weariness born of habit at the elegant turn-outs drawn up in front of a sumptuous hôtel, felt their hearts beat faster at the sight of two or three wretched traps halted in front of La Raspelière, beneath the tall pine trees. No doubt it was because the rustic setting was different and that, thanks to this transposition, your social impressions had been refreshed. It was also because the miserable vehicle hired in order to go and visit Mme Verdurin evoked a beautiful drive and a costly 'arrangement' reached with a coachman who had demanded 'so much' for the whole day. But the faint stirrings of curiosity felt towards new arrivals, as yet impossible to distinguish, derived also from the fact that everyone asked themselves 'Who's it going to be?', a question that was hard to answer, not knowing who might have arrived to spend a week at the Cambremers' or elsewhere, but which we always like to put to ourselves in these solitary, rural existences, in which the encounter with a human being you have not seen for a long time, or the introduction to someone you do not know, ceases from being the tiresome affair it is living in Paris, and makes a delightful interruption in the empty space of lives that are too isolated, in which even the arrival of the postman becomes a pleasure. And the day when we arrived by motor-car at La Raspelière, since it was not a Monday, M. and Mme Verdurin must have fallen victim to that need to see company which troubles both men and women, and makes the invalid who has been shut away in isolation, far from his family, to get cured, long to throw himself from the window. For the new servant, who was more mobile, and familiarized already with such expressions, having answered that 'if Madame had not gone out she must be at "the Douville view", that he would go and find out', he at once returned to say that she would receive us. We found her looking a little dishevelled, for she had come from the garden, the farmyard and the kitchen-garden, where she had gone to feed her peacocks and her chickens, to look for eggs, and to pick flowers and fruit for 'her table runner', a reminder, in miniature, of one of her garden walks; but on the table it conferred the distinction of making it support only things that were useful and good to eat; for around the other gifts from the garden that were the pears and the whipped egg whites, there rose the tall stems of viper's bugloss, pinks, roses and coreopsis, between which were to be seen, as if between flowering signposts, through the window-panes, the boats going past out to sea. From the surprise that M. and Mme Verdurin displayed, breaking off from arranging the flowers in order to receive the visitors who had been announced, on seeing that these visitors were none other than Albertine and myself, I could tell that the new servant, full of zeal but not as yet familiar with my name, had repeated it wrongly and that Mme Verdurin, hearing the name of unknown guests, had nonetheless said for them to come in, feeling a need to see anyone at all. And the new servant was studying the spectacle from the doorway in order to understand what role we played in the household. Then he went off at a run, with long strides, for he had been taken on only the day before. Once Albertine had shown off her toque and her veil to the Verdurins, she gave me a look to remind me that we did not have too much time ahead of us for what we wished to do. Mme Verdurin wanted us to wait for tea, but we refused, when all of a sudden a plan was unveiled which would have reduced to nothing all the pleasures I had been promising myself from my outing with Albertine: the Patronne, unable to make up her mind to leave us, or perhaps to allow a new diversion to elude her, wanted to go back with us. Long accustomed to the fact that offers of this kind on her part did not give pleasure, and being uncertain probably whether this one would cause us any, she concealed the diffidence that she felt in making it beneath an excessive self-assurance, and not even looking as though she supposed there to be any doubt as to our answer, she asked us no questions, but said to her husband, referring to Albertine and me, as if she were doing us a favour: 'I'll bring them back!' At the same time, there was applied to her lips a smile that did not belong to her personally, a smile I had already seen on certain people when they said to Bergotte, with a knowing air: 'I've bought your book, it's tremendous', one of those collective, universal smiles that, when they have need of them – just as we make use of the railway and of removal vans – individuals borrow, except for a few ultra-refined ones, such as Swann or M. de Charlus, on whose lips I have never seen that particular smile settle. From that moment on, my visit was poisoned. I made a pretence of not having understood. After a moment, it became obvious that M. Verdurin would be of the party. 'But M. Verdurin'll find it very long, I said. – No, no, replied Mme Verdurin with a cheerful, condescending expression, he says it'll amuse him greatly to retrace with young people the road he travelled so often in the old days; if need be he can get up next to the driver, that doesn't frighten him, and we'll come quietly back together by the train, like a good husband and wife. See, he looks delighted.' She seemed to be talking about some great painter, old but full of bonhomie, who, younger than the young, finds delight in scrawling likenesses to get a laugh from his grandchildren. What added to my unhappiness was that Albertine seemed not to share it but to find it fun to drive all round the countryside like this with the Verdurins. For my own part, the pleasure I had promised myself I was going to take with her was so imperious that I refused to allow the Patronne to spoil it; I invented falsehoods that Mme Verdurin's irritating threats had made excusable, but which Albertine, alas, contradicted. 'But we've a call to make, I said. – What call? asked Albertine. – I'll explain, it's essential. – All right, we shall wait for you,' said Mme Verdurin, resigned to anything. At the last minute, my anguish at feeling a long-desired happiness being snatched away from me lent me the courage to be impolite. I refused point-blank, alleging in Mme Verdurin's ear that, because of some trouble that Albertine had had, about which she wished to consult me, I had absolutely to be alone with her. The Patronne assumed a look of fury: 'Right, we shan't come,' she said to me, in a voice quivering with anger. I sensed that she was so angry that, to seem to be giving way a little: 'But we might have been able to… – No, she went on, more furious still, once I've said no, it's no.' I thought I was in her bad books, but she called us back in the doorway to advise us not to 'let her down' on Wednesday next, and not to come in that contraption, which was dangerous in the dark, but by the train with all the little group, and she got the car to stop when it was already going down the sloping driveway into the gardens because the new servant had forgotten to put into the hood the square of tart and the shortbreads she had had packed up for us. We set off again escorted for a moment by the little houses that had come hurrying up with their flowers. The face of the locality seemed quite altered, so far is the notion of space from playing the major role in the topographical image of each one that we create for ourselves. I have said that the notion of time divides them further. Nor is it alone. Certain scenes that we see always isolated seem to us to lack any common measure with the rest, almost outside the world, like the people whom we have known at special periods in our lives, in the Army, during our childhood, whom we connect with nothing. The year of my first stay in Balbec, there was an eminence to which Mme de Villeparisis liked to take us because from it you could see nothing but the water and the woodland, and which was called Beaumont. As the road she made them take to go there, which she thought the prettiest because of its old trees, was all uphill, her carriage was obliged to go at a walk and took a very long time. The top once reached, we got down, we took a short walk, we got back into the carriage and we returned by the same road, without having encountered a single village or a single house. I knew that Beaumont was something very curious, very distant, very high up, but I had no idea in which direction it lay, never having taken the road for Beaumont to go anywhere else; it took in any case a long time to get there by carriage. It obviously formed part of the same département (or the same province) as Balbec, but for me was situated on a different plane, and enjoyed a special privilege of extraterritoriality. But the motor-car, which is no respecter of mystery, after passing Incarville, whose houses I could still see before me, and as we were descending the cross-gradient which leads to Parville (Paterna villa), catching sight of the sea from the piece of level ground on which we were, I asked what this place was called, and before the chauffeur had even answered, I recognized Beaumont, near to which I had thus passed without realizing every time I took the little railway, for it was two minutes from Parville. Just like an officer in my regiment, who might have struck me as someone special, too kindly and simple to be from a grand family, too remote and mysterious to be simply from a grand family, and who I learned was the brother-in-law or cousin of one or other lot of people where I had been to dinner, so Beaumont, linked all of a sudden to places from which I had thought it quite distinct, lost its mystery and took up its place in the region, leading me to reflect in terror that Mme Bovary and La Sanseverina[9] would perhaps have struck me as creatures like any other had I come across them anywhere except in the enclosed atmosphere of a novel. It might seem as though my love of fantastic journeys by train should have prevented me from sharing Albertine's wonderment at the motor-car, which takes us, even an invalid, where we will, and prevents us – as I had been doing up until now – from regarding their location as the individual sign, the irreplaceable essence of immovable beauties. And doubtless the motor-car did not make of this location, as the railway once had, when I had come from Paris to Balbec, an objective abstracted from the contingencies of normal life, ideal almost when you set off and which, remaining so on your arrival, the arrival in that great house where nobody lives but which simply bears the name of the town and the station, seems finally to promise its accessibility, just as it is its materialization. No, the motor-car did not carry us in this fantastic way into a town that we saw first of all as the whole encapsulated in its name, and with the illusions of a spectator in the theatre. It made us go backstage into the streets, stopping to ask directions of an inhabitant. But as compensation for this very familiar progression, you have the very hesitations of the chauffeur, unsure of his road and turning back, the chassés-croisés of the perspective, causing a château to play hide-and-seek with a hill, a church and the sea, as you approach, huddle in vain though it may beneath its centuries-old foliage; these ever tightening circles that the motor-car describes around a fascinated town that runs off in all directions in order to escape it and on to which it finally swoops down vertically, in the bottom of the valley, where the town lies prostrate; so that the motor-car, having seemed to strip the location, this unique point, of the mystery of the express train, gives us, on the contrary, the impression of discovering it, of ourselves determining it as if with a compass, of helping us to feel, with a more lovingly exploratory hand, with a more delicate precision, its true geometry, the beautiful 'measure of the earth'.

What I did not alas know at that time, and only learned more than two years later, was that one of the chauffeur's customers was M. de Charlus, and that Morel, responsible for paying him and keeping part of the money for himself (by getting the chauffeur to triple or quintuple the number of kilometres), had struck up a close friendship with him (while making out he did not know him in front of company) and used his vehicle for distant errands. Had I known this at the time, and that the confidence which the Verdurins soon felt in this chauffeur had derived, unbeknownst to them, therefrom, perhaps many of the sorrows of my life in Paris, the following year, many of my misfortunes relative to Albertine, might have been avoided; but I had not the least suspicion of it. In themselves, the drives that M. de Charlus took in the car with Morel were of no direct interest to me. They were in any case confined most often to lunch or dinner in a restaurant along the coast, where M. de Charlus passed for a penniless old domestic and Morel, whose business it was to settle the bill, for an over-generous member of the gentry. I shall recount one of these dinners, which may give an idea of the others. It was in an oblong-shaped restaurant in Saint-Mars-le-Vêtu. 'Couldn't they remove this?' M. de Charlus asked Morel, as if to an intermediary, so as not to address the waiters directly. By 'this' he denoted three wilted roses with which a well-intentioned maître d'hôtel had thought fit to decorate the table. 'Yes…, said Morel, embarrassed. You don't like roses? – I am proving on the contrary by the request in question that I do like them, since there are no roses here (Morel seemed surprised), though in point of fact I do not like them a lot. I am somewhat sensitive to names; and as soon as a rose is at all beautiful, one finds out that it is called the Baronne de Rothschild or the Maréchale Niel,[10] which puts one right off. Do you like names? Have you found some pretty titles for your little concert pieces? – One of them's called Poème triste. – That's ghastly, snapped M. de Charlus in a high-pitched voice that was like a slap in the face. Did I not ask for champagne?' he said to the maître d'hôtel, who supposed that he had brought some, setting two glasses filled with sparkling wine down beside the two customers. 'But Monsieur… – Remove this filth, which bears no relation to even the worst champagne. It's the vomitive known as "cup" where they generally trail three rotting strawberries in a mixture of vinegar and seltzer water… Yes, he went on, turning back to Morel, you appear not to know what a title is. And even in the interpretation of what you play best, you seem not to notice the mediumistic aspects of the thing. – You're saying?' asked Morel who, having understood not the first thing in what the Baron had said, was afraid of being deprived of some useful piece of information, such as, for example, an invitation to lunch. M. de Charlus having omitted to take 'You're saying?' as a question, Morel, in consequence, having received no response, thought he should change the conversation and turn it in a sensual direction: 'I say, the little blonde who's selling the flowers you don't like; another one who's bound to have a young friend. And the old woman eating at the table down the end, too. – But how do you know all this?' asked M. de Charlus, amazed by Morel's prescience. 'Oh, I can see through them in an instant. If the two of us were walking in a crowd, you'd see I'm never wrong twice.' And whoever had been observing Morel at that moment, with his girlish look in the midst of his masculine beauty, would have understood the obscure divination which marked him out to certain women no less than them to him. He was keen to supplant Jupien, vaguely desirous of adding to his 'salary' the income that, so he believed, the waistcoat-maker was extracting from the Baron. 'And I'm even more expert where gigolos are concerned, I'd avoid you making any mistakes. It'll soon be the Balbec fair, we'd find lots of things. And then in Paris! You'd have fun, you'll see.' But the hereditary wariness of a servant led him to give the sentence on which he had already begun a different twist. With the result that M. de Charlus thought it still had to do with girls. 'You know, said Morel, anxious to excite the Baron's senses in a manner that he adjudged to be less compromising for himself (although it was in point of fact more immoral), my dream would be to find a perfectly innocent young girl, make her fall in love with me and take her virginity.' M. de Charlus could not refrain from tenderly pinching Morel's ear, but added artlessly: 'What good would that do you? If you took her maidenhead, you'd certainly be obliged to marry her. – Marry her?' exclaimed Morel, who felt the Baron must be drunk, or else was oblivious of the man, more scrupulous all things considered than he imagined, to whom he was speaking. 'Marry her? Rubbish! I'd promise, but the minute the little operation had been brought to fruition, I'd ditch her the same evening.' M. de Charlus was in the habit, when a fiction was able to produce in him a moment's sensual pleasure, of giving it his approval, while being prepared to withdraw this altogether a few moments later, once the pleasure had worn off. 'Really, you'd do that?' he said to Morel, laughing and holding him all the tighter. 'Would I not!' said Morel, seeing that he was not displeasing the Baron by continuing genuinely to explain what was indeed one of his desires. 'It's dangerous, said M. de Charlus. – I'd pack my bags in advance and clear off without leaving an address. – And what about me? asked M. de Charlus. I'd take you with me, of course,' Morel hastened to say, who had not thought about what might become of the Baron, who was the least of his concerns. 'Listen, there's a little one who'd appeal to me greatly, as far as that goes, a young seamstress who has her shop in M. le Duc's house. – Jupien's daughter![11] exclaimed the Baron, as the sommelier entered. Oh, never!' he added, whether because the presence of a third party had cast a chill, or because, even in these sorts of black Mass during which he took pleasure in defiling the most sacred things, he could not bring himself to involve people for whom he felt friendship. 'Jupien's a good fellow, the little one is charming, it would be dreadful to cause them any unhappiness.' Morel sensed that he had gone too far and fell silent, but his gaze continued to fix itself, in the void, on the girl in front of whom one day he had wanted me to address him as 'cher grand artiste', and from whom he had ordered a waistcoat. The young girl was very hard-working and had not taken any holiday, but I have learned since that, while the violinist was in the neighbourhood of Balbec, she could not leave off thinking of his handsome face, ennobled by the fact that, having seen Morel with me, she had taken him for a 'gentleman'.

'I never heard Chopin play, said the Baron, yet I could have done, I took lessons with Stamati,[12] but he forbade me from going to hear the master of the Nocturnes at my aunt Chimay's. – What a silly thing to do! exclaimed Morel. – On the contrary, replied M. de Charlus sharply, in a shrill voice. It was proof of his intelligence. He'd realized I was a "natural" and that I'd come under Chopin's influence. It doesn't matter because I gave up music when I was quite young, like everything else for that matter. Besides, one can use one's imagination, he added, in a protracted nasal drawl, there are always people who did hear, who can give you an idea. But anyway, Chopin was only a pretext for getting back to the mediumistic aspect that you're neglecting.'

It will be observed that, after an interpolation in the vulgar tongue, that of M. de Charlus had abruptly become once more as precious and haughty as usual. The fact was that the idea that Morel would have no compunction in 'ditching' a girl he had violated had suddenly caused him to experience total pleasure. From that moment on, his senses were appeased for a time and the sadist (who truly was mediumistic) who had momentarily taken the place of M. de Charlus had fled and handed the floor back to the real M. de Charlus, full of artistic refinement, sensitivity and kindness. 'The other day you played the transcription for piano of Quartet No. 15, which is absurd in itself because nothing could be less pianistic. It's meant for people who get earache from the glorious Deaf One's over-taut strings. Yet it's that same almost sour mysticism which is divine. At all events, you played it very badly, altering all the tempi. You need to play it as if you were composing it: the young Morel, afflicted with a temporary deafness and a non-existent genius, remains motionless for an instant; then, seized by the sacred frenzy, he plays, he composes the opening bars; then, exhausted by this attempt to cast a spell, he collapses, letting his pretty lock of hair fall to please Mme Verdurin, and takes the time, in addition, to re-create the prodigious quantity of grey matter that he called upon for the Pythic objectification; then, having recovered his strength, and seized by a fresh, supereminent inspiration, he springs towards the sublime, inexhaustible phrase that the Berlin virtuoso (we believe M. de Charlus was here referring to Mendelssohn) was unwearyingly to imitate. It's in this, the one truly transcendent and enlivening manner, that I shall make you play in Paris.' When M. de Charlus gave him advice of this nature, Morel was much more alarmed than on seeing the maître d'hôtel remove his spurned roses and 'cup', for he asked himself anxiously what effect this might have on the 'class'. But he could not dwell on these reflections for M. de Charlus was saying to him imperiously: 'Ask the maître d'hôtel if he's got any bons Chrétiens. – Bons Chrétiens? I don't understand.' – As you can see, we've got to the fruit, it's a pear. You can be sure Mme de Cambremer'll have some at her house, because the Comtesse d'Escarbagnas, which she is, used to have them. M. Thibaudier sends them to her and she says: "Here's a really beautiful bon Chrétien."[13] – No, I didn't know. – I can see for that matter that you don't know anything. If you haven't even read Molière… Oh well, since you can't know how to order any more than the rest, quite simply ask for a pear that's in fact picked near here, the Louise-bonne d'Avranches. – The…? – Wait, since you're so awkward, I'll ask myself for others which I prefer: Maître d'hôtel, do you have any doyenné des comices? Charlie, you must read the ravishing passage written about that pear by the Duchesse Emilie de Clermont-Tonnerre. – No, Monsieur, I don't have any. – Do you have any triomphe de Jodoignes? – No, Monsieur. – Any Virginie-dallet? Any passe-Colmar? No? Oh well, since you don't have anything we shall leave. The Duchesse d'Angoulêmes aren't yet ripe; come, Charlie, we're going.' Unfortunately for M. de Charlus, his lack of common sense, and perhaps the chasteness of the relationship he probably enjoyed with Morel, made him rack his brains from that time on to overwhelm the violinist with strange acts of kindness that the latter could not understand and to which his nature, wild in its way, yet also mean and ungrateful, could respond only with an ever-increasing indifference or violence, which plunged M. de Charlus – once so proud, now quite timid – into fits of genuine despair. We shall see how, in the smallest things, Morel, who saw himself as having become an infinitely more important M. de Charlus, had understood amiss, by taking them literally, the Baron's arrogant teachings concerning the aristocracy. For the present let me simply say, while Albertine is waiting for me in Saint-Jean-de-la-Haise, that if there was one thing that Morel set above the nobility (and this was, as a principle, noble enough, especially in someone whose pleasure it was to go in search of young girls – 'without anyone being any the wiser' – with the chauffeur), it was his artistic reputation and what his violin class might think. It was ugly no doubt that, because he felt M. de Charlus belonged exclusively to him, he should have appeared to disown him, to make fun of him, just as, the moment I had promised to keep the secret of his father's duties at my great-uncle's, he treated me with lordly disdain. On the other hand, his name as an artist graduated from the Conservatoire, Morel, seemed to him superior to a 'name'. And when M. de Charlus, in his dreams of Platonic affection, tried to make him accept a title from his own family, Morel energetically refused.

When Albertine found it more sensible to stay in Saint-Jean-de-la-Haise to paint, I would take the car, and it was not just to Gourville and Féterne, but to Saint-Mars-le-Vieux and as far as Criquetot, that I was able to go before returning to collect her. While pretending to have other things than her on my mind, and to be obliged to desert her for other pleasures, I thought only about her. Very often, I went no further than the broad plain that overlooks Gourville, and since it a little resembles that which begins above Combray, in the direction of Méséglise, even when quite some distance from Albertine, I had the joy of reflecting that, though my gaze might not be able to go all the way to her, the powerful but mild sea breeze that was passing beside me would outreach it, would go hurrying down, with nothing that might arrest it, all the way to Quetteholme, and come to stir the branches of the trees that bury Saint-Jean-de-la-Haise beneath their foliage, caressing the face of my loved one, and thus throw up a double link between her and me in this indefinitely enlarged, yet safe, retreat, like in those games when two children find themselves momentarily out of sight and earshot of one another, yet, though separated, remain joined. I returned by the roads from which you can see the sea, and where once, before it appeared between the branches, I used to close my eyes to reflect that what I was about to see was indeed the plaintive ancestress of the earth, pursuing, as in the days when no human beings as yet existed, its crazed, immemorial agitation. Now, they were nothing more for me than the means of going to rejoin Albertine; when I recognized them, quite unchanged, knowing how far they would run straight ahead, and where they would bend, I remembered that I had followed them thinking of Mlle de Stermaria, and that I had been in just the same hurry to find Albertine again in Paris, when going down the streets along which Mme de Guermantes had passed; they had taken on for me the profound monotony and the moral significance of a sort of line that my character was following. It was natural, but not thereby a matter of indifference; they reminded me that my fate was to pursue only phantoms, beings whose reality lay in large part in my imagination; there are human beings indeed – and this had been my own case since my early days – for whom whatever has a fixed value, recognizable by others, fortune, success, a high position, counts for nothing; what they must have is phantoms. To this they sacrifice all the rest, use every possible means, bend all their efforts, to encounter some phantom. But the latter is not long in vanishing; then they pursue some other phantom, while being ready to return later to the first one. This was not the first time that I had gone in search of Albertine, the girl glimpsed that first year in front of the sea. Other women, it was true, had been interposed between the Albertine loved on that first occasion and the one whom at present I hardly ever left; other women, notably the Duchesse de Guermantes. But, people will say, why agonize so over Gilberte, or go to so much trouble over Mme de Guermantes, if, having become the latter's friend, it was solely in order not to think about her any more, but only about Albertine? Swann, before his death, might have known the answer, he who had been a connoisseur of phantoms. These Balbec roads were full of them, of phantoms pursued, forgotten, sought after afresh, sometimes for a single interview and so as to touch an unreal life that had at once made its escape. Reflecting that their trees, pears, apples and tamarisks would outlive me, I seemed to be receiving from them the advice finally to set to work while the hour of eternal rest had yet to sound.

I got out of the car in Quetteholme, ran down the steep sunken lane, crossed the stream by a plank and found Albertine painting in front of the church, which was all turrets, thorny and red, in blossom like a rose-bush. The tympanum alone was smooth; and on the smiling surface of the stone there appeared angels, who continued, before our twentieth-century couple, to celebrate, taper in hand, the ceremonies of the thirteenth. They it was whose portrait Albertine was attempting to paint on her prepared canvas and, in imitation of Elstir, she was making long strokes with the brush, attempting to obey the noble rhythm which, the great master had told her, made these angels so different from all those that he knew. Then she gathered up her things. Leaning one against the other, we re-ascended the sunken lane, leaving the little church as quiet as if it had not seen us, to listen to the constant sound of the stream. Soon the car was speeding along, making us take a different road back from the one coming. We passed in front of Marcouville-l'Orgueilleuse. Over its church, half new, half restored, the declining sun had spread a patina as lovely as that of the centuries. Through it, the great bas-reliefs seemed to be seen only beneath a fluid coating, half liquid, half luminous; the Holy Virgin, Saint Elizabeth, Saint Joachim, were still swimming in the impalpable eddies, almost in the dry, on the surface of the water or the sunlight. Looming suddenly into view in a warm dust, the numerous modern statues rose on their columns, half-way up the golden veils of the sunset. In front of the church, a tall cypress seemed to be in a sort of consecrated enclosure. We got out for a moment to look at it, and took a few steps. As much as of her limbs, Albertine was directly conscious of her Italian straw toque and her silk scarf (which for her were no lesser a seat of feelings of well-being), and received from them, as we walked round the church, another kind of impulsion, betrayed by a contentment that was inert yet which for me had charm; a scarf and toque that were only a recent, adventitious part of my loved one, but which was already dear to me and whose wake I followed with my eyes, along the cypress, in the evening air. She herself could not see it, but suspected that this elegance was having its effect, for she smiled at me, cocking her head in harmony with the headgear that completed it: 'It doesn't appeal to me, it's been restored,' she said, pointing to the church and remembering what Elstir had said to her about the precious, the inimitable beauty of the old stonework. Albertine knew at once how to recognize a restoration. You could not but be astonished at the sureness of taste that she already possessed in architecture, instead of the deplorable taste she had preserved in music. No more than had Elstir did I like this church, it was without affording me any pleasure that its sunlit façade had come and set itself down before my eyes, and I had got out to look at it only as a kindness to Albertine. Yet I found that the great impressionist was in contradiction with himself; why make a fetish of the objective architectural value, without taking any account of the transfiguration of the church in the setting sun? 'No, I definitely don't like it, Albertine said; I like its name of Orgueilleuse. But what we must remember to ask Brichot is why Saint-Mars is called le Vêtu. We'll go next time, won't we?' she said, looking at me out of her black eyes, over which her toque had been pulled down, like her little cap in the old days. Her veil was floating loose. I got back into the car with her, glad that the next day we were to go together to Saint-Mars where, in this torrid weather, when your one thought was of bathing, the two ancient, salmon-pink belfries, with their diamond-shaped tiles, slightly out of true and as if palpitating, looked like old, pointed fish, imbricated with scales, moss-covered and ruddy, which, without appearing to move, were rising in a blue, transparent water. On leaving Marcouville, to take a short cut, we forked off at a crossroads where there is a farm. Sometimes Albertine made us stop there and asked me to go on my own and fetch, so that she could drink it in the car, some calvados or cider, which we were assured was not fizzy yet which sprayed all over us. We sat pressed one against the other. The people from the farm could barely see Albertine in the closed car, and I gave them back the bottles; we left again, as if to carry on with our life, the two of us together, with the lovers' life which they may have supposed we led, in which this pause to drink would have been simply one insignificant moment; a supposition that might have seemed all the less improbable had they seen us after Albertine had drunk her bottle of cider; she then indeed seemed unable any longer to tolerate a gap between herself and me, which normally did not trouble her; under her linen skirt her legs were pressed against my legs, she brought close to mine cheeks that had become pallid, hot, and red over the cheekbones, with something burning and faded about them such as street girls have in the suburbs. At these times, she changed her voice almost as quickly as her personality, lost her own in order to assume another, hoarse, brazen, almost crapulous. Dusk was falling. What a pleasure to feel her against me, with her scarf and her toque, reminding me that it is always thus, side by side, that we encounter those who love one another! I perhaps felt love for Albertine, but did not dare to let her see it, so that if it existed in me, it could only be as a truth without value until it had been able to be verified by experience; but it seemed to me unrealizable, and outside the plane of life. As for my jealousy, it led me to leave Albertine as seldom as possible, although I knew that it would be cured altogether only by parting from her for ever. I was even capable of feeling it in her presence, but then contrived not to allow the circumstances to recur which had excited it. Thus it was that, on a day of fine weather, we went to have lunch in Rivebelle. The big glass doors of the dining-room, and of the corridor-shaped hall which was used for teas, had been opened, level with the lawns, turned to gold by the sun, of which the huge luminous restaurant seemed to form part. The waiter with the pink face and the black hair twisted like a flame, dashed about in this vast expanse less rapidly than before, for he was no longer a commis but a chef de rang; nevertheless, because of his natural industry, now in the distance, in the dining-room, and now closer to, but outside, serving customers who had preferred to eat in the garden, you saw him first in one place then in another, like the successive statues of a young god running, some in the – well-lit – interior of a house that extended into the green lawn, others beneath the foliage, in the bright light of life in the open air. Momentarily, he was at our side. Albertine replied distractedly to what I had been saying. She was gazing at him through widened eyes. For a minute or two, I felt that you could be close to the person that you love yet not have them with you. They appeared to be involved in a mysterious tête-à-tête, rendered wordless by my presence, and the continuation perhaps of former assignations of which I knew nothing, or simply of a look that he had given her – where I was the intrusive third party from whom one hides. Even when, after a violent summons from his superior, he had gone off, Albertine, while continuing to eat her lunch, appeared to regard the restaurant and gardens as nothing more than an illuminated running-track, on which there appeared here and there, against various backgrounds, the running god with the black hair. For a moment I wondered whether, in order to follow him, she might not be going to leave me on my own at the table. But from the days that followed I began to forget this painful impression once and for all, because I had decided never to return to Rivebelle, and had made Albertine promise, who assured me that this was the first time she had been there, that she would never go back. And I denied that the waiter with the nimble feet had had eyes only for her, so that she might not believe that my company had deprived her of a pleasure. It so happened that I did, on occasions, go back to Rivebelle, but alone, and drank too much, as I had done there before. As I drained a last glass, I looked at a rosette painted on the white wall, and transferred on to it the pleasure that I felt. It alone in the world existed for me; I pursued it, touched it and lost it by turns with my shifting gaze, and I was indifferent to the future, content with my rosette, like a butterfly that circles about a butterfly that has settled, with which it is about to end its life in an act of supreme voluptuousness. But I thought it dangerous to allow there to take up residence in me, in however mild a form, a sickness which resembles those habitual pathological states to which we pay no heed, but which, should the least accident, unforeseeable but inevitable, befall it, suffice at once to lend it an extreme gravity. The moment was particularly well chosen perhaps to renounce a woman whom no very recent or very acute suffering obliged me to ask for that balm against a sickness which those who have caused it possess. I was calmed by these same excursions, which, although I looked on them at the time simply as an anticipation of a tomorrow which itself, in spite of the longing with which it filled me, would be no different from the day before, had the attraction of having been wrenched away from the places where Albertine had been up until now but where I had not been with her, at her aunt's, or at her girl-friends'. The attraction not of a positive joy, but simply of the allaying of an anxiety, yet very powerful even so. For within the space of a few days, when I thought back to the farm in front of which we had drunk our cider, or simply to the few steps we had taken in front of Saint-Mars-le-Vêtu, remembering that Albertine had walked beside me under her toque, the sense of her presence added such healing properties all of a sudden to the indifferent image of the new church, that at the moment when the sunlit façade came thus and set itself down of its own accord in my memory, it was like a great soothing compress that had been applied to my heart. I set Albertine down in Parville, but only so as to meet her again in the evening and go and stretch out beside her, in the darkness, on the shore. I did not see her every day, it is true, yet I was able to tell myself: 'Were she to recount the time-table of her life, it's I still who would have pride of place'; and we passed long hours on end together, which introduced so sweet an intoxication into my days that even when, in Parville, she jumped down from the car that I would be sending back for her in an hour's time, I no more felt alone in the car than if, before getting out, she had left flowers behind. I could have gone without seeing her every day; I would be happy when I left her, I sensed that the calming effect of this happiness might endure for several days. But then I would hear Albertine, as she left me, saying to her aunt or to a girl-friend: 'Tomorrow at eight-thirty, then. We mustn't be late, they'll be ready from a quarter past eight.' The conversation of a woman that you love is like the earth covering a dangerous, subterranean lake; you are constantly aware of the presence, behind the words, of the penetrating cold of an invisible sheet of water; here and there it is to be seen oozing perfidiously out, but the lake itself remains hidden. As soon as I heard Albertine's words, my calm was destroyed. I wanted to ask to see her the next morning, so as to prevent her going to this mysterious rendez-vous at half past eight, which had been referred to in my presence only in veiled terms. She would no doubt have obeyed me the first times, while regretting having to give up her plans; then she would have discovered my permanent need to disrupt them; I would be the one from whom everything must be kept. It is of course likely that these entertainments from which I was excluded amounted to very little, and that it was perhaps out of a fear that I might find one or other female guest vulgar or tedious that I was not invited. Unfortunately, this life, so closely involved with that of Albertine, did not have its effect only on myself; to me it brought peace of mind; in my mother it caused anxieties the confession of which destroyed that peace of mind. As I returned home contented, determined to bring to an end from one day to the next an existence whose termination I believed depended on my own volition alone, my mother said to me, hearing me send to the chauffeur to go and fetch Albertine after dinner: 'All the money you're spending! (Françoise, in her simple and expressive language, put it more forcefully: "Money burns a hole in your pocket.") Try, Mama went on, not to become like Charles de Sévigné, whose mother used to say, "His hand is a crucible in which money melts." Besides, I do think you've been out enough with Albertine. I assure you you're overdoing it, that even she may find it ridiculous. I've been delighted that it takes your mind off things, I'm not asking you not to see her again, but just so that's it's not impossible to meet one of you without the other.' My life with Albertine, a life devoid of great pleasures – as perceived by me at least – this life that I was counting on changing from one day to the next, by choosing a moment of calm, suddenly became necessary to me once again for a time, when it found itself under threat from Mama's words. I told my mother that her words had just put back by two months perhaps the decision that they were demanding, which, but for them, would have been taken by the end of the week. Mama began to laugh (so as not to make me unhappy) at the effect that her advice had instantly produced, and promised not to mention it again so as not to prevent my good intentions from being revived. But since my grandmother's death, every time that Mama allowed herself to laugh, the laughter was cut short almost before it began, and ended on an almost sobbing expression of suffering, either out of remorse at having been able for a moment to forget, or else out of the recrudescence whereby this short-lived forgetfulness had again revived her cruel preoccupation. But to that caused by the memory of my grandmother, lodged in my mother like an idée fixe, I sensed that this time another preoccupation had been added, having to do with myself, and with the fact that my mother dreaded the consequences of my intimacy with Albertine; an intimacy she did not dare stand in the way of, however, on account of what I had just told her. But she did not seem convinced that I was not deceiving myself. She could remember all those years during which she and my grandmother had no longer raised the question of my work or of a healthy form of life, on which, I used to say, only the agitation into which their exhortations cast me was preventing me from starting, but which, despite their obedient silence, I had not pursued.

After dinner the car brought Albertine back; there was still a little daylight left; the air was less hot, but after a burning-hot day we were both dreaming of unknown forms of coolness; then, to our fevered eyes the moon appeared, all narrow at first (as on the evening when I had gone to the Princesse de Guermantes's and when Albertine had telephoned me), like the thin, fragile rind, then like the fresh quarter of a fruit that an invisible knife had begun to peel in the sky. On occasions, it was I who went to fetch my loved one, a little later in that case; she was to wait for me in front of the market arcade in Maineville. To start with, I could not make her out; I was already worried that she might not be coming, that she had misunderstood. Then I would find her, in her white blouse with the blue polka dots, jumping into the car beside me with the light spring more of a young animal than of a girl. And it was like a dog, again, that she at once began endlessly to fondle me. Once the darkness was complete and, as the manager of the hotel used to say, the sky was all skittered with stars, if we did not go for a drive in the forest with a bottle of champagne, unconcerned by the strollers still sauntering along the dimly lit esplanade, who would not have been able to see a thing two paces away on the black sand, we would stretch out below the dunes; and that same body, in whose suppleness there lived all the feminine, marine and sportive grace of the girls I had seen that first time passing across the horizon of the waves, I now held it pressed tightly against my own, under the same rug, on the very edge of the motionless sea, divided by a trembling shaft of moonlight; and we listened to it without wearying and with the same pleasure, whether as it held its breath, long enough suspended for you to suppose its reflux had been halted, or as, finally, it exhaled the anticipated but delayed murmur at our feet. In the end I would take Albertine back to Parville. Having arrived in front of the house, we had to interrupt our kisses for fear of being seen; having no desire to go to bed, she would come back with me as far as Balbec, from where I took her back for a last time to Parville; in those early days of the motor-car, chauffeurs were men who went to bed at all hours. In fact, I got home to Balbec only with the first dampness of early morning, alone this time, but still surrounded by the presence of my loved one, gorged with a supply of kisses that I would be long in exhausting. On my table I would find a telegram or a postcard. It was from Albertine again! She had written them at Quetteholme while I was off on my own in the car, to tell me that she was thinking of me. I reread them as I got into bed. Then, above the curtains, I would see the band of broad daylight and tell myself that we must be in love after all, to have spent the night kissing one another. When, the next morning, I saw Albertine on the esplanade, I was so afraid that she would answer that she was not free that day and could not agree to my request that we go out together that I delayed for as long as I could before making it. I was the more concerned in that she appeared distant and preoccupied; people of her acquaintance were passing; no doubt she had made plans for that afternoon from which I was excluded. I looked at her, I looked at that entrancing body, at those pink features of Albertine's, raising the enigma of their intentions in front of me, the unknown decision on which turned the happiness or unhappiness of my afternoon. It was a whole state of being, a whole future existence, which had assumed in front of me the fateful, allegorical form of a girl. And when at last I had come to a decision, when, with as indifferent an air as I could, I asked: 'Shall we go off together this afternoon and this evening?' and she replied: 'I'd love to', then the whole sudden replacement, in that pink face, of my prolonged anxiety by a delectable quietude, made more precious to me still those contours to which I was perpetually indebted for my well-being, the assuagement we feel after a storm has broken. I repeated to myself: 'She's so sweet, what an adorable creature!' in an exaltation less fertile than that owed to intoxication, hardly any more profound than that of friendship, but much superior to that of life in society. We cancelled the car only on the days when there was a dinner party at the Verdurins', and on those when, Albertine not being free to go out with me, I took the opportunity to let the people who wished to visit me know that I would be remaining in Balbec. I authorized Saint-Loup to come on these days, but on these days alone. For once when he had arrived without warning, I had preferred to forgo seeing Albertine rather than risk his meeting her, jeopardizing the state of contented calm in which I had been for some time now, and reviving my jealousy. I felt easy in my mind only once Saint-Loup had left again. He therefore bound himself, regretfully but scrupulously, never to come to Balbec without a summons from me. In the old days, reflecting enviously on the hours that Mme de Guermantes spent with him, I had set such great store by seeing him! People never cease to change position in relation to ourselves. In the world's imperceptible but everlasting march, we think of them as motionless, in a moment of vision, too brief for us to perceive the motion that is bearing them along. But we need only choose from our memory two pictures of them taken at different times, yet sufficiently close together for them not to have changed in themselves, perceptibly at least, and the difference between the two pictures measures the displacement they have effected relative to ourselves. He worried me dreadfully by talking about the Verdurins, I was afraid he might ask me to have him received there, which would have been enough, because of the jealousy I would not have ceased to feel, to mar all the pleasure that I enjoyed there with Albertine. But happily, Robert admitted that, quite to the contrary, he wished above all not to meet them. 'No, he said, I find that type of clerical circle exasperating.' I did not at first understand the adjective 'clerical' as applied to the Verdurins, but Saint-Loup's concluding words enlightened me as to his thought, and to the concessions to linguistic fashion that one is often surprised to find adopted by intelligent men. 'They're circles, he said, where they play at being tribes, where they play at being congregations and chapels. You're not going to tell me it isn't a small sect; they're all sweetness and light to the people who belong, and couldn't be more contemptuous of the ones who don't. The question isn't, like for Hamlet, to be or not to be, but to be one of them or not to be one of them. 'You're one, my uncle Charlus is one. What d'you expect? I've never liked all that, it's not my fault.'

Naturally, I enacted the rule I had imposed on Saint-Loup, not to come and visit me except when summoned, equally strictly in the case of the people, whoever they were, with whom I had gradually become friendly in La Raspelière, Féterne, Montsurvent and elsewhere; and when from the hotel I saw the smoke of the three o'clock train, whose plume long remained stationary, clinging to the sides of the green slopes in the anfractuosities of the Parville cliffs, I felt no hesitation concerning the visitor who was coming to have tea with me but was as yet, in the manner of a god, concealed beneath that little cloud. I am obliged to confess that this visitor, previously authorized by me to come, was almost never Saniette, and I have often reproached myself for this. But Saniette's consciousness of being a bore (even more so when paying a visit, naturally, than when recounting a story) meant that although he was better educated, more intelligent and better than many others, it seemed impossible to experience in his company, not only any pleasure, but anything except an almost intolerable lowness of spirits which spoiled your afternoon. Probably, if Saniette had confessed openly to the boredom he was afraid of causing, you would not have dreaded his visits. Boredom is one of the less serious evils which we have to endure, and his existed perhaps only in the imagination of others, or had been inoculated in him thanks to a kind of suggestion through them, which had found a purchase on his likeable modesty. But so anxious was he not to let it be seen that he was not sought after, that he did not dare offer himself. Admittedly, he was right not to behave as the people do who are so glad to take off their hats to you in a public place that, not having seen you in a long while but catching sight of you in a box together with a brilliant set whom they do not know, they cast you a furtive but resounding good evening, while apologizing for the pleasure, for the emotion, they felt on seeing you, on discovering that you were returning to old pleasures, that you were looking so well, and so forth. Saniette, on the contrary, was far too lacking in boldness. He could, at the Verdurins' or in the little tram, have told me that he would have great pleasure in coming to call on me in Balbec were he not afraid of putting me out. Such a proposal would not have alarmed me. On the contrary, he offered nothing, but with a tortured face and a gaze as indestructible as a fired enamel, but into the composition of which there entered, together with a breathless desire to see you – unless he found someone more amusing – the determination not to let that desire show, he said to me with a detached air: 'You don't know what you're doing these days? Because I'll no doubt be coming near Balbec. But no, it's of no account, I was only asking you on the off chance.' There was no mistaking his expression, and the inverse signs with the help of which we express our feelings by their opposite are so transparent that you wonder how there can still be people who say, for example: 'I've had so many invitations I don't know which way to turn,' to hide the fact that they have not been invited. Moreover, this offhand air, because most likely of what had entered into its turbid composition, produced in you what the fear of boredom or a frank admission of the desire to call on you could never have produced, namely that sort of unease, or repulsion, which, in the order of relations of simple social politeness, is the equivalent of the disguised offer made to a lady during a love affair by the lover whom she does not love, to see her the following day, while protesting that he does not insist, or not even this offer, but an attitude of false indifference. There at once emanated from Saniette's person some je ne sais quoi which meant that you answered him wearing the most affectionate of expressions: 'No, unfortunately, this week, I'll explain…' And I allowed there to come instead people who were by no means his equal but who did not have his melancholy-filled eyes, nor a mouth puckered by all the bitterness of all the visits that he longed, while not saying a word, to pay to one person or another. Unfortunately, only rarely did Saniette fail to meet on the 'slowcoach' the guest who had just been to see me, even supposing that the latter had not said to me, at the Verdurins': 'Don't forget I'll be coming to see you on Thursday,' the selfsame day when I had told Saniette I would not be free. So that he ended up by imagining life as being filled with amusements arranged without him knowing, if not actually against him. On the other hand, since we are never all of a piece, this too discreet man was morbidly indiscreet. The one time when he chanced to call on me in my despite, a letter, from I forget who, was lying on the table. After a moment, I saw that he was listening with only half an ear to what I was telling him. The letter, of whose provenance he was wholly ignorant, had fascinated him and I thought that at any moment his enamelled eyes were going to detach themselves from their sockets and join the letter, without importance yet which his curiosity had magnetized. He was like a bird that is about to hurl itself fatally at a snake. Finally, he could no longer restrain himself, and first of all changed its position as if he were tidying up my room. This being no longer enough for him, he picked it up, turned it over, turned it back again, as if mechanically. Another form of tactlessness was that, once riveted to you, he could not leave. As I was unwell on the day in question, I asked him to catch the next train and leave in half an hour. He did not doubt I was unwell, but replied: 'I'll stay for an hour and a quarter and after that I'll go.' Since then, I have suffered for not having told him, whenever I could have done, to come. Who knows? Perhaps I would have exorcized his ill-fate, others might have invited him for whom he would at once have given me up, so that my invitations would have had the twofold advantage of restoring his happiness and ridding myself of him.

On the days that followed those on which I entertained, I was naturally not expecting any visits and the car returned to fetch us, Albertine and me. And when we got back, Aimé, on the top step of the hotel, could not help watching, through impassioned, inquisitive and greedy eyes, to see what tip I was giving the chauffeur. It was no use my closing my fist around my coin or note, Aimé's gaze would part my fingers. He would look away a moment later for he was discreet, well brought-up and himself content with relatively small perquisites. But the money someone else received aroused an incompressible curiosity in him and made his mouth water. For a few brief instants, he would wear the feverish, attentive expression of a child reading a Jules Verne novel, or of a diner sitting not far away from you in a restaurant who, seeing them carving for you a pheasant to which he cannot or will not treat himself, abandons his serious thoughts for an instant to fix on the poultry eyes made to smile by love and envy.

Thus did these excursions by motor-car follow one another daily. But one time, just as I was going back up in the lift, the liftboy said to me: 'This gentleman came, he left me a message for you.' The liftboy spoke these words in a terribly croaky voice, and coughing and spitting in my face. 'I've got such a bad cold!' he added, as if I were incapable of noticing it for myself. 'The doctor says it's whooping-cough,' and he began again to cough and spit over me. 'Don't tire yourself by talking,' I said with a kindly expression, which was put on. I was afraid of catching whooping-cough, which, with my tendency to breathless attacks, would have been very distressing. But, like a virtuoso refusing to cry off sick, he prided himself on talking and spitting all the while. 'No, it doesn't matter, he said (to you perhaps, I thought, but not to me). Anyway, I'll soon be going back to Paris (so much the better, provided he does not give it to me first). It seems, he went on, that Paris is very magnificent. It must be even more magnificent than here and than Monte-Carlo, although chasseurs, guests even, and all the way up to maîtres d'hôtel who used to go to Monte-Carlo for the season, have often told me that Paris was less magnificent than Monte-Carlo. They got it wrong maybe, though to become a maître d'hôtel, you mustn't be an imbecile; you need brains in your head to take all the orders and reserve the tables! I've been told it's even more terrifying than writing plays and books.' We had almost reached my floor when the 'lift' made me go all the way down again because he had found the button was not working properly, and in a trice he had fixed it. I told him I preferred to go back up on foot, the hidden meaning of which was that I preferred not to catch whooping-cough. But with a cordial and contagious fit of coughing, the liftboy thrust me back into the lift. 'There's no longer any risk, I've fixed the button.' Seeing that he had not left off talking and preferring to know the name of my visitor and the message he had left to the parallels between the beauties of Balbec, Paris and Monte-Carlo, I said to him (as to a tenor who is overtaxing you with Benjamin Godard:[14] Sing me some Debussy rather): 'But who was it who came to see me? – It was the gentleman you went out with yesterday. I'll go and fetch his card, it's with the porter.' Since the day before I had dropped Saint-Loup off at the station in Doncières before going to fetch Albertine, I thought the 'lift' meant Saint-Loup, but it was the chauffeur. And by referring to him as 'the gentleman you went out with', he had taught me at the same time that a workman is just as much a gentleman as is a society man. A verbal lesson simply. Because, as for the thing itself, I had never made any distinction between the classes. And if, on hearing a chauffeur referred to as a gentleman, I had felt the same astonishment as the Comte X, who had been that only for the past week and whom, by saying 'the Comtesse looks tired,' I had caused to look behind him to see whom I was talking about, this was simply because I was unused to the vocabulary; I had never discriminated between workmen, bourgeois and great noblemen, but would have accepted all of them as friends without distinction, with a certain preference for workmen, and after them the noblemen, not from taste, but knowing that you can demand greater courtesy from them towards workmen than you can obtain from the bourgeoisie, either because great noblemen do not despise workmen, as the bourgeoisie does, or else because they are ready to be courteous to anyone at all, like pretty women, happy to bestow a smile they know will be received with so much delight. I cannot say on the other hand that this way that I had of putting the common people on an equal footing with members of society, although the latter were very happy to accept it, always gave my mother entire satisfaction. Not that, humanly speaking, she made any distinction at all between people, and if ever Françoise was upset or unwell, she was always comforted and tended by Mama with the same affection and the same devotion as her best friend. But my mother was too much my grandfather's daughter not, socially speaking, to be a respecter of caste. For all that the people of Combray showed themselves kind-hearted and sensitive, and had taken on the noblest theories of human equality, my mother, when a valet de chambre got above himself, used vous one time and slipped imperceptibly into no longer addressing me in the third person, showed the same displeasure at these usurpations as bursts out in Saint-Simon's Memoirs each time a nobleman who has no right to it seizes on a pretext to assume the title of 'Highness' in some legal instrument, or not to show a proper deference to dukes, with which he gradually dispenses. There was a 'Combray spirit', so refractory that it will take centuries of kindness (my mother's was boundless), and of egalitarian theories, to succeed in dissolving it. I cannot say that, in my mother's case, certain particles of this spirit had not remained insoluble. She would have found it as hard to offer her hand to a manservant as it was easy to give him ten francs (which anyway afforded him far greater pleasure). For her, whether she admitted it or not, masters were masters and servants the people who ate in the kitchen. When she saw a chauffeur eating with me in the dining-room, she was not altogether pleased and used to say to me: 'It seems to me you could do better where friends are concerned than a mechanic,' as she might have said, were it a question of marrying: 'You could find a better match.' The chauffeur (luckily, I had never thought of inviting this one) had come to tell me that the car company that had sent him to Balbec for the season was recalling him to Paris as from tomorrow. This excuse, all the more so because the chauffeur was charming and expressed himself so simply that you would always have said it was the Gospel truth, seemed to us to have to conform to the truth. It only half did so. There was indeed nothing to do any more in Balbec. And in any case, the company only half trusting in the veracity of the young evangelist, bent over his wheel of consecration, wished for him to return to Paris as soon as possible. And indeed, if the young apostle had achieved a miraculous multiplication of the kilometres when reckoning them up for M. de Charlus, in return, once it was a question of accounting to his company, he divided what he had earned by six. As a consequence of which, the company, believing, either that no one was any longer taking excursions in Balbec, which the season made seem plausible, or that it was being robbed, considered that on either one of these hypotheses the best thing was to summon him back to Paris, where, as it happens, there was also little activity. The desire of the chauffeur was to avoid, if possible, the off season. I have said – what I did not then know and knowledge of which would have spared me much unhappiness – that he was very friendly (without their ever seeming to be acquainted in front of other people) with Morel. As from the day on which he was recalled, without our yet knowing he had a means of not leaving, we had to make do for our excursions with hiring a carriage or sometimes, in order to amuse Albertine and since she liked riding, saddle-horses. The carriages were bad. 'What an old rattletrap!' Albertine would say. I would anyway often have liked to be in them on my own. Without being willing to fix a date, I wanted this life to end which I reproached with making me renounce, not so much work as pleasure. However, it could also happen that the habits which were holding me back were suddenly abolished, most often when some former self, full of the desire to live with cheerfulness, replaced my present self momentarily. I experienced this longing for escape most notably one day when, having left Albertine at her aunt's, I rode over on horseback to call on the Verdurins and when I had taken an unmarked route through the woods whose beauty they had extolled to me. Hugging the contours of the cliffs, by turns it climbed and then, hemmed in between dense clumps of trees, sank deep into wild gorges. For a moment, the bare rocks by which I was surrounded, and the sea, which could be glimpsed through the jagged gaps, floated before my eyes like fragments from some other universe: I had recognized the landscape of mountains and sea that Elstir has used as the setting for those two admirable water-colours, 'Poet meeting with a Muse' and 'Young Man meeting with a Centaur', which I had seen at the Duchesse de Guermantes's. The memory of them relocated the place in which I found myself so far outside the present-day world that I would not have been surprised if, like the young man of ante-historic times painted by Elstir, I had in the course of my ride come upon some mythological personage. All of a sudden my horse reared; he had heard a strange noise, I had difficulty in controlling him and not being thrown to the ground, then I raised my tear-filled eyes to the spot from where the noise appeared to be coming, and I saw, fifty metres or so above me, in the sunlight, between two great wings of glittering steel that were bearing him away, a being whose indistinct face I fancied resembled that of a man. I was moved as might a Greek have been setting eyes for the first time on a demigod. I was weeping also, for I had been ready to weep from the moment when I recognized that the noise was coming from above my head – aeroplanes were still a rarity in those days – and at the though that what I was about to see for the first time was an aeroplane. Then, as when you sense some moving words to be approaching in a newspaper, I waited only to have seen the aeroplane before bursting into tears. The aviator meanwhile seemed to be hesitating over his course; I felt there to lie open before him – before me, had habit not made me its prisoner – every course through space, or through life; he flew further on, glided for a moment or two above the sea, then, abruptly making up his mind, seeming to yield to some inverse attraction to that of gravity, as if returning to his native land, with a slight movement of his golden wings, he headed straight up into the sky.

To come back to the mechanic, he asked of Morel not just that the Verdurins should replace their break by a car (which, given the Verdurins' generosity in respect of the faithful, was relatively easy), but also, something much more awkward, their head coachman, the sensitive young man given to gloomy thoughts, by him, the chauffeur. This was effected within a few days in the following manner. Morel had begun by getting them to steal from the coachman everything he needed to harness up. One day he could not find the bit, another day the curb-chain. On other occasions, it was his seat cushion that had vanished, or even his whip, his blanket, the martingale, the sponge, the chamois leather. But he always came to an arrangement with neighbours; only he would arrive late, which made M. Verdurin annoyed with him, and plunged him into a state of sadness and black thoughts. The chauffeur, in a hurry to be taken on, declared to Morel that he was returning to Paris. Some master-stroke was required. Morel persuaded M. Verdurin's menservants that the young coachman had declared that he was going to lead them all into an ambush and had boasted of getting the better of all six of them, and he told them that they could not allow that to happen. For his own part, he could not get involved, but he was warning them so that they might get their blow in first. It was agreed that while M. and Mme Verdurin and their friends were out walking, they would all set on the young man in the stables. I must record that, although it was only the occasion for what was about to take place, but because the persons concerned interested me later on, that on the day in question a friend of the Verdurins was holidaying with them, whom they wanted to take out on foot before his departure, fixed for that same evening.

What greatly surprised me when we left to go out was that, on that particular day, Morel, who was coming with us on our walk, where he was to play his violin under the trees, said to me: 'Listen, I've got a bad arm, I don't want to tell Mme Verdurin, but ask her to bring one of her footmen, Howsler for example; he can carry my instruments. – I think one of the others'd be a better choice, I replied. They need him for dinner.' A look of anger passed across Morel's face. 'No, no, I'm not entrusting my violin to just anybody.' Afterwards, I understood the reason for this preference. Howsler was the much loved brother of the young coachman and, had he stayed at the house, could have gone to his assistance. During the walk, low enough for the elder Howsler to be unable to hear us: 'He's a good fellow, that one, said Morel. His brother is, too, for that matter. If it wasn't for that fatal habit of drinking… – What, drinking? said Mme Verdurin, turning pale at the thought of having a coachman who drank. – You wouldn't notice it. I'm forever telling myself it's a miracle he hasn't had an accident while he was driving you. – But does he drive other people then? – You only need to see how many times he's tipped over, his face today is covered in bruises. I don't know how he hasn't killed himself, he's broken his shafts. – I've not seen him today, said Mme Verdurin, trembling at the thought of what might have happened to her, you distress me.' She wanted to cut the walk short so as to get home, Morel chose an air by Bach with countless variations so as to make it last. As soon as we got back, she went to the coachhouse, saw the brand-new shaft and Howsler all bloodied. She was about to tell him, without remarking on it, that she no longer had need of a coachman and to hand him some money, but he, of his own accord, not wishing to accuse his workmates, to whose animosity he had retrospectively attributed the daily theft of all the saddles and the like, and finding that his forbearance led merely to his letting himself be left for dead on the floor, asked to leave, which settled the whole affair. The chauffeur came in the following day and afterwards, Mme Verdurin (who had been obliged to take on a second one) was so satisfied with him that she recommended him to me warmly as someone totally trustworthy. I, all unknowing, employed him by the day in Paris; but I am getting too far ahead of myself, all this will be met with again in the story of Albertine. At this moment, we are at La Raspelière, where I have come to dine for the first time with my loved one, and M. de Charlus with Morel, the purported son of a 'steward' who earned a salary of thirty thousand francs a year, had a carriage, and a number of subordinate majordomos, gardeners, factors and farmers at his beck and call. But since I have been running ahead so, I do not want all the same to leave the reader under the impression that Morel might have been wicked through and through. Rather, he was full of contradictions, capable on certain days of genuine kindness.

I was naturally most surprised to learn that the coachman had been shown the door, and even more so to recognize his replacement as the chauffeur who had been taking Albertine and me out. But he reeled off some complicated story, according to which he was supposed to have returned to Paris, whence he had been sent for on behalf of the Verdurins, and I did not doubt him for a moment. The sacking of the coachman was a reason for Morel to talk briefly with me, so as to express his sadness at the good fellow's departure. For the rest, even aside from the times when I was alone, when he would literally bound towards me in an effusion of delight, Morel, finding that everyone welcomed me with open arms at La Raspelière, and feeling that he had been wilfully excluding himself from familiarity with someone who did not represent any danger to him, since he had made me burn my bridges and removed any possibility of my behaving patronizingly towards him (which I had as it happens never had any thought of doing), ceased to keep his distance from me. I put his change of attitude down to the influence of M. de Charlus, which had indeed made him less limited and more artistic in some things, but in others, where he applied the eloquent, mendacious and anyway ephemeral formulae of the master to the letter, had made him even more stupid. What M. de Charlus had been able to tell him was in fact the one thing that I had assumed. How at the time could I have guessed what I was told afterwards (and of which I have never felt certain, Andrée's assertions concerning anything connected with Albertine, later on especially, having always struck me as needing to be taken with caution, for, as we saw earlier, she was not genuinely fond of my loved one but was jealous of her), what in any event, if it were true, had been remarkably well hidden from me by the two of them: that Albertine knew Morel well? The new attitude which, around the time of the coachman's dismissal, Morel adopted towards me, allowed me to alter my opinion of him. I retained the low opinion of his character I had been led to form by the obsequiousness that this young man had displayed towards me when he had need of me, followed, immediately the service had been rendered, by a contempt taken to the point of seeming not to see me. To which had to be added the evidence of his venal relationship with M. de Charlus, as well as of the instinct for incoherent bestiality whose non-gratification (when that occurred), or the complications that it entailed, was the source of his unhappiness; that character was not uniformly ugly, however, but was full of contradictions. It resembled an old book of the Middle Ages, full of errors, of absurd traditions, of obscenities, it was extraordinarily composite. I had thought at first that his art, in which he was truly a past master, had given him superior abilities that went beyond the virtuosity of the performer. Once, when I was telling him of my desire to get down to work: 'Work, achieve renown, he said to me – Who's that from? I asked him. – From Fontanes, to Chateaubriand.'[15] He also knew a collection of Napoleon's love-letters.[16] Good, I thought, he's literate. But this phrase that he had read who knows where was most probably the only one he knew in the whole of literature, ancient or modern, for he repeated it to me every evening. Another one, which he repeated even more frequently, to stop me from telling anyone anything about him, was the following, which he thought equally literary, but which is scarcely French or at least presents no sort of sense, except perhaps to a manservant obsessed with secrets: 'Put no trust in the mistrustful.' In fact, by going from this stupid maxim to Fontanes's words to Chateaubriand, you would have scanned one whole part, varied but less contradictory than it seems, of Morel's character. This boy who, provided there were money to be made by it, would have done no matter what, and without remorse – perhaps not without a bizarre contrariness, going as far as nervous overexcitement, but which was far from meriting the name of remorse – who would, if he thought it was in his own interest, have plunged whole families into grief or even into mourning, this boy who put money ahead of everything else, ahead of, let alone kindness, the most natural sentiments of a common humanity, this same boy yet put ahead of money his diploma as first prize-winner at the Conservatoire and that no disobliging remarks should be made about him to his flute or counterpoint classes. Thus his greatest rages, his gloomiest and least justifiable outbursts of bad temper stemmed from what he called (no doubt generalizing from a few particular instances when he had encountered men of ill-will) the universal duplicity. He flattered himself he avoided this by never discussing anyone, by keeping his cards hidden, by mistrusting everybody. (As misfortune would have it, given what was to result from it after my return to Paris, his mistrust had not 'worked' in respect of the Balbec chauffeur, in whom he had no doubt recognized one of his own kind, that is to say, contrary to his maxim, a man mistrustful in the proper meaning of the word, who remains stubbornly silent when with decent people but at once sees eye to eye with a debauchee.) It seemed to him – and he was not altogether wrong – that this mistrust would always enable him to come off unscathed, to slip uncaught through the most perilous adventures, without their being able to hold, let alone prove, anything against him in the establishment in the rue Bergère.[17] He would work, would achieve renown, would one day perhaps, his respectability intact, be chairman of the violin jury at the prestigious Conservatoire.

But it is perhaps again to introduce too great a logic into Morel's head, to make his contradictions follow one from the other. In actual fact, his nature was really like a sheet of paper in which so many folds have been made in every direction that it is impossible to know where you are. He seemed to have quite lofty principles, and in a magnificent handwriting, marred by the crudest spelling mistakes, spent hours writing to his brother that he had behaved badly towards his sisters, that he was the oldest and their support; to his sisters, that they were guilty of a breach of good manners vis-à-vis himself.

Soon now, with summer coming to an end, when you alighted from the train at Douville, the sun, muffled by the mist, was no more than a block of red in the uniformly mauve sky. To the great peace that descends in the evening on these lush, saline meadows, which had induced many Parisians, painters for the most part, to come and spend their holidays in Douville, there was added a dampness which made them return in good time inside their little chalets. In several of these, the lamp was already lit. A few cows alone remained outside, gazing at the sea and lowing, while others, more interested in humankind, turned their attention to our carriages. One painter alone, who had set up his easel on a narrow eminence, was working to try and render this great calm and the still light. The cows perhaps would be serving him as unwitting and benevolent models, for their contemplative air and their solitary presence once the human beings had returned home, contributed in their way to the powerful impression of repose that the evening gives off. And a few weeks later, the transposition was no less agreeable when, with the autumn advancing, the days became decidedly short and the journey had to be made in the dark. If I had been taking a stroll during the afternoon, I needed to go home and get dressed by five at the latest, by when the round, red sun had already descended half-way down the slanting mirror I had once detested, and, like Greek fire, had set light to the sea in the glass fronts of all my bookcases. Some incantatory gesture having excited, as I was putting on my dinner jacket, the alert and frivolous self that had been mine when I used to go with Saint-Loup to dine in Rivebelle or on the evening when I thought I would be taking Mlle de Stermaria to dine on the island in the Bois, I was unconsciously humming the same tune as then; and it was only on becoming aware of this that, by the song, I recognized the intermittent singer, who indeed knew only that one song. The first time that I had sung it, I was beginning to be in love with Albertine, but I thought I would never get to know her. Later in Paris, it was when I had ceased loving her and a few days after having possessed her for the first time. Now, it was on loving her again and at the moment of going to have dinner with her, to the great regret of the manager, who thought I would end up living at La Raspelière and abandoning his hotel, and who assured me he had heard that fevers were rife there, due to the marshes of Le Bec and their 'pregnant' waters. I was pleased by this multiplicity, which I could see thus deployed in my life on three planes; besides, when we become for a moment a former self, different that is from the one that we have been for a long time, our sensibilities, no longer deadened by habit, receive from the least shock impressions so vivid as to make all that has gone before seem pallid, and on which, because of their intensity, we fasten with the fleeting exaltation of a drunkard. It was already dark when we got into the omnibus or the carriage which was to take us to the station to catch the little train. And in the foyer the First President would say to us: 'Ah, you're going to La Raspelière! Sapristi, she's got a nerve, Mme Verdurin, making you spend an hour in the train in the dark, just to have dinner. And then start the journey all over again at ten o'clock at night in the very devil of a wind. It's obvious you can't have anything to do,' he added, rubbing his hands. He no doubt spoke thus out of displeasure at not having been invited, and also because of the satisfaction that 'busy' men feel – be their work perfectly fatuous – at 'not having the time' to do what you are doing.

It is legitimate, admittedly, for the man who drafts reports, lines up figures, answers business letters, or follows prices on the Bourse, to feel, when you say to him sneeringly, 'It's all right for you who have nothing to do,' an agreeable sense of his own superiority. But the latter would assert itself equally contemptuously, if not more so (for the busy man, too, dines out), were your recreation writing Hamlet or simply reading it. In which busy men are unthinking. For they ought to reflect that the disinterested culture which strikes them as a comic pastime for the idle when they come upon it at a moment when it is being practised is the same as that culture which, in their own métier, singles out men who are not perhaps better magistrates or administrators than themselves, but before whose rapid promotion they bow their heads, saying: 'It appears he's very well-read, altogether someone of distinction.' But above all the First President did not realize that what pleased me about these dinners at La Raspelière was that, as he rightly said, though in criticism, they 'represented a real journey', a journey whose attraction seemed all the keener because it was not an end in itself, that one was not looking for any enjoyment from it, this last being assigned to the gathering for which one was bound and which never failed to be greatly modified by the whole atmosphere surrounding it. It was already dark now when I exchanged the warmth of the hotel – of the hotel that had become my home – for the compartment into which we got with Albertine, where the reflection of the lamplight on the window told us, at certain of the wheezy little train's stops, that we had arrived in a station. So as not to risk Cottard's failing to notice us, and not having heard the station being shouted out, I would open the door, but what came dashing into the carriage was not the faithful, but the wind, the rain and the cold. In the darkness, I could make out the fields and I could hear the sea, we were in open country. Before we joined the little nucleus, Albertine would inspect herself in a little mirror taken from a gold vanity case that she carried. The first times indeed, Mme Verdurin having made her go upstairs to her dressing-room so that she could tidy herself before dinner, I had, in the midst of the profound calm in which I had been living for some time past, experienced a slight stirring of disquiet and jealousy at being obliged to leave Albertine at the foot of the stairs, and I had felt so anxious while I was alone in the drawing-room in the midst of the little clan, and wondering what my loved one was doing upstairs, that the following day I had, by telegram, after asking M. de Charlus for advice as to what was most fashionable, ordered from Cartier's a vanity case that was the joy of Albertine and of myself. For me it was a token of my peace of mind as well as of my solicitude for my loved one. For she had certainly guessed that I did not like her remaining without me at Mme Verdurin's and had contrived to make all her toilet preparations before the dinner in the compartment.

To the number of Mme Verdurin's regulars, and the most faithful of all, there had for several months now been added M. de Charlus. Regularly, three times a week, the passengers parked in the waiting-rooms or on the platform at Doncières-Ouest would see this fat man going past, with his grey hair, his black moustaches, and red make-up on his lips that was less noticeable at the end of the season than in the summer, when the broad daylight had made it more garish and the heat half liquid. As he made his way towards the little train, he could not help (merely out of a connoisseur's habit, since he now had an attachment that had made him chaste, or at least, most of the time, faithful) casting, at the labourers, the soldiers, the young men in tennis clothes, a furtive glance, at once inquisitorial and timorous, after which he would at once lower his eyelids over eyes that were almost closed, with the unctuousness of an ecclesiastic busy telling his beads, and the reserve of a bride plighted to her one love, or of a well-brought-up young girl. The faithful were the more convinced that he had not seen them when he entered a compartment other than theirs (as the Princesse Sherbatoff also often did), like a man who has no idea whether people will be happy or not to be seen with him and who gives you the option of coming to look for him if you so desire. No such desire had been felt in the very early days by the Doctor, who had wanted us to let him remain on his own in his compartment. Making a virtue of his hesitant nature now that he stood so high medically, it was with a smile, and leaning back, while looking at Ski from over the top of his eyeglass, that he said, either out of mischievousness or to learn his companions' opinion by a roundabout means: 'You understand, if I was on my own, a bachelor… but because of my wife, I ask myself whether I can allow him to travel with us after what you've told me, whispered the Doctor. – What's that you're saying? asked Mme Cottard. – Nothing, it's none of your business, it's not for women,' replied the Doctor with a wink, and with a majestic self-satisfaction that came half-way between the poker-faced expression that he maintained in front of his pupils and his patients and the anxiety that had accompanied his shafts of wit in the old days at the Verdurins', and he went on talking in an undertone. Mme Cottard made out only the words 'of the brotherhood' and 'tapette',[18] and since in the Doctor's idiom the first denoted the Jewish race and the second those who talked too much, Mme Cottard concluded that M. de Charlus must be a garrulous Israelite. She could not understand why the Baron should be ostracized on that account, and thought it her duty as the clan's doyenne to demand that he should not be left on his own, and we all made our way towards M. de Charlus's compartment, guided by a still perplexed Cottard. From the corner where he was reading a volume of Balzac, M. de Charlus remarked this hesitation; he had not, however, looked up. But just as deaf mutes can recognize, by a current of air imperceptible to others, that someone has come up behind them, he had, for alerting him to the coldness felt in respect of him, a veritable hyperacuity of the senses. This, as it customarily does in whatever domain, had given rise in M. de Charlus to imaginary sufferings. Like the neuropaths who, feeling a slight freshness, infer that a window must be open on the floor above, fly into a rage and start sneezing, M. de Charlus, if someone had displayed a preoccupied expression in his presence, concluded that a comment he had made about that person had been repeated to them. But there was no need even for anyone to be wearing a distracted, or a grim, or a laughing expression, he would invent them. In return, cordiality easily masked from him the backbiting of which he was unaware. Having detected Cottard's hesitation the first time, although, much to the surprise of the faithful, who did not think they had yet been noticed by this reader with the lowered eyes, he held out a hand to them when they were a suitable distance away, he contented himself with an inclination of his whole body, at once quickly straightened, for Cottard, without taking the hand that the Doctor had held out in his own suede-gloved hand. 'We absolutely insisted on doing the journey with you, Monsieur, and not leaving you on your own like this in your little corner. It's a great pleasure for us, Mme Cottard said good-naturedly to the Baron. – I'm most honoured, recited the Baron, bowing coldly. – I was very glad to learn that you had finally chosen this region to set up your tabern…' She was going to say tabernacles, but the word struck her as Hebraic and disobliging for a Jew who might see some allusion in it. So she caught herself up to choose another of the expressions with which she was familiar, namely a solemn expression: 'to set up, I meant to say, "your penates" (it is true that these divinities do not belong to the Christian religion either, but to one that has been dead for so long it no longer has any adepts to whom one might be afraid of giving offence). – We, alas, what with the academic year starting, and the Doctor's hospital duties, we can never elect domicile for very long in one place.' And pointing to a cardboard box: 'You can see what's more how we women are less fortunate than the strong sex; to go only as far as to our friends the Verdurins, we're obliged to take with us a whole range of impedimenta.' During this time, I was looking at the Baron's volume of Balzac. This was not a paper-covered copy, bought at random like the volume of Bergotte he had lent me the first year. It was a book from his library, and as such bearing the device 'Je suis au Baron de Charlus', or 'I belong to the Baron de Charlus', for which was sometimes substituted, to display the studious tastes of the Guermantes, 'In proeliis non semper' or still another one, 'Non sine labore.'[19] But we shall soon see these being replaced by others, in order to try and please Morel. After a moment, Mme Cottard took up a subject she considered was more personal to the Baron, 'I don't know if you're of my opinion, Monsieur, she said after a moment, but I'm very broad-minded and as I see it, provided you practise them sincerely, all religions are good. I'm not like those people who start frothing at the mouth at the sight of a… Protestant. – I was taught that mine was the true one,' replied M. de Charlus. 'He's a fanatic, thought Mme Cottard; Swann, except towards the end, was more tolerant, it's true he was a convert.' But quite to the contrary, the Baron was not simply a Christian, as we know, but pious in the fashion of the Middle Ages. For him, as for the sculptors of the thirteenth century, the Christian Church was, in the living sense of the word, peopled by a crowd of beings he believed to be perfectly real: prophets, apostles, angels, sacred personages of every sort, surrounding the Word made flesh, his mother and her espoused, the Eternal Father, all the martyrs and doctors, the race of whom in high relief crowd the porch or fill the nave of the cathedrals. From amongst them all, M. de Charlus had chosen as his patron intercessors the archangels Michael, Gabriel and Raphael, with whom he held frequent conversations so that they might convey his prayers to the Eternal Father, before whose throne they stand. Thus Mme Cottard's error amused me greatly.

To get off the terrain of religion, let us say that the Doctor, having come to Paris with the meagre baggage of a peasant mother's advice, then been absorbed by the almost purely physical studies to which those who wish to carry their medical careers all the way through are obliged to devote themselves for a great many years, had never become cultured; he had acquired more authority, but not experience; he took the word 'honoured' literally, was at once gratified by it because he was vain and pained because he was a good-natured fellow. 'That poor de Charlus, he said that evening to his wife, he upset me when he told me he was honoured to be travelling with us. You sense, poor devil, that he has no connections, that he's demeaning himself.'

But soon, without having needed to be guided by the charitable Mme Cottard, the faithful had succeeded in overcoming the awkwardness they had all more or less felt at the start, on finding themselves next to M. de Charlus. No doubt in his presence, they kept always before them the memory of Ski's revelations and the idea of the sexual strangeness enclosed within their travelling companion. But this strangeness even held a sort of attraction for them. For them, it lent the Baron's conversation, remarkable in any case but in parts that they were hardly able to appreciate, a savour which, by comparison, made the conversation of even the most interesting of the others, of Brichot himself, seem a little colourless. They had been pleased to acknowledge right from the start, moreover, that he was intelligent. 'Genius may lie next to madness,' announced the Doctor, and if the Princesse, hungry for instruction, insisted, he would say no more, this axiom being all that he knew about genius, and seeming moreover less demonstrable than anything having to do with typhoid or arthritis. And since he had become arrogant and remained ill-bred: 'No questions, Princesse, don't interrogate me, I'm at the seaside for a rest. In any case, you wouldn't understand me, you don't know medicine.' And the Princesse would apologize and fall silent, finding that Cottard was a charming man and gathering that celebrities are not always approachable. In this first period, they had in the end therefore found M. de Charlus to be intelligent in spite of his vice (or what is generally so termed). Now it was, without their realizing it, because of that vice that they found him more intelligent than the others. The simplest maxims which, at the adroit provocation of the university man or the sculptor, M. de Charlus pronounced concerning love, jealousy or beauty, because of the singular, secret, refined and monstrous experience from which they had been drawn, assumed for the faithful that charm of the foreign which a psychology analogous to that offered to us from time immemorial by our own dramatic literature wears in a Russian or a Japanese play, as performed by artistes from those places. They still risked, when he was out of earshot, an unkind joke: 'Oh! the sculptor would whisper, catching sight of a young railwayman with the long eyelashes of a nautch-girl whom M. de Charlus had been unable to stop himself from eyeing, if the Baron's starting to make eyes at the ticket collector, it'll take us for ever to get there, the train'll start going arsy-versy. Just look at the way he's looking at him, we're not on a train any more but a bummel.' In fact, however, if M. de Charlus did not come, they felt disappointment almost at travelling only among people who were like everyone else and not to have next to them this bedizened, pot-bellied and impenetrable personage, reminiscent of a box, of some suspect and exotic provenance, which gives off a curious smell of fruit, the mere thought of sampling which would turn the stomach. From this point of view, the faithful of the masculine sex derived a keener satisfaction, during the short section of the journey between Saint-Martin-du-Chêne, where M. de Charlus got in, and Doncières, the station where we were joined by Morel. For, so long as the violinist was not there (and provided the ladies and Albertine, keeping to themselves so as not to hamper the conversation, remained at a distance), M. de Charlus did not hold back, so as not to appear to be avoiding certain topics, from talking about 'what it is agreed should be termed vice'. Albertine could not embarrass him, for she was always with the ladies, out of the graciousness of a girl who does not want her presence to restrict the freedom of the conversation. But I was easily able to bear not having her beside me, always on condition that she remained in the same carriage. For I, who no longer felt jealousy nor scarcely any love for her, and gave no thought to what she might be doing on the days when I did not see her, when, in return, I was there, a simple partition that might conceivably have been concealing a betrayal was unbearable to me, and if she went with the ladies into the next-door compartment, a moment later, no longer able to remain in my seat, and at the risk of offending whoever might be speaking, Brichot, Cottard or Charlus, to whom I was unable to explain the reason for my flight, I would get up, leave them sitting there, and, in order to see whether something abnormal might not be going on, move next door. And all the way to Doncières, M. de Charlus, not being afraid to shock, would talk, often very crudely, of habits which he declared that for his own part he considered neither good nor bad. He did so out of cleverness, to display his broad-mindedness, persuaded as he was that his own habits had aroused hardly any suspicions in the minds of the faithful. He believed indeed that there existed in the world a few people who had, following an expression that later became common with him, 'got him straight'. But he imagined that there were no more than three or four such persons and that none of them were on the Normandy coast. This illusion may seem surprising on the part of someone so discerning and so anxious. Even in the case of those whom he thought more or less in the know, he flattered himself that it was only in the abstract, and, according to whether he told them one thing or another, aspired to place the person in question outside the suppositions of an interlocutor who, from politeness, pretended to take him at his word. Even suspecting what I might know or suppose about him, he imagined that this opinion, which he thought was of longer standing on my part than in reality it was, was quite general, and that it was enough for him to deny one or other detail in order to be believed, whereas, on the contrary, even if knowledge of the whole always precedes that of the details, it makes the investigation of these infinitely simpler and, having destroyed the capacity for invisibility, no longer allows the dissembler to hide whatever he pleases. Certainly, when M. de Charlus, asked out to dinner by one or other of the faithful or some friend of the faithful, took the most complicated detours in order to introduce, into the middle of the names of ten people whom he was citing, the name of Morel, he hardly suspected that to the reasons he gave, always different, for the pleasure or convenience he might find in being invited with him on that particular evening, his hosts, while appearing to believe him implicitly, had substituted a single reason, always the same, which he thought was not known to them, namely that he was in love with him. Similarly, Mme Verdurin, seeming always to appear quite to have accepted the motives, part artistic, part humanitarian, that M. de Charlus gave her for the interest he took in Morel, never stopped thanking the Baron feelingly for the touching kindnesses, as she put it, that he showed the violinist. But how astonished would M. de Charlus have been if, on a day when he and Morel were late and had not come by the train, he had heard the Patronne say: 'We shan't wait for the young ladies any longer!' The Baron would have been all the more astounded in that, hardly ever stirring from La Raspelière, the figure he cut there was that of chaplain, of an abbé from the repertory, sometimes (when Morel had a 48-hour leave) sleeping there two nights in a row. Mme Verdurin would then give them two communicating rooms, and, to set them at their ease, say: 'If you feel like making music, don't hesitate, the walls are like those of a fortress, you've no one on your floor, and my husband sleeps like the dead.' On these days, M. de Charlus would relieve the Princesse and go to meet the new arrivals at the station, apologizing for Mme Verdurin's not having come on account of a state of health that he described so graphically that the guests entered wearing suitably concerned expressions and let out a cry of surprise on finding the Patronne up and about, in a demi-décolletage.

For M. de Charlus had become, momentarily, for Mme Verdurin the faithful of faithfuls, a second Princesse Sherbatoff. She was much less sure of his social standing than of the Princesse's, imagining that if the latter wished to see only the little nucleus, this was out of contempt for others and a predilection for it. Since this selfsame pretence was peculiar to the Verdurins, who treated as bores all those with whom they could not associate, it is incredible that the Patronne should have believed the Princesse to be a soul of steel, detesting what was fashionable. But she stuck by her opinion and was convinced that in the case of the grande dame, too, it was in all sincerity and out of a liking for intellectuality that she did not associate with bores. The number of these had in any case gone down where the Verdurins were concerned. The life of a seaside resort removed from an introduction the consequences for the future that might have been dreaded in Paris. Brilliant men, having come to Balbec without their wives, which made things easier, put out feelers towards La Raspelière, and went from boring to delightful. This was the case with the Prince de Guermantes, whom the absence of the Princesse would not, on the other hand, have decided to go to the Verdurins' 'as a bachelor', had the magnet of Dreyfusism not been so powerful as to cause him to ascend the rise leading to La Raspelière in a single go, on a day, alas, when the Patronne was out. Mme Verdurin was not certain in any case that he and M. de Charlus were from the same social world. The Baron had certainly said that the Duc de Guermantes was his brother, but that perhaps was the falsehood of an adventurer. However fashionable he had shown himself to be, however affable, and however faithful to the Verdurins, the Patronne yet hesitated almost to invite him with the Prince de Guermantes. She consulted Ski and Brichot: 'The Baron and the Prince de Guermantes, do they go together? – Good heavens, Madame, where one of them's concerned, I think I can say… – One of them, what good's that to me? Mme Verdurin had gone on, in annoyance. I'm asking you whether they go together? – Ah, Madame, that sort of thing's very hard to find out.' There was no malice in this on Mme Verdurin's part. She was certain as to the Baron's habits, but in expressing herself as she did it was not they that she had in mind, wanting only to know whether the Prince and M. de Charlus could be invited together, whether they would hit it off. There was no unkind intention in her use of these ready-made expressions, which are favoured by the 'little clans' of the artistic. To parade M. de Guermantes, she wanted to take him, on the afternoon following the lunch-party, to a charity event when some sailors from the coast would be enacting a ship setting sail. But not having the time to take care of everything, she delegated her functions to the faithful of faithfuls, to the Baron. 'You understand, they're not to stay standing about, like mussels, they've got to be coming and going, be seen clearing the decks for action, or whatever you call all that. But you who often go to the harbour in Balbec-Plage, you could certainly make them rehearse without tiring yourself. You must have a better idea than I do, M. de Charlus, of how to get young sailors going. But then we're giving ourselves a lot of trouble over M. de Guermantes. Perhaps he's one of those imbeciles from the Jockey Club. Oh, good heavens, I'm saying bad things about the Jockey Club, and I seem to remember you're one of them. What, Baron, you're not answering, are you one of them? Will you not come out with us? Look, here's a book I've received, I think it'll interest you. It's a Roujon. It's got a pretty title: Parmi les hommes.'[20]

For my own part, I was all the happier that M. de Charlus should quite often have stood in for Princesse Sherbatoff in that I was in ill odour with the latter, for a reason at once trivial and profound. One day when I was in the little train, showering attentions, as ever, on the Princesse Sherbatoff, I saw Mme de Villeparisis get in. She had in fact come to spend a few weeks with the Princess of Luxembourg, but, shackled to this daily need to see Albertine, I had never replied to the proliferating invitations from the Marquise and her royal hostess. I felt remorse at the sight of my grandmother's friend and purely as a duty (without leaving the Princesse Sherbatoff), I talked with her for quite some time. I had absolutely no idea, however, that Mme de Villeparisis knew very well who my companion was but had no wish to meet her. At the next station, Mme de Villeparisis left the compartment, and I even reproached myself for not having helped her alight; I went to resume my seat next to the Princesse. But it was as though – a cataclysm common among people whose position is insecure and who fear that you may have heard ill reports of them, and despise them – a change of scenery had been effected. Ensconced in her Revue des Deux Mondes, Mme Sherbatoff did little more than move her lips in answer to my questions and finally told me that I was giving her a migraine. I had no inkling of what my crime was. When I said goodbye to the Princesse, the usual smile did not light up her face, a curt nod depressed her chin, she did not even offer me her hand and she has never spoken to me since. But she must have spoken – but what to say, I do not know – to the Verdurins, for the moment I asked them whether I would not do well to make some polite gesture to the Princesse Sherbatoff, they came hastily out in chorus: 'No, no, no! That least of all. She doesn't like courtesies!' This was not done so as to cause a rift between us, but she had managed to make them believe that she was indifferent to attentions, a soul impervious to the vanities of this world. One needs to have met the politician who passes for being the most plain-spoken, the most intransigent, the most unapproachable once he has come to power; one needs to have seen him in his days out of favour, timidly soliciting, with the dazzling smile of a lover, the haughty salute of some journalist or other; one needs to have seen the straightened spine of Cottard (whom his new patients mistook for a ramrod), and to know from what unrequited passions, what snobbish rebuffs, the seeming haughtiness, the universally acknowledged anti-snobbery of the Princesse Sherbatoff had been formed, to understand that the rule amongst humankind – which allows of exceptions, naturally – is that the hard are the weak whom no one has wanted, and that the strong alone, caring little whether they are wanted or no, have that gentleness that the crowd mistakes for weakness.

For the rest, I must not judge the Princesse Sherbatoff harshly. Hers is so very common a case! One day, at the funeral of a Guermantes, a distinguished man standing beside me pointed out a slim gentleman graced by a pretty face. 'Of all the Guermantes, my neighbour said, that's the most extraordinary, the oddest. It's the Duc's brother.' I answered unwisely that he was mistaken, that the gentleman was no relation at all to the Guermantes but was called Fournier-Sarlovèze.[21] The distinguished man turned his back on me and has never acknowledged me since.

A great musician, a member of the Institute, a high official dignitary who knew Ski, stopped off in Arembouville, where he had a niece, and came to one of the Verdurins' Wednesdays. M. de Charlus was especially affable towards him (at Morel's request), above all so that, on his return to Paris, the Academician might enable him to attend various private performances, rehearsals and the like, where the violinist would be playing. The Academician, flattered and a charming man in any case, promised, and kept his promise. The Baron was deeply touched by all the kindnesses that this personage (who in fact, where he himself was concerned, loved only, and with passion, women) showed him, by all the facilities he procured for him so that he might meet Morel in those official places into which the layman cannot go, by all the opportunities offered the young virtuoso by the celebrated artist to put himself forward, to become known, by nominating him, in preference to others equally talented, for recitals that would be much talked about. But M. de Charlus did not suspect that he owed the maestro all the more gratitude in that the latter, doubly deserving, or if you prefer, twice as culpable, was fully aware of the relationship between the violinist and his noble patron. He encouraged them, while admittedly having no sympathy with them, being unable to understand any love except that for a woman, which had inspired all his own music, but out of moral indifference, a professional wish to please and to be of service, a worldly amiability and snobbery. As for his doubts concerning the nature of that relationship, so few did he have that, at the very first dinner at La Raspelière, he had asked Ski, referring to M. de Charlus and Morel, as he might have done to a man and his mistress: 'Have they been together long?' But, too much the man of the world to allow any of this to appear to those concerned, and prepared, had it given rise to tittle-tattle among Morel's fellow-students, to suppress it and to reassure Morel by saying to him in a fatherly way: 'They say that about everyone these days', he did not cease to shower the Baron with kindnesses, which the latter thought charming, but natural, being incapable of suspecting the celebrated maestro of so much vice or so much virtue. For no one was so mean-spirited as to repeat to M. de Charlus the witticisms spoken in his absence, or the à peu près about Morel. Yet this simple situation suffices to demonstrate that even that universally decried thing, which would nowhere find anyone to defend it, 'gossip', has, whether we are ourselves its object so that it then becomes particularly disagreeable, or whether it teaches us something we did not know about a third person, its psychological value. It prevents the mind from falling asleep over the factitious view that it takes of what it believes things to be like, which is only their outward appearance. It turns this inside out with the magical dexterity of an idealist philosopher and quickly offers us an unsuspected corner of the reverse side of the fabric. Could M. de Charlus have imagined these words spoken by a certain fond female relative: 'How can you expect Mémé to be in love with me? You're forgetting I'm a woman!' Yet she had a genuine, deep attachment to M. de Charlus. Why be surprised then, that, in the case of the Verdurins, on whose affection and kindness he had no right to rely, the remarks that they made when far away from him (and it was not only remarks, as we shall see) should have been so unlike what he imagined them to be, that is to say the simple echo of those that he heard when he was there? These last alone decorated with fond inscriptions the little ideal pavilion into which M. de Charlus sometimes went in order to dream on his own, when he would introduce his imagination for a moment into the idea that the Verdurins had of him. The atmosphere there was so sympathetic, so cordial, the respite so comforting, that when M. de Charlus, before going to sleep, had come there for a moment to relax from his cares, he never re-emerged without a smile. But, for each of us, a pavilion of this kind is double: facing what we think is the only one, there is the other, customarily invisible to us, the real one, symmetrical with the one that we know, yet very different, whose decoration, where we would recognize nothing of what we were expecting to see, would alarm us as being formed of the odious symbols of an unsuspected hostility. How aghast M. de Charlus would have been, had he found his way into one of these adverse pavilions, by virtue of some piece of gossip, as if by one of those servants' staircases where obscene graffiti have been chalked on the doors of the apartments by disgruntled tradesmen or dismissed domestics! But, just as we are devoid of that sense of direction with which certain birds are endowed, so we lack the sense of visibility as we lack that of distances, imagining as close the concerned attention of people who, on the contrary, never give us a thought, and not suspecting that during this same time we are the sole preoccupation of others. Thus M. de Charlus lived deluded, like the fish which believes that the water in which he is swimming extends beyond the glass of his tank, which offers him his reflection, whereas he does not see, beside him, in the shadows, the amused passer-by who is following his antics, or the all-powerful pisciculturalist who, at the unforeseen and fatal moment, deferred at this moment in the case of the Baron (for whom the pisciculturalist, in Paris, will be Mme Verdurin), will pull him ruthlessly out from the medium in which he had liked living, to toss him into another one. Whole nations, what is more, insofar as they are simply collections of individuals, can provide examples, vaster yet identical in each of their parts, of this profound, obstinate and disconcerting blindness. Up until now, though it may have been a reason why M. de Charlus passed remarks in the little clan of a pointless cleverness or a daring that gave rise to surreptitious smiles, it had not yet had for him, nor was it to have in Balbec, any serious disadvantages. A little albumen, or sugar or cardiac arrhythmia does not stop life from continuing normally for someone who does not even notice them, while the doctor alone sees them as prophetic of catastrophes. At present, M. de Charlus's liking – whether Platonic or not – for Morel merely led the Baron readily to say in Morel's absence that he found him very good-looking, thinking this would be taken quite innocently, and thereby behaving like a shrewd man who, summoned to testify in court, will not be afraid to enter into details that seem on the face of it to be to his disadvantage, but which, on this very count, have more that is natural and less that is vulgar about them than the conventional protestations of a stage defendant. With the same freedom, always between Doncières-Ouest and Saint-Martin-du-Chêne – or conversely, on the return journey – M. de Charlus gladly talked about people who have, it seems, very strange habits, and would even add: 'I say strange after all, I don't know why, for there's nothing so very strange about it,' in order to prove to himself how thoroughly at ease he felt with his audience. And he was so in fact, provided that the initiative in these proceedings lay with him and he knew that the gallery was mute and smiling, disarmed by credulity or by a good upbringing.

When M. de Charlus was not speaking of his admiration for Morel's beauty, as if it had no connection with a proclivity known as a vice, he would treat of this vice, but as if it were by no means his own. At times, indeed, he did not hesitate to call it by its name. When, after looking at the fine binding on his Balzac, I asked what he liked best in the Comédie humaine, he answered, steering his thoughts towards an idée fixe: 'All one thing or all the other, the little miniatures like Le Curé de Tours or La Femme abandonnée, or the great frescos like the series of the Illusions perdues. What, you don't know Les Illusions perdues? It's so fine, the moment when Carlos Herrera asks the name of the château his barouche is passing: it's Rastignac, the home of the young man he had once been in love with. Whereupon the abbé falls into a reverie that Swann used to call, which was very witty, the "Tristesse d'Olympio" of pederasty.[22] And the death of Lucien! I no longer recall what man of taste[23] it was whose reply, to whoever asked him what event had most distressed him in his life, was: "The death of Lucien de Rubempré in Splendeurs et misères".' – I know everyone's wearing Balzac this year, just as last year it was pessimism, Brichot broke in. But at the risk of grieving those souls yearning for a Balzacian deference, and without aspiring, damn it all, to the role of literary gendarme and to institute charges of faults of grammar, I will admit that the copious improviser whose alarming lucubrations you appear strangely to overrate, has always seemed to me an insufficiently meticulous wielder of the pen. I have read those Illusions perdues of which you speak, Baron, torturing myself to attain to the fervour of an initiate, and I confess in all simplicity of soul that these romans-feuilletons worded in pathos and in double or triple gobbledegook ('Esther happy', 'Where the wrong paths lead', 'The price old men pay for love') [24] have always had the effect on me of Rocambole[25] mysteries elevated by some inexplicable favour to the precarious status of masterpiece… – You say that because you know nothing of life,' said the Baron, doubly irritated, for he sensed that Brichot would understand neither his artistic nor his other reasons. 'I quite understand, replied Brichot, that, to talk like Master François Rabelais, you mean I am moult sorbonagre, sorbonicole et sorboniforme.[26] Yet, equally as much as my fellows, I like a book to give an impression of life and sincerity, I am not one of those clerks… – The quart d'heure de Rabelais,[27] broke in Doctor Cottard, with an expression no longer of uncertainty but of witty self-assurance –… who take a vow of literature following the rule of l'Abbaye-aux-Bois in the obedience of M. le Vicomte de Chateaubriand, grand master of humbug, according to the strict rule of the humanists. M. le Vicomte de Chateaubriand… – Chateaubriand aux pommes?[28] broke in Doctor Cottard. – He is the patron saint of the brotherhood,' Brichot continued, without picking up on the Doctor's joke, who, in return, alarmed by the university man's words, looked anxiously at M. de Charlus. Brichot had seemed lacking in tact to Cottard, whose pun had brought a delicate smile to the lips of the Princesse Sherbatoff. 'With the Professor, the mordant irony of the complete sceptic never loses its rights,' she said, out of friendliness and to show that the doctor's 'witticism' had not gone unnoticed by her. 'The wise man is of necessity a sceptic, replied the Doctor. What do I know? "Gnothi seauton", said Socrates. That's very true, excess in anything is a fault. But I'm flabbergasted when I reflect that that was enough for the name of Socrates to have endured up until our own day. What is there in that philosophy? Little enough, when all's said and done. When you reflect that Charcot and others have done work a thousand times more remarkable and which at least rests on something, on the suppression of the pupillary reflex as a syndrome of general paralysis, and that they're almost forgotten! When all's said and done, Socrates isn't so extraordinary. They're people who had nothing to do, who spent their whole day walking about chopping logic. It's like Jesus Christ: "Love one another," how very pretty. – My friend…, pleaded Mme Cottard. – Naturally, my wife is protesting, women are all neurotics. – But, mon petit docteur, I'm not a neurotic, murmured Mme Cottard. – What, she's not a neurotic? When her son's ill, she presents phenomena of insomnia. Still, I acknowledge that Socrates and the others, they're necessary for a superior culture, to get a gift for exposition. I always quote the gnothi seauton to my pupils at the first lecture. Old Bouchard, who found that out, congratulated me. – I'm not one of the supporters of form for form's sake, any more than in poetry I'd hoard millionaire rhymes,[29] resumed Brichot. All the same, the Comédie humaine – not so very human – is too much the opposite of those works in which the art outweighs the subject-matter, as that faithful old steed Ovid has it.[30] And it's permissible to prefer a path half-way up the slope, which leads to the vicarage of Meudon or the Hermitage of Ferney, equidistant from the Vallée-aux-Loups, where René majestically fulfilled the functions of an unyielding pontificate, and from Les Jardies, where Honoré de Balzac, harassed by the bailiff's men, never stopped cacographying, for the sake of a Polish woman, as a zealous apostle of double Dutch.[31] – Chateaubriand is much more alive than you say, and Balzac is a great writer nonetheless, replied M. de Charlus, still too imbued with the tastes of Swann not to be irritated by Brichot, and Balzac was familiar with those passions even that everyone ignores or studies only in order to castigate them. Not to refer again to the immortal Illusions perdues, Sarrasine, La Fille aux yeux d'or, Une Passion dans le désert, even the somewhat enigmatic Fausse maîtresse, will bear out what I'm saying. When I spoke of this "outside Nature" side of Balzac with Swann, he used to say: "You're of the same opinion as Taine."[32] I didn't have the honour of meeting Taine, added M. de Charlus (with that irritating habit among society people of the pointless "Monsieur", as if they believed that, by qualifying a great writer as Monsieur, they were bestowing an honour on him, or perhaps keeping their distance, and letting it be seen that they did not know him), I didn't know Monsieur Taine, but I took it as a great honour to be of the same opinion as him.' Despite these ridiculous society habits, M. de Charlus was in fact highly intelligent, and it is probable that if some ancient marriage had established links between his family and that of Balzac, he would have felt (no less than Balzac, for that matter) a self-satisfaction of which he would not, however, have been able to stop himself boasting, as though of a mark of admirable condescension.

On occasions, at the station that came after Saint-Martin-du-Chêne, some young men would get into the train. M. de Charlus could not help looking at them, but since he cut short and disguised the attention he was paying to them, it came to look as though it were concealing a secret, more particular even than the real one; you would have said that he knew them, and had let this show in spite of himself after accepting the sacrifice, before turning back to us, as those children do who, following a quarrel between parents, have been forbidden to greet certain classmates, but who, when they meet them, cannot forbear to raise their heads before falling back under the ferrule of their tutor.

At the word coming from the Greek with which M. de Charlus, in speaking of Balzac, had followed the allusion to the 'Tristesse d'Olympio' in Splendeurs et misères, Ski, Brichot and Cottard had looked at one another with a smile that was less ironic perhaps than imbued with the satisfaction that dinner guests might feel who had succeeded in getting Dreyfus to talk about his own Affair, or the Empress about her reign. They were counting indeed on pressing him a little further on the subject, but already we were at Doncières, where Morel joined us. In front of him, M. de Charlus kept careful watch on the conversation, and when Ski wanted to bring him back on to the love of Carlos Herrera for Lucien de Rubempré, the Baron assumed the annoyed, mysterious and finally (seeing they were not listening to him) severe and judicial expression of a father hearing improprieties being spoken in front of his daughter. Ski having shown persistence in pursuing the matter, M. de Charlus, his eyes bulging and raising his voice, said meaningfully, indicating Albertine, who could not however hear us, being busy talking to Mme Cottard and the Princesse Sherbatoff, and in the ambiguous tone of someone wishing to teach a lesson to people of no breeding: 'I think it might be time to talk about things that might interest this young lady.' But I saw clearly that for him, the young lady was not Albertine but Morel; he later confirmed the accuracy of my interpretation by the expressions he used when asking that we should not have any more such conversations in front of Morel. 'You know, he said to me, referring to the violinist, he's not at all what you might think, he's a very decent boy who's always stayed very sensible, very responsible.' And you felt from these words that M. de Charlus looked on sexual inversion as a danger equally as threatening for young men as prostitution is for women, and that if he used the epithet 'responsible' in connection with Morel, it was in the sense that it acquires when applied to a young working-girl. Then, to change the conversation, Brichot asked me whether I was counting on staying much longer in Incarville. For all that I had pointed out to him more than once that I was living not in Incarville but in Balbec, he always fell back into his error, because it was under the name of Incarville or of Balbec-Incarville that he designated this part of the littoral. There are people who talk in this way about the same things as ourselves but calling them by a slightly different name. A certain lady of the Faubourg Saint-Germain always asked me, when she wanted to talk about the Duchesse de Guermantes, whether I had seen Zénaïde lately, or Oriane-Zénaïde, which meant that at the outset I did not understand. There had probably been a time when, a relation of Mme de Guermantes's being called Oriane, she, for her part, had been called, to avoid confusion, Oriane-Zénaïde. Perhaps, too, there had originally been a station only in Incarville, and you went on from there to Balbec by carriage. 'What were you talking about, then?' said Albertine, surprised by the solemn, paterfamilias tone that M. de Charlus had just usurped. 'About Balzac, the Baron hastened to reply, and this evening you're wearing the exact outfit of the Princesse de Cadignan,[33] not the first one, the one at the dinner, but the second.' This coincidence derived from the fact that, in choosing Albertine's outfits, I drew my inspiration from the taste she had acquired thanks to Elstir, who greatly valued a sobriety that might have been called British had it not gone with a greater comfort, a French softness. The dresses he preferred most often offered to the eye a harmonious combination of grey shades, like that of Diane de Cadignan. M. de Charlus was almost alone in knowing how to appreciate Albertine's outfits at their true worth; his eye would at once pick out what constituted their rarity, their price; he would never have named one fabric in mistake for another, and he recognized the maker. Only he preferred – for women – rather more dash and colour than Elstir could tolerate. And so, on that particular evening, she threw me a glance, half smiling, half anxious, lowering her little pink kitten's nose. Indeed, overlapping with her grey crêpe-de-chine skirt, her grey cheviot jacket made you suppose that Albertine was all in grey. But signalling to me to help her, because her bouffant sleeves needed smoothing down or pulling up for her to get into or out of her jacket, she took the latter off, and since her sleeves were of a very soft tartan, pink, pale blue, greeny, dove-coloured, it was if a rainbow had formed in a grey sky. And she had been wondering whether M. de Charlus was going to like it. 'Ah! exclaimed the latter, in ecstasies, look there, a sunbeam, a prism of colour. All my compliments to you. – But Monsieur alone has earned any, replied Albertine kindly, indicating me, for she liked to show what had come to her from me. – It's only the women who don't know how to dress that are afraid of colour, M. de Charlus went on. One can be brilliant without vulgarity and soft without being drab. Anyway, you don't have the same reasons as Mme de Cadignan to want to appear detached from life, because that was the idea she wanted to instil in d'Arthez with that grey outfit.' Albertine, interested by this wordless language of dresses, questioned M. de Charlus about the Princesse de Cadignan. 'Oh, it's an exquisite short novel, said the Baron dreamily. I know the little garden where Diane de Cadignan walked with Mme d'Espard. It's the garden of one of my cousins. – All these things about his cousin's garden, muttered Brichot to Cottard, may, just like his genealogy, be something that the excellent Baron values. But what interest can it have for us, who don't have the privilege of walking in it, don't know the lady and have no claim to a title?' For Brichot did not suspect that one might be interested in a dress or a garden as in a work of art, and that it was as if in Balzac that M. de Charlus could again see Mme de Cadignan's little garden paths. The Baron continued: 'But you know her, he said to me, referring to the cousin in question and in order to flatter me by addressing himself to me as if to someone who, exiled among the little clan, was, for M. Charlus, if not of his world, then at least went into his world. At all events, you must have met her at Mme de Villeparisis's. – The Marquise de Villeparisis that the château of Baucreux belongs to? asked Brichot, looking captivated. – Yes, you know her? M. de Charlus asked curtly. – Not at all, replied Brichot, but our colleague Norpois spends part of his holidays every year at Baucreux. I've had occasion to write to him there.' I told Morel, thinking to interest him, that M. de Norpois was a friend of my father's. But not a single movement of his face attested to his having heard, so poor an opinion did he have of my parents, as having not come near to being what my great-uncle had been, whose manservant his father was and who, moreover, unlike the rest of the family, rather liked 'cutting a dash' and had left his servants dazzled by the memory of him. 'It seems that Mme de Villeparisis is a superior woman; but I've never been admitted to judge of that for myself, any more than my colleagues for that matter. For Norpois, who is as it happens the soul of courtesy and amiability at the Institute, has never introduced any of us to the Marquise. The only one I know who's been received by her is our friend Thureau-Dangin, who had an old family connection, and also Gaston Boissier,[34] whom she wanted to meet following a study she found especially interesting. He dined there once and came back under the spell. Mme Boissier hasn't been asked, though.' At these names, Morel gave a feeling smile: 'Ah, Thureau-Dangin! he said to me, with an expression as interested as that which he had displayed on hearing speak of the Marquis de Norpois and of my father had remained indifferent. Thureau-Dangin and your uncle were inseparable. When a lady wanted a centre seat for a reception at the Academy, your uncle used to say: "I'll write to Thureau-Dangin." And of course the seat was sent straight away, for you can well understand that M. Thureau-Dangin wouldn't have risked refusing your uncle anything, who'd have got his own back on him. It amuses me, too, to hear the name Boissier, for it was there your great-uncle did all his shopping for the ladies at the New Year.[35] I know because I know the person who was responsible for doing it.' He had done more than know him, it was his own father. Certain of these affectionate allusions by Morel to my uncle's memory touched on the fact that we were not counting on remaining for ever in the Guermantes hôtel, where we had only come to lodge on account of my grandmother. There was talk now and again of a possible move. But in order to understand the advice that Charles Morel was giving me in this regard, you need to know that in the old days my great-uncle had lived at 40 bis boulevard Malesherbes.[36] The consequence of which was that, in the family, since we used to go frequently to my uncle Adolphe's up until the fateful day when I had caused a rift between him and my parents by retailing the story of the lady in pink, instead of saying 'at your uncle's', we would say 'at 40 bis'. Some of Mama's cousins would say to her, in the most natural way: 'Ah, we can't have you on Sunday, you're dining at 40 bis.' If I was going to visit a relative, I was advised to go first of all to '40 bis', so that my uncle should not be offended that we had not begun with him. He was the owner of the house and proved, truth to tell, very difficult when it came to choosing his tenants, who were all friends, or became so. Colonel le Baron de Vatry came every day to smoke a cigar with him in order to get his repairs done more easily. The porte cochère was always closed. If my uncle caught sight of any washing or a carpet at a window, he would enter in a fury and have them taken back in more quickly than a policeman would today. He nonetheless let part of the house, keeping for himself only two floors and the stables. In spite of which, knowing how to please him by praising the excellent state of upkeep of the house, we extolled the comfort of the 'little hôtel', as if my uncle had been its sole occupant, and he let it pass, without offering any formal denial as he should have done. The 'little hôtel' was certainly comfortable (my uncle having introduced all the new inventions of the day). But there was nothing extraordinary about it. My uncle alone, while talking with false modesty about 'my little hovel', was convinced, or had at all events instilled into his manservant, his manservant's wife, the coachman and the cook, the idea that nowhere in Paris did there exist anything comparable, where comfort, luxury and attraction were concerned, to the little hôtel. Charles Morel had grown up in this belief. In it he had remained. And so, even on the days when he was not talking to me, if on the train I mentioned to someone the possibility of our moving, he would at once smile at me and wink knowingly, saying: 'Ah, what you need is something in the style of 40 bis! You'd be really comfortable there! It can be said your uncle knew what he was doing. I'm quite sure there's nothing that comes up to 40 bis in the whole of Paris.'

From the melancholy expression which M. de Charlus had assumed when talking about the Princesse de Cadignan, I had a clear sense that that novel had not set him thinking only about the small garden of a cousin who meant little to him. He fell into a profound reverie and, as if talking to himself: 'Les Secrets de la Princesse de Cadignan! he exclaimed, what a masterpiece! So very profound, so very painful, and Diane's bad reputation, which she's so afraid of the man she loves finding out about! How eternally true, and more general than it may appear! There's so much to it!' M. de Charlus uttered these words with a sadness that you felt he found not without its charm, however. Certainly, M. de Charlus, not knowing the precise extent to which his habits were or were not known, had been fearful for some time past that, once he had returned to Paris and he was seen with Morel, the latter's family might step in and his happiness be thus put in jeopardy. This eventuality had probably appeared to him hitherto only as something profoundly disagreeable and painful. But the Baron was very much the artist. And now that he had, in these past few moments, merged his own situation with that described by Balzac, he had in some sense taken refuge in the novel and, in the misfortune that perhaps threatened him, or which did not at all events fail to alarm him, he had the consolation of discovering in his own anxiety what Swann, and Saint-Loup also, would have called something 'very Balzacian'. This identification with the Princesse de Cadignan had been made easy for M. de Charlus by virtue of the mental transposition which had become habitual with him and of which he had already given various examples. This was enough, indeed, for the mere replacement of the woman, as the beloved object, by a young man, at once to set in train around the latter that whole process of social complications which develops around a normal liaison. When, for whatever reason, they introduce a change once and for all into the calendar, or into time-tables, if the year is made to start a few weeks later or midnight to strike a quarter of an hour earlier, since the days will nevertheless contain twenty-four hours and the months thirty days, everything that depends on the measurement of time will remain identical. Everything can have been changed without leading to any disturbance, since the ratio between the figures is still the same. So, too, with the lives that adopt 'Central European Time' or the Eastern calendar. It even seems that the pride we take in keeping an actress may have played a part in this particular liaison. When, from the very first day, M. de Charlus had made inquiries into Morel's origins, he had certainly learned that he was of humble extraction, but a demi-mondaine with whom we are in love is no less glamorous in our eyes for being a daughter of poor people. On the other hand, the well-known musicians to whom he had written – not even out of self-interest, like the friends who, when introducing Swann to Odette, had portrayed her as more difficult and more sought-after than she was – but out of the simple triteness of men in the public eye overpraising a beginner, had replied to the Baron: 'Ah, a great talent, considerable position, given how young he is, of course, much appreciated by the cognoscenti, will make his way.' And out of that obsession which people who know nothing of inversion have, to talk about masculine beauty: 'And then he looks pretty when he's playing; he does better than anyone at a concert; he has pretty hair and distinguished attitudes, his expression is ravishing, he's the very picture of a violinist.' And so M. de Charlus, over-excited in any case by Morel, who did not fail to let him know of how many propositions he was the object, was flattered to take him back with him, and to create for him a garret to which he often returned. For he wanted the rest of the time free, as was necessitated by his career, with which M. de Charlus was anxious, however much money he might have to give him, that Morel should continue, either in the very Guermantes-like belief that a man has to do something, that we are only as good as our talents, and that noble birth or money are merely the zero that multiplies a value, or because he was afraid that, if he were unoccupied and never out of his sight, the violinist might become bored. He did not want in any case to deprive himself of the pleasure he got, at certain major concerts, from telling himself: 'The man they're applauding at this moment will be at home with me tonight.' Fashionable people, when they are in love and whatever the form of that love, stake their vanity on what may destroy the advantages in which their vanity would previously have found satisfaction.

Morel, sensing that I bore him no malice, genuinely attached to M. de Charlus, and perfectly indifferent physically to both of us moreover, ended by displaying in my own case the same feelings of warm sympathy as a cocotte who knows that you do not desire her and that in you her lover has a genuine friend who will not try to make trouble between them. Not only did he talk to me exactly as Rachel, Saint-Loup's mistress, had once done, but even, judging by what M. de Charlus repeated to me, said the same things about me in my absence as Rachel had said about me to Robert. Indeed, M. de Charlus said to me: 'He's very fond of you,' like Robert: 'She's very fond of you.' And like the nephew for the sake of his mistress, it was for Morel's sake that the uncle frequently invited me to go and dine with them. There were moreover no fewer storms between them than between Robert and Rachel. It is true that Charlie (Morel) once out of the way, M. de Charlus never tired of singing his praises, repeating, what he found flattering, that the violinist was so good to him. It was noticeable nonetheless that frequently, even in front of all the faithful, Charlie wore an irritated expression instead of appearing always happy and submissive as the Baron would have wished. This irritation even got later on to the point where, in consequence of the weakness that led M. de Charlus to forgive Morel any unseemliness in his attitude, the violinist did not try to conceal it, or even affected it. I have seen M. de Charlus, on entering a railway compartment where Charlie was sitting with some of his soldier friends, greeted by a shrug of the shoulders from the musician, accompanied by a wink to his comrades. Or else he would make out he was asleep, like someone overcome by boredom at this new arrival. Or he would start to cough, the others would laugh, jokingly adopt the mincing speech of men of M. de Charlus's kind, and draw Charlie into a corner, who finally returned, as though having been forced, next to M. de Charlus, whose heart had been pierced by all these arrows. It is inconceivable that he should have borne with them; and these ever-changing forms of suffering posed once again for M. de Charlus the problem of happiness, forced him not only to demand more, but to long for something other, the previous arrangement finding itself vitiated by an awful memory. Yet, however painful these scenes were afterwards to become, it has to be acknowledged that, in the early stages, the genius of the French man of the people traced for Morel, caused him to be clothed in, charming forms of simplicity, of apparent candour, of an independent pride even that seemed inspired by disinterestedness. This was false, but the advantage of such an attitude lay all the more with Morel inasmuch as, while the one who loves is forever obliged to return to the charge, to raise the bidding, it is, on the contrary, easy for the one who does not love to follow a straight line, at once inflexible and graceful. It existed by virtue of a racial privilege in the very open face of the same Morel whose heart was so tightly closed, a face embellished by that neo-Hellenic grace which flowers in the basilicas of Champagne. For all his simulated pride, often, on catching sight of M. de Charlus at a moment when he was not expecting it, he was embarrassed for the little clan's sake, blushed and looked down, to the great delight of the Baron, who read a whole novel into it. It was a sign merely of irritation and of shame. There were times when he gave vent to the first; for however calm and strenuously proper Morel's attitude might normally be, it did not go without being frequently belied. At times even, at some remark made to him by the Baron, there would burst from Morel, in a harsh voice, an insolent riposte by which everyone was shocked. M. de Charlus would lower his head, with a sad expression, without making any answer, and, with that ability which idolatrous fathers have of believing that their children's coldness or harshness has gone unnoticed, continued just the same to sing the violinist's praises. M. de Charlus was not always so submissive, but his rebellions generally failed to achieve their end, mainly because, having lived among society people, in calculating the reactions he might evoke, he made allowance for obsequiousness, if not inborn then acquired through upbringing. But, with Morel, he came up instead against some plebeian whim of momentary indifference. Alas for M. de Charlus, he had not understood that, so far as Morel was concerned, everything else took second place to matters where the Conservatoire and the Conservatoire's good reputation (though this, which was to become more serious, was not as yet an issue) were at stake. Thus does the bourgeoisie, for example, find it easy to change their names out of vanity, great noblemen for advantage. For the young violinist, on the contrary, the name of Morel was indissolubly linked to his first prize for violin, hence any modification was out of the question. M. de Charlus would have liked Morel to have everything from him, including his name. Having remarked that Morel's first name was Charles, which resembled Charlus, and that the property where they used to meet was called Les Charmes, he sought to persuade Morel that, a pretty name agreeable to pronounce being one half of an artistic reputation, the virtuoso should not hesitate to take the name of 'Charmel', a discreet allusion to the scene of their rendezvous. Morel gave a shrug. As a clinching argument, M. de Charlus had the unfortunate idea of adding that he had a manservant of that name. All this did was to arouse the young man to a furious indignation. 'There was a time when my forebears were proud of the title of valet de chambre, of maître d'hôtel to the King – There was another time, answered Morel haughtily, when my forebears cut the throats of yours.' M. de Charlus would have been greatly surprised had he been able to imagine that, failing 'Charmel', and resigned to adopting Morel and bestowing on him one of the Guermantes family titles that he had at his disposal, but which circumstances, as we shall see, did not permit him to offer the violinist, the latter might refuse, thinking of the artistic reputation attaching to his name of Morel and to the comments that would have been made 'in class'. So far above the Faubourg Saint-Germain did he set the rue Bergère! M. de Charlus had of necessity to content himself for the present with having symbolic rings made for Morel bearing the ancient inscription, PLUS ULTRA CAROL'S.[37] Certainly, faced by an adversary of a kind of which he had no experience, M. de Charlus ought to have changed his tactics. But who is capable of that? Moreover, if M. de Charlus had moments of awkwardness, so, equally, did Morel. Far more than the actual circumstance which brought about the rupture, what was, at least temporarily (but this temporary turned out to be final), to prove his undoing with M. de Charlus, was that there was in him not just the servility that made him grovel before any harshness and answer gentleness with insolence. Along with this servile nature there went a neurasthenia, made more complicated by his faulty upbringing, which, being aroused in circumstances where he was in the wrong or was becoming a responsibility, meant that, at the very moment when he would have needed all his kindness, all his gentleness, all his cheerfulness, to disarm the Baron, he became gloomy and quarrelsome, attempting to start arguments where he knew people did not agree with him and maintaining his own hostile point of view with a weakness of reasoning and a peremptory violence which even enhanced that weakness. For, soon running out of arguments, he would invent some nonetheless, in which he laid bare the full extent of his ignorance and stupidity. These scarcely showed through when he was being friendly and seeking only to please. Conversely, you saw nothing else during his fits of moroseness when, from having been inoffensive, they became hateful. M. de Charlus would then feel overcome and invest all his hopes in a better tomorrow, whereas Morel, forgetting that the Baron was keeping him in luxury, would give an ironic smile of pitying condescension, and say: 'I've never accepted anything from anybody. That way, I've no one I have to say a single thank you to.'

Meanwhile, and as if he were dealing with a man of the world, M. de Charlus continued to exercise his rages, whether genuine or feigned, but by now without effect. They were not always so, however. Thus one day (which belongs in fact after this early period), when the Baron was returning with Charlie and myself from a lunch at the Verdurins', and expecting to spend the late afternoon and evening with the violinist in Doncières, the latter's taking leave of him, the moment we left the train, with: 'No, I've got things to do,' caused so keen a disappointment in M. de Charlus that, although he may have tried to put a brave face on it, I saw tears melting the make-up on his eyelashes, as he remained bewildered in front of the train. Such was his grief that, since she and I were planning on ending the day in Doncières, I whispered to Albertine that I would certainly not like us to leave M. de Charlus on his own because he seemed, I had no idea why, unhappy. The dear child agreed with all her heart. I then asked M. de Charlus if he would not like me to accompany him for a little way. He, too, agreed, but refused to put my cousin to any trouble on that account. I derived a certain comfort (and no doubt for the last time, since I was resolved to break with her) from ordering her gently, as though she had been my wife: 'You go home in your direction, I'll see you again this evening,' and from hearing her, as a wife would have done, giving me permission to do as I wished, and agreeing that, if M. de Charlus, of whom she was very fond, had need of me, I should make myself available. We went, the Baron and I, he swaying his fat body, his Jesuit's eyes lowered, and I following, as far as a café, where they brought us some beer. I sensed that, in his anxiety, M. de Charlus had some plan in view. He suddenly demanded paper and ink, and began writing with a strange rapidity. As he covered sheet after sheet, his eyes were flashing with some furious daydream. Once he had written eight pages he said: 'Can I ask a great favour of you? Forgive my sealing this note. But I must. You are to take a cab, a motor-car if you can, to get there quicker. You'll certainly find Morel still in his room where he's gone to change. Poor boy, he tried to play the bully just as he was leaving us, but you may be sure that his heart is heavier than my own. You are to give him this note and, if he asks where you saw me, you will tell him that you stopped off in Doncières (which is in any case the truth) in order to see Robert (which is not, perhaps), but that you met me with someone you don't know, that I seemed to be in a furious temper, that you thought you caught something about sending seconds (I am fighting tomorrow, indeed). Above all, don't tell him that I'm asking for him, don't try to bring him back, but if he wants to come with you, don't stop him doing so. Off you go, my boy, it's for his own good, you may be averting a great drama. While you're gone, I shall write to my seconds. I have stopped you going off with your cousin. I hope she won't hold it against me, I believe so even. For hers is a noble soul and I know she's one of those women who know how not to overlook the greatness of the occasion. You must thank her on my behalf. I am personally indebted to her and it pleases me that it should be so.' I felt much pity for M. de Charlus; it seemed to me that Charlie might have prevented this duel, of which he was perhaps the cause, and I was revolted, were this the case, that he should have gone off so unfeelingly instead of assisting his patron. My indignation grew when, on arriving at the house where Morel was lodging, I recognized the violinist's voice, who, in the need he felt to broadcast his high spirits, was singing lustily: 'On Saturday evenings, after the weekly grind!'[38] If only poor M. de Charlus could have heard him, he who wanted you to believe, and himself believed no doubt, that Morel at this moment was heavy at heart! Charlie started jigging with delight when he saw me. 'Hello, mon vieux (forgive me calling you that, one picks up vile habits from this ghastly life in the Army), what a stroke of good luck, seeing you! I've got my evening to myself. Do please let's spend it together. We can stay here if you like that, we can take a boat out if you'd rather, we can have some music, I don't have any preference.' I told him that I was obliged to dine in Balbec, he was most anxious for me to invite him, but I refused. 'But if you're in such a hurry, why did you come? – I've brought you a note from M. de Charlus.' At that name, all his high spirits evaporated; his face contracted. 'What, he has to come pestering me even here! Then I'm a slave! Do me a kindness, mon vieux. I'm not opening the letter. You can tell him you couldn't find me. – Wouldn't you do better to open it? I imagine it's something serious. – No, a hundred times over, you don't know that old crook's lies, his infernal stratagems. It's a device to get me to go and see him. Well, I'm not going, I want a peaceful evening. – But isn't there a duel tomorrow, I asked Morel, whom I had supposed was in the know. – A duel? he said, looking stupefied. I've not heard a word about that. And anyway, I don't give a damn, that disgusting old man can happily go and get himself massacred if he wants. But hold on, you intrigue me, I'm going to take a look at his letter all the same. You can tell him you left it on the off-chance in case I came home.' As Morel was talking, I was gazing in amazement at the splendid books that M. de Charlus had given him and which were cluttering the room. The violinist having refused those that bore 'I belong to the Baron' and the like, a device that he found insulting to himself, as signifying possession, the Baron, with that sentimental ingenuity in which an unhappy love takes pleasure, had varied it by others, originating with his forebears, but ordered from the binder's according to the circumstances of a melancholy affection. Sometimes these were brief and confident, such as 'Spes mea' or 'Exspectata non eludet';[39] sometimes merely resigned, such as 'J'attendrai';[40] some were gallant: 'Mesmes plaisirs du mestre',[41] or recommending chastity, like that borrowed from the Simiane, semy of towers azure and fleurs-de-lis, and twisted as to its meaning: 'Sustentant lilia turres';[42] others finally, despairing and fixing a rendez-vous in Heaven with him who had wanted nothing to do with him on earth: 'Manet ultima caelo';[43] and, finding the bunch of grapes he had been unable to reach too green, and pretending not to have been seeking for what he had not obtained, in one of them M. de Charlus had said: 'Non mortale quod opto'.[44] But I did not have time to look at them all.

If, in dashing this letter down on paper, M. de Charlus seemed to have fallen prey to the demon of inspiration that was causing his pen to fly, the moment Morel had broken the seal, 'Atavis et armis',[45] charged with a leopard accompanied by two roses gules, he began to read with a feverishness as great as that which M. de Charlus had shown when writing, and his eyes travelled no less quickly across these hastily scrawled pages than had the Baron's pen. 'Oh, my God, he exclaimed, that's all it needed. But where can I find him? God knows where he is now.' I hinted that, by hurrying, he would still find him perhaps at a brasserie, where he had asked for beer in order to recompose himself. 'I don't know whether I'll be coming back,' he said to his housekeeper, and added in petto: 'It'll depend on how things turn out.' A few minutes later, we arrived at the café. I observed M. de Charlus's expression at the moment he caught sight of me. Finding that I had not returned alone, I had the feeling that breath, that life itself, had been restored to him. Being in a mood that evening not to be able to do without Morel, he had invented that it had been reported to him that two of the regimental officers had slandered him in connection with the violinist, and that he was going to send his seconds to them. Morel had glimpsed the scandal, his life in the regiment made impossible, and had come running. In which he was not altogether wrong. For, to make his falsehood more plausible, M. de Charlus had already written to two friends (one was Cottard) to ask them to be his seconds. And had the violinist not come, it is certain that, out of control as he was, M. de Charlus (to turn his unhappiness into rage) would have sent them at random to some officer or other, whom he would have found solace in fighting. In the meantime, M. de Charlus, reminding himself that he was of purer stock than the House of France, told himself that it was very good of him to be thus fretting and fuming for the son of a maître d'hôtel, with whose master he would not have deigned to associate. On the other hand, if he now took pleasure in consorting with hardly anyone except debauchees, the latter's ingrained habit of not answering letters and of failing to keep an assignation, without warning, and without apologizing afterwards, produced so many emotions in him, since a love affair was often involved, and the rest of the time caused him so much irritation, inconvenience and rage, that there were times when he felt nostalgia for the multiplicity of letters about nothing at all and the scrupulous exactitude of ambassadors and princes, who, though, sadly, they might have no attraction for him, yet afforded him a sort of respite. Accustomed to Morel's ways, and knowing how little hold he had over him and how incapable he was of insinuating himself into a life in which vulgar companionships, consecrated by habit, took up too much space and time for an hour to be set aside for the evicted, proud and vainly imploring nobleman, M. de Charlus was so convinced that the musician would not come, was so afraid of having caused a permanent rift between them by overstepping the mark, that it was all he could do to stifle a cry when he saw him. But feeling himself victorious, he insisted on dictating the peace terms and on himself extracting such advantages as he could. 'What have you come here for? he said. And you? he added, looking at me, I specifically told you not to bring me him back. – He didn't want to bring me,' said Morel, rolling towards M. de Charlus, in his artless coquettishness, conventionally sad and languorously old-fashioned glances, with an expression he no doubt thought irresistible, of wanting to kiss the Baron and longing to burst into tears. 'It's I who came in spite of him. I've come in the name of our friendship, to implore you on both knees not to commit this folly.' M. de Charlus was delirious with joy. The reaction was almost too much for his nerves; in spite of which he retained control of them. 'The friendship which you invoke somewhat inopportunely, he replied curtly, ought on the contrary to make you approve of me when I do not think I should allow the impertinences of a fool to go unchecked. In any case, if I wanted to obey the entreaties of an affection that I have known better inspired, it would no longer be in my power to do so, my letters to my seconds have gone and I don't doubt their accepting. You have always behaved towards me like a young imbecile and, instead of priding yourself, as you had a right to do, on the predilection I had shown you, instead of letting that rabble of non-commissioned officers and domestic servants amongst whom military law obliges you to live see what a source of incomparable pride a friendship such as mine was for you, you sought to apologize, to make a stupid virtue almost out of being insufficiently grateful. I know that in this, he added, so as not to let it be seen how deeply humiliated he had been by certain scenes, you are guilty only of allowing yourself to be led on by the jealousy of others. But how, at your age, can you be such a child (and a rather badly brought-up child) as not to have guessed straight away that your election by me and all the advantages that would result from it for you were going to stir up jealousy, that all your comrades, while they were egging you on to quarrel with me, would be working to take your place? I did not see fit to warn you of the letters I have received in that connection from all those whom you trust the most. I despise the overtures of these flunkeys just as I do their ineffectual mockery. The one person who concerns me is you, because I am very fond of you, but affection has its limits, as you should have suspected.' However harsh the word 'flunkey' might sound in the ears of Morel, whose father had been one, indeed precisely because his father had been one, the explanation of every social misadventure by 'jealousy', a simplistic and absurd explanation, yet hard-wearing and which, among a certain class, always 'takes', just as unfailingly as do old tricks of the trade with audiences in the theatre, or the threat of the clerical menace in political assemblies,[46] found almost as ready an acceptance with him as with Françoise or Mme de Guermantes's servants, for whom it was the one source of humanity's misfortunes. He did not doubt that his comrades had been trying to nab his place and was all the more unhappy about this calamitous, albeit imaginary duel. 'Oh, I despair! exclaimed Charlie. I shan't survive it. But aren't they to see you before they go and find this officer? – I don't know, I think so, yes. I sent to tell one of them I'd be remaining here this evening and I shall give him my instructions. – I hope between now and him coming to make you hear reason; just allow me to remain here with you,' Morel asked him fondly. This was all that M. de Charlus had wanted. He did not give in straight away. 'You'd be wrong to apply here the proverbial "Spare the rod and spoil the child", for it's you who are the child and I intend to use the rod, even after our quarrel, on those who tried despicably to do you harm. Up until now, to their prying insinuations, daring to ask me how a man like myself could consort with a gigolo of your sort, risen from nowhere, my one response was the motto of my La Rochefoucauld cousins, "C'est mon plaisir".[47] I have even stressed to you more than once that this pleasure was susceptible of becoming my greatest pleasure, without your arbitrary elevation resulting in my own abasement.' And in an almost insane impulse of pride, he exclaimed, raising his arms: 'Tantus ab uno splendor!'[48] To condescend is not to descend, he added, more calmly, after this delirium of pride and joy. I hope at least that my two adversaries, despite the inequality of rank, are of a blood that I can cause to flow without shame. I have made discreet enquiries in that regard which have reassured me. If you retained any gratitude to me, you ought on the contrary to be proud to see that, because of you, I am recovering the bellicose temperament of my forebears, saying like them, in the event of a fatal outcome, now that I have realized what a young rogue you are, "Mort m'est vie".'[49] And M. de Charlus spoke with sincerity, not only out of love for Morel, but because a liking for combat that he innocently believed he had got from his forefathers put him in such good heart at the thought of fighting that he would now have felt regret at giving up this duel, originally contrived only in order to get Morel to come. He had never had an affair of honour without at once seeing himself as valorous and identifying himself with the celebrated Connétable de Guermantes, whereas for anyone else this same act of taking the field would have seemed of the utmost insignificance. 'I think it'll be very beautiful, he said to us, with sincerity, intoning each word. To see Sarah Bernhardt in L'Aiglon, what is that? Excrement. Mounet-Sully in Oedipus?[50] Excrement. It acquires at most a certain pallor of transfiguration when it takes place in the Arena in Nîmes. But what is it compared with that unprecedented thing, of seeing the actual descendant of the Connétable do battle?' At the mere thought of which, M. de Charlus, unable to contain his delight, began to perform contre-de-quartes reminiscent of Molière,[51] leading us to move our beer-glasses closer for safety, and to fear that the first clash of blades might wound the adversaries, the doctor and the seconds. 'What a tempting spectacle it would be for a painter! You who know M. Elstir, he said to me, you should bring him along.' I replied that he was not on the coast. M. de Charlus hinted that he might be sent a telegram. 'Oh, I say that for his sake, he added, faced by my silence. It's always interesting for a master – in my opinion, he is one – to capture such an example of ethnic revivescence. There's perhaps only one a century.'

But if M. de Charlus was enchanted by the prospect of a fight that he had at first thought purely fictitious, Morel was reflecting in terror on the rumours which, thanks to the stir that the duel would make, might be hawked all the way from the regimental band to the temple in the rue Bergère. Already seeing his 'class' knowing everything, he became more and more insistent with M. de Charlus, who continued to gesticulate before the heady prospect of fighting. He implored the Baron to allow him not to leave him until the next day but one, the supposed day of the duel, so as to keep him in sight and try to make him hear the voice of reason. So affectionate a proposal overcame M. de Charlus's last hesitations. He said that he would try to find a way out, that he would defer a final decision until the next day but one. In this way, by not settling the matter all at once, M. de Charlus would be able to keep Charlie for two days at least and use them to obtain from him undertakings for the future in exchange for his giving up the duel, an exercise which in itself, he said, enchanted him, and which he would not forgo without regret. And in this, moreover, he was being sincere, for he had always found pleasure in taking the field when it was a matter of crossing steel or exchanging shots with an adversary. Cottard finally arrived although having been much delayed, for, overjoyed to be acting as a second but even more excited, he had been obliged to stop at every café and farmhouse along the way, asking whether they would be kind enough to direct him to 'No. 100' or the 'the smallest room'. The moment he was there, the Baron led him off into a room apart, for he thought it more in keeping with the rules that Charlie and I should not be present at their interview, and he excelled in the temporary appointment of some nondescript room as a throne-room or debating chamber. Once alone with Cottard, he thanked him warmly, but declared that it was likely that the remark retailed had not in actual fact been made, and that in these circumstances the Doctor might be so good as to warn the other second that, barring possible complications, the incident was considered as closed. The danger receding, Cottard was disappointed. He even wanted momentarily to display anger, but remembered that one of his mentors, who had enjoyed the most successful medical career of his day, having failed to get into the Académie the first time by only two votes, had put a brave face on things and gone to shake the hand of his successful rival. And so the Doctor dispensed with an expression of pique that would no longer have changed anything and, after muttering, he the most fearful of men, that there are some things that one cannot let pass, he added that it was better this way, that this solution delighted him. M. de Charlus, anxious to evince his gratitude to the Doctor, in the same way as M. le Duc his brother might have arranged the collar of my father's overcoat, or a duchess above all have put an arm round the waist of some woman of the people, brought his chair up close to that of the Doctor, in spite of the distaste with which the latter filled him. And not only without any physical pleasure, but overcoming a physical revulsion, as a Guermantes, not as an invert, in order to take leave of the Doctor he held his hand and stroked it for a moment, with the kindness of a master fondling the muzzle of his horse and giving it a lump of sugar. Cottard, however, who had never allowed the Baron to see that he had heard even the vaguest dark rumours circulating as to his habits, but nevertheless saw him, in his heart of hearts, as forming part of the class of the 'abnormal' (with his usual terminological impropriety, and in the most serious tone, he even used to say of one of M. Verdurin's manservants: 'Isn't he the Baron's mistress?'), persons of whom he had scant experience, imagined that this stroking of his hand was the immediate prelude to a rape, for the accomplishment of which, the duel having served merely as a pretext, he had been drawn into an ambush and led by the Baron into this lonely saloon, where he was about to be taken by force. Not daring to leave his chair, to which fear kept him rooted, he rolled his eyes in alarm, as though he had fallen into the hands of a savage whom he was not altogether certain might not feed off human flesh. Finally, M. de Charlus letting go his hand, and wishing to be affable to the bitter end: 'You'll take a little something with us, as they say, what in the old days was called a mazagran or a gloria,[52] drinks you now meet with, except as archaeological curiosities, only in the plays of Labiche and the cafés of Doncières. A "gloria" would be quite appropriate to the setting, would it not? And to the occasion, what d'you say? – I am President of the Anti-Alcohol League, replied Cottard. It would only need some provincial quack to come past, for them to say I don't practise what I preach. Os homini sublime dedit caelumque tueri',[53] he added, although there was no connection, but because his stock of Latin quotations was somewhat meagre, if adequate for impressing his students. M. de Charlus gave a shrug and brought Cottard back to us, having demanded from him a confidentiality that mattered all the more to him inasmuch as, the motive for the abortive duel being purely imaginary, it had to be prevented from reaching the ears of the officer thus arbitrarily accused. As we were all four of us drinking, Mme Cottard, who had been waiting for her husband outside, in front of the door, and whom M. de Charlus had certainly seen, but had not troubled to bring in, entered and bid the Baron good day, who held out his hand to her as if to a chambermaid, without moving from his chair, partly as a king receiving homage, partly as a snob who does not want a less than fashionable woman to sit down at his table, partly as an egotist who takes pleasure in being alone with his friends and does not wish to be intruded on. Mme Cottard remained standing therefore, talking to M. de Charlus and her husband. But perhaps because politeness, the 'done thing', is not the exclusive privilege of the Guermantes, but may suddenly illuminate and guide the most uncertain brains, or because, having frequently been unfaithful to his wife, there were moments when Cottard, by a sort of requital, felt the need to protect her against whoever was being disrespectful to her, the Doctor suddenly gave a frown, something that I had never seen him do, and without consulting M. de Charlus, magisterially: 'Come, Léontine, don't stay standing up, sit down. – But am I not disturbing you?' Mme Cottard asked M. de Charlus timidly, who, taken aback by the Doctor's tone, had made no answer. And, not allowing him a second opportunity, Cottard went on authoritatively: 'I told you to sit down.'

A moment or two later, we broke up and then M. de Charlus said to Morel: 'I conclude from this whole business, which has ended better than you deserved, that you do not know how to conduct yourself, and that at the end of your military service I shall take you back myself to your father, as did the Archangel Raphael, sent by God to the young Tobias.'[54] And the Baron began to smile with an air of grandeur, and a delight that Morel, who found scant pleasure in the prospect of being thus taken home, did not seem to share. In the headiness of likening himself to the Archangel, and Morel to the son of Tobit, M. de Charlus had lost sight of the object of his remark, which had been to test the ground to learn whether, as he wanted, Morel would consent to go with him to Paris. Intoxicated by his love, or by his vanity, the Baron did not see, or pretended not to see, the face that the violinist pulled, for, having left the latter on his own in the café, he said to me with an arrogant smile: 'Did you notice, when I compared him to the son of Tobit, how delirious with joy he was? That's because, highly intelligent as he is, he realized at once that the Father with whom he was going henceforth to live, was not his father according to the flesh, who must be some frightful moustachioed manservant, but his spiritual father, that is to say Myself. How glorious for him! How proudly he drew back his head! What joy he felt at having realized! I'm sure he'll repeat every day: "O God who didst give the blessed Archangel Raphael to be a guide to Thy servant Tobias on a long journey, grant to us, Thy servants, that we may be always protected by him and armed with his succour." I had no need even, added the Baron, strongly persuaded that he would one day sit before the Throne of God, to tell him that I was the heavenly messenger, he realized that for himself and was speechless with happiness!' And M. de Charlus (who, on the contrary, had not been deprived of the power of speech by happiness), unconcerned by the few passers-by who looked round, thinking they had a lunatic on their hands, exclaimed all alone and at the top of his voice, raising his hands, 'Alleluia!'

This reconciliation put an end to M. de Charlus's torments only for a time; often Morel, having left on manoeuvres, too far away for M. de Charlus to be able to go and visit him, or send me to talk to him, would write the Baron fond and despairing letters, in which he assured him that he would have to put an end to his life because some frightful affair meant that he needed twenty-five thousand francs. He did not say what the frightful affair was, and had he done so, it would no doubt have been a fabrication. As for the money itself, M. de Charlus would willingly have sent it had he not felt that this would have provided Charlie with the means of dispensing with him and also of enjoying the favours of someone else. Thus he refused, and his telegrams had the curt, sharp-edged tone of his voice. Once he was certain of their effect, he wished that Morel might have fallen out with him for good, for, convinced that it was the opposite that would materialize, he was made aware of all the disadvantages that would be reborn from this inevitable liaison. But if no reply came from Morel, he could no longer sleep, he no longer knew a moment's peace of mind, so many in number indeed are the things that we experience without knowing them, and the profound inner realities that remain hidden from us. He then entertained all manner of suppositions as to the enormity which had led to Morel having need of twenty-five thousand francs, he made it take every form and attached many proper names to it one after the other. I believe that at such moments, M. de Charlus (and although by that time his snobbery was on the decline, and had already been caught up, if not overtaken, by the growing curiosity the Baron felt towards the common people) must have recalled with a certain nostalgia the graceful, variegated whirl of social gatherings at which the most charming men and women sought him out only for the disinterested pleasure that he afforded them, and where no one would have dreamed of 'taking him for a ride', or of inventing some 'frightful affair' for which one is ready to put an end to one's days unless one is in immediate receipt of twenty-five thousand francs. I believe that, and perhaps because he had all the same remained more a man of Combray than had I, and had grafted a feudal pride on to German arrogance, he must then have discovered that you do not become the fancy man of a domestic servant with impunity, that the common people are not quite the same thing as society, and 'did not have confidence' in the people as I myself always have.

The little train's next stop, Maineville, reminds me indeed of an incident relating to Morel and M. de Charlus. Before speaking of it, I ought to say that the stop in Maineville (when you were conducting a fashionable new arrival to Balbec who, so as not to be in the way, preferred not to stay at La Raspelière) was the occasion of scenes less painful than the one that I shall recount in a moment. The new arrival, having his hand baggage in the train, generally found the Grand-Hôtel rather too far away, but since, before Balbec, there were only small beach resorts with uncomfortable villas, he had, out of a taste for luxury and well-being, resigned himself to the long journey when, just as the train came to a stop in Maineville, he saw, suddenly looming up, the Palace, which he could not have suspected was a house of prostitution. 'Don't let's go any further, he would invariably say to Mme Cottard, a woman known for being of a practical bent and for her sound advice. That's exactly what I need. What's the point of going all the way to Balbec, where it certainly won't be any better? Simply from the look of it, I adjudge it'll have every comfort; I could perfectly well bring Mme Verdurin there, for, in return for her civility, I count on giving a few small gatherings in her honour. She won't have so far to travel as if I stay in Balbec. This strikes me as exactly right for her, and for your wife, my dear Professor. They must have private rooms, we'll bring the ladies here. Between ourselves, I don't know why, instead of leasing La Raspelière, Mme Verdurin didn't come and live here. It's a lot healthier than old houses like La Raspelière, which is bound to be damp, without being clean for that matter; they don't have hot water, one can't wash as one would like to. Maineville strikes me as far pleasanter. Mme Verdurin could have played her role of Patronne there to perfection. Everyone to his own taste anyway, I shall establish myself here, Madame Cottard, will you not alight with me? Wasting no time, for it won't be long before the train leaves again. You must pilot me into the establishment, which will be yours and which you must have often frequented. It's a setting simply made for you.' We had the utmost difficulty in silencing the luckless newcomer and above all in preventing him from alighting, for, with the obstinacy that often emanates from a gaffe, he would insist, would pick up his suitcases and refuse to hear another word until he had been assured that neither Mme Verdurin nor Mme Cottard would come and visit him there. 'At all events, I shall elect domicile there. Mme Verdurin will only have to write to me there.'

The recollection concerning Morel relates to an incident of a more particular order. There were others, but I shall content myself here, as the 'meanderer' comes to a halt and the porter shouts out Doncières, Grattevast,[55] Maineville, etc., with noting what the small beach resort or garrison evokes for me. I have already spoken of Maineville (media villa) and of the importance it had acquired on account of the sumptuous house of prostitution that had recently been constructed there, not without exciting futile protests from the mothers. But before saying how Maineville comes to be linked in my memory to Morel and M. de Charlus, I must note the disproportion (which I shall have to go into more thoroughly later) between the importance that Morel attached to keeping certain hours free and the insignificance of the occupations to which he claimed to devote them, this same disproportion being found again amidst the explanations of another kind that he gave to M. de Charlus. He, who played at being disinterested with the Baron (and could do so without risk, given his patron's generosity), when he wanted to have the evening to himself, in order to give a lesson, and so on, did not fail to add to his excuse these words, spoken with an avaricious smile: 'Besides, it may earn me forty francs. That's not nothing. Allow me to go there, because you can see it's in my interest. I mean, I don't have a private income like you, I've a position to make, it's time to be earning a few sous.' In wanting to give his lesson, Morel was not being altogether insincere. For one thing, to say that money has no colour is untrue. A new means of earning it can make coins grown dull with use shine like new. Had he really gone out for the sake of a lesson, it is possible that two louis handed him on leaving by a pupil would have affected him differently from two louis fallen from the hand of M. de Charlus. And then the wealthiest of men would journey miles for the sake of two louis, which become leagues when you are the son of a manservant. But M. de Charlus often had his doubts as to the reality of the violin lesson, made all the stronger by the fact that the musician often invoked pretexts of another kind, of an entirely disinterested order materially speaking, and in any case absurd. Morel could thus not help presenting a picture of his life, but intentionally, as well as unintentionally, of such murkiness that certain bits of it alone let themselves be clearly seen. For a whole month, he placed himself at M. de Charlus's disposal on condition that he had his evenings free, for he wanted to keep up with a course of lectures on algebra. Come and see M. de Charlus afterwards? Ah, that was impossible, the lectures sometimes went on very late. 'Past two in the morning even? asked the Baron. – Sometimes. – But you can learn algebra just as easily from a book. – Even more easily, because I don't understand much at the lectures. – Well then? Anyway, algebra's not going to be of any use to you. – I love it. It drives away my neurasthenia.' 'It can't be algebra which makes him ask for leave at nights, M. de Charlus said to himself. Can he be attached to the police?' At all events, Morel, whatever objections might be raised, reserved certain late hours, whether on account of the algebra or of the violin. On one occasion, it was neither one nor the other, but the Prince de Guermantes who, having come to spend a few days on the coast to pay a visit to the Duchess of Luxembourg, encountered the musician, without knowing who he was and without being known to him, and offered him fifty francs to spend the night together at the house of prostitution in Maineville; a twofold pleasure, where Morel was concerned, of the profit he would make out of M. de Guermantes and the voluptuousness of being surrounded by women whose dark-skinned breasts were displayed quite openly. Somehow or other, M. de Charlus had an idea of what had transpired and where, but not of the seducer. Frantic with jealousy, and to know who this latter was, he telegraphed to Jupien, who arrived two days later, and when, at the beginning of the following week, Morel announced that he would again be absent, the Baron asked Jupien if he would undertake to bribe the madam of the establishment and arrange that Jupien and he be hidden in order to witness the scene. 'Understood. Leave it to me, my little charmer,' Jupien replied to the Baron. It is hard to credit the extent to which his anxiety had disturbed, and by the same token had even momentarily enriched, M. de Charlus's mind. Love causes these veritable geological upheavals in our thoughts. In those of M. de Charlus, which, a few days before, had resembled a plain so smooth that, away into the distance, he would not have been able to spot an idea lying on the surface, there had abruptly arisen, hard as stone, a mountain massif, but of mountains so sculpted it was as if some statuary, instead of carrying the marble away, had carved it where it lay, and where there writhed, in giant, titanic groups, Fury, Jealousy, Curiosity, Envy, Hatred, Suffering, Pride, Terror and Love.

The evening on which Morel was to be absent had meanwhile arrived. Jupien's mission had been successful. He and the Baron were to go there around eleven o'clock at night and they would be hidden. Three streets before reaching this magnificent house of prostitution (to which they came from all the fashionable places round about), M. de Charlus was walking on tiptoe, disguising his voice and begging Jupien to lower his voice, in case Morel should hear them from inside. But, the moment he made his stealthy entrance into the hallway, M. de Charlus, who had little experience of places of this sort, found himself, to his terror and amazement, in a place noisier than the Bourse or the Hôtel des Ventes.[56] It was in vain that he recommended the soubrettes who were crowding round him to talk more quietly; their voices were being drowned in any case by the noise of lots being cried and knocked down, made by an old sous-maîtresse,[57] with a very dark wig and a face creased with the gravity of a lawyer or a Spanish priest, and who, with a noise like thunder, was forever coming out, as she allowed doors to be alternately opened and closed again, like someone controlling the traffic, with: 'Put Monsieur in No. 28, in the Spanish room.' 'No more to go in.' 'Open the door again, these gentlemen are asking for Mlle Noémie. She's waiting for them in the Persian saloon.' M. de Charlus was as terrified as a provincial having to cross the boulevards; and, to choose a comparison infinitely less sacrilegious than the subject portrayed on the capitals in the porch of the old church in Couliville, the voices of the young maids tirelessly repeated, in a lower register, the sous-maîtresse's orders, like the catechisms you can hear schoolchildren chanting in the sonority of a country church. Alarmed though he was, M. de Charlus, who, in the street, had been fearful of being overheard, having persuaded himself that Morel was at the window, was perhaps less frightened even so amidst the bellowing on these immense staircases, where you realized that from the bedrooms nothing could be seen. Finally, his calvary at an end, he found Mlle Noémie, who was to hide him together with Jupien, but who began by shutting him in a very sumptuous Persian saloon from where he could see nothing. She told him that Morel had asked for a drink of orangeade and that as soon as he had been served it, the two travellers would be taken into a viewing room. Meanwhile, since she was being asked for, she promised them, like in a folk-tale, that to help them pass the time, she would send them in 'an intelligent little lady'. For she herself was being sent for. The intelligent little lady wore a Persian wrap which she wanted to take off. M. de Charlus asked her to do nothing of the sort, and she had champagne brought up that cost forty francs a bottle. In point of fact, during this time, Morel was with the Prince de Guermantes; he had, for form's sake, made a pretence of mistaking the room, and had gone into one in which there were two women, who had made haste to leave the two gentlemen to themselves. M. de Charlus knew nothing of all this, but was cursing and trying to open doors, and he asked for Mlle Noémie again, who, having overheard the intelligent little lady giving M. de Charlus details concerning Morel that did not accord with those that she herself had given Jupien, sent her packing and quickly sent in, as a replacement for the intelligent little lady, 'a nice little lady', who did not show them anything either, but told them what a responsible establishment it was and likewise asked for champagne. The Baron, fuming, got Mlle Noémie back once more, who told them: 'Yes, it's a bit long-winded, the ladies are adopting poses, he doesn't look as though he wants to do anything. At last, faced by the Baron's promises, and his threats, Mlle Noémie went off looking annoyed, assuring them they would not have to wait more than another five minutes. These five minutes lasted for an hour, after which Noémie led a M. de Charlus mad with rage and a despondent Jupien stealthily towards a door that was ajar, telling them: 'You'll have a very good view. On the other hand, it's not very interesting at present, he's with three ladies, he's telling them about his life in the Army.' Finally, the Baron was able to see through the gap in the door, as well as in the mirrors. But a mortal terror forced him to lean against the wall. It was indeed Morel that he had before him but, as though the pagan mysteries and enchantments still existed, it was the shade of Morel rather, Morel embalmed, not even Morel resuscitated like Lazarus, an apparition of Morel, a spectral Morel, Morel revenant or conjured up in this room (where the walls and divans everywhere repeated emblems of sorcery), who was a few metres away from him, in profile. Morel was, as after death, drained of colour; between the women, with whom it seemed he should have been disporting himself joyously, livid, he remained frozen in an artificial immobility; in order to drink the goblet of champagne that stood in front of him, his lifeless arm tried slowly to reach out and fell back. You got the impression of that equivocation where a religion talks of immortality, but means by it something that does not exclude nothingness. The women were plying him with questions: 'You see, said Mlle Noémie in a low voice to the Baron, they're talking to him about his life in the Army, amusing, isn't it? – and she laughed – are you satisfied? He's peaceful, isn't he?' she added, as she might have said of a dying man. The women plied him with questions but Morel, inanimate, did not have the strength to answer them. The miracle of even one murmured word did not occur. M. de Charlus knew only a moment's hesitation before grasping the truth, that, whether it was Jupien's gaucheness when going to make the arrangements, or the potentiality of secrets to expand once confided, which means that they are never kept, or the indiscreet natures of the women, or fear of the police, Morel had been warned that two gentlemen had paid a lot of money in order to watch him, and they had brought out the Prince de Guermantes metamorphosed into three women, and so positioned poor Morel, quaking and paralysed by stupefaction, that, if M. de Charlus could see him only with difficulty, he, terror-stricken, incapable of speech, not daring to pick up his glass for fear of dropping it, had a clear view of the Baron.

Nor did the story end any more happily for the Prince de Guermantes. When he had been made to leave so that M. de Charlus might not see him, furious at this setback, but unsuspecting of who was behind it, he had pleaded with Morel, though still unwilling to let him know who he was, to fix a rendezvous for the following night in a small villa that he had rented and which, despite the short time he would be staying there, he had, in accordance with the same obsessive habit as we have earlier remarked in Mme de Villeparisis, decorated with a number of family mementos, so as to feel more at home. The next day, therefore, Morel, looking behind him the whole time, fearful of being followed and spied on by M. de Charlus, had finally, not having observed any suspicious passers-by, entered the villa. A valet showed him into the drawing-room, saying that he would go and inform Monsieur (his master had warned him not to utter the word 'Prince' for fear of arousing suspicion). But once Morel found himself alone and wanted to look in the mirror, to see whether his lock of hair might have been disarranged, it was like a hallucination. On the mantelpiece, the photographs, recognizable to the violinist, he having seen them at M. de Charlus's, of the Princesse de Guermantes, the Duchess of Luxembourg and Mme de Villeparisis, petrified him at first with fright. At the same moment, he caught sight of that of M. de Charlus, which stood a little further back. The Baron seemed to have immobilized Morel with a strange, fixed stare. Wild with terror, Morel, recovering from his initial stupefaction, and not doubting that this was an ambush into which M. de Charlus had led him as a test of his fidelity, tumbled down the villa's few steps four at a time, and began running as fast as his legs could carry him along the road, so that when the Prince de Guermantes (after believing that he had made this passing acquaintance serve his period of probation, and not without wondering whether it was altogether wise and whether the individual in question might not be dangerous) entered the drawing-room, he found no one there any longer. In vain did he explore with his valet and, for fear of burglars, revolver in hand, the whole house, which was not large, every corner of the little garden and the basement, the companion whose presence he had thought certain had vanished. He came across him several times in the course of the following week. But each time it was Morel, the dangerous individual, who ran off, as if the Prince had been more dangerous still. Immovable in his suspicions, Morel never dispelled them, and even in Paris the sight of the Prince de Guermantes was enough to cause him to turn tail. Whereby M. de Charlus was protected against an infidelity that made him despair, and avenged, without ever having imagined it, or above all in what way.

But already the memories of what had been retailed to me on this matter are being replaced by others, for the T.S.N., resuming its snail-like progress, is continuing to set down and pick up passengers at the next stations.

At Grattevast, where his sister lived, with whom he had gone to spend the afternoon, there sometimes got in M. Pierre de Verjus, Comte de Crécy (who was known simply as the Comte de Crécy), a poor but extremely distinguished member of the gentry whom I had met through the Cambremers, with whom, however, he was by no means intimate. As he was reduced to an exceedingly modest, almost impoverished, way of life, I felt that a cigar and a 'glass of something' were things so agreeable to him that I acquired the habit, on the days when I was unable to meet Albertine, of inviting him to Balbec. Very discerning, expressing himself beautifully, his hair quite white, with charming blue eyes, he talked above all, in an artificial way, very tactfully, about the comforts of the seigneurial life, which he had evidently known, as well as about genealogies. When I asked him what was engraved on his ring, he told me, smiling modestly: 'It's a sprig of verjuice.' And he added with the pleasure of a wine-taster: 'Our arms are a branch of verjuice – symbolic since my name is Verjus – stalked and foliated vert.' But I fancy he would have felt disappointment if, in Balbec, I had offered him only verjuice to drink. He liked the most expensive wines, from deprivation no doubt, and a profound knowledge of what he had been deprived of, from taste, perhaps also from a propensity for exaggeration. Thus, when I invited him to dinner in Balbec, he would order the meal with a knowledgeable refinement, but ate rather too much, and above all drank, making them serve the wines that need it at room temperature, and chill those that demand to be put on ice. Before dinner and after, he would indicate the date or the number he wanted for a port or a fine, as he might have done for the generally unknown raising of a marquisate, with which he was also familiar.

As I was for Aimé a favourite guest, he was overjoyed that I should be giving these extra dinners and would shout to the waiters: 'Quick, get table 25 ready'; he did not say 'get' even but 'get me', as though it had been for him. And since the language of maîtres d'hôtel is not altogether the same as that of chefs de rang, demi-chefs, commis and so on, just as I was asking for the bill, he would say to the waiter who had been serving us, with a repeated, soothing gesture with the back of his hand, as though he were trying to quieten a horse preparing to take the bit between its teeth: 'Don't rush things (over the bill), gently, very gently does it.' Then, as the waiter went off, armed with this aide-mémoire, Aimé, fearing that his injunctions might not be strictly adhered to, called him back: 'Wait, I'm going to reckon it up myself.' And as I was telling him that it was no matter: 'I hold it as a principle that, in the common parlance, one mustn't fleece a guest.' As for the manager, seeing my guest's simple clothes, always the same and somewhat threadbare (yet no one would have been more adept at the art of dressing ostentatiously, like one of Balzac's dandies, had he had the means), he contented himself, on my account, with inspecting from a distance to see that everything was in order, and by a glance, getting a wedge set beneath one of the legs of the table which was not level. It was not that he would have been unable, although he had concealed his origins as a dishwasher, to lend a hand like anyone else. It required some exceptional circumstance, however, for him one day to carve the guinea-fowls himself. I had gone out but I learned that he had done so with a sacerdotal majesty, surrounded, at a respectful distance from the sideboard, by a ring of waiters less intent on learning thereby than on letting themselves be seen, and who appeared vacuously admiring. Seen, however, by the manager (plunging with a slow gesture into the flanks of his victims, and no more removing from them eyes imbued with his high office than if an augury were to be read there), they were not. The sacrificer did not even remark my own absence. When he learned of it, he was desolate. 'What, you didn't see me carve the guinea-fowls myself?' I replied that, having not been able thus far to see Rome, Venice, Siena, the Prado, the Dresden museum, India, or Sarah in Phèdre, I knew all about resignation and that I would add his carving of the guinea-fowls to my list. The comparison with the dramatic art (Sarah in Phèdre) was the only one he appeared to understand, for he knew through me that, on days of gala performances, the elder Coquelin[58] had accepted beginners' roles, even that of a character who has only one line or no lines at all. 'It's no matter, I'm distressed for your sake. When shall I carve again? It would require an event, it would require a war.' (It required in fact the Armistice.) From that day forward, the calendar was changed, and was reckoned thus: 'It was the day after the day when I carved the guinea-fowls myself.' 'It was a week to the day after the manager carved the guinea-fowls himself.' This prosectomy thus provided, like the birth of Christ or the Hegira, the starting-point for a calendar different from the others, but which did not achieve their extension nor match their duration.

The sadness of M. de Crécy's life derived, equally as much as from his no longer keeping horses or a succulent table, from rubbing shoulders only with people capable of believing that Cambremer and Guermantes were all one. When he found that I knew that Legrandin, who now styled himself Legrand de Méséglise, had no sort of title to it, and being inflamed moreover by the wine he was drinking, he experienced a sort of transport of delight. His sister used to say to me with a knowing look: 'My brother's never so happy as when he can talk with you.' He had felt himself to exist indeed since discovering someone who knew how second-rate the Cambremers were, and how grand the Guermantes, someone for whom the social world existed. Just so, following a conflagration of all the libraries on the globe, and the rise of a wholly ignorant race, might an old Latinist regain his footing and his trust in life on hearing someone quote him a line from Horace. And so, if he never left the compartment without saying to me: 'When's our next little get-together to be?', it was as much from the gourmandise of a scholar as the avidity of a parasite, and because he saw these Balbec agapes as an opportunity to talk, at the same time, about subjects close to his heart that he could not talk about with anyone else, and analogous in this to the dinners at which the Société des Bibliophiles gathers, on certain fixed dates, at the especially succulent board of the Cercle de l'Union.[59] Very unassuming where his own family was concerned, it was not through M. de Crécy that I learned that it was very grand and a genuine offshoot in France of the English family that bears the title of Crécy. When I learned that he was a true Crécy, I told him that a niece of Mme de Guermantes had married an American by the name of Charles Crécy and said that I supposed there was no connection with himself. 'None, he said. Any more than – though my family's not so very illustrious in any case – the many Americans calling themselves Montgommery, Berry, Chandos or Capel have any connection with the families of Pembroke, Buckingham or Essex, or with the Duc de Berry.'[60] I thought several times of telling him, to amuse him, that I had known Mme Swann who, as a cocotte, had gone in the old days under the name of Odette de Crécy; but although the Duc d'Alençon may not have taken offence had anyone spoken of Emilienne d'Alençon,[61] I did not feel sufficiently well in with M. de Crécy to carry the joke as far as that. 'He comes from a very great family, M. de Montsurvent said to me one day. His patronymic is Saylor.' And he added that on his old castel above Incarville, grown all but uninhabitable in fact and which, although born very wealthy, he was today too penniless to repair, there could still be read his family's ancient motto. I thought this motto very fine, whether it be applied to the impatience of a predatory race perched in that eyrie from which they must once have taken flight, or, today, to the contemplation of its decline, and the anticipation of impending death in that savage and imposing retreat. It is in this double sense indeed that the motto makes play with the name of Saylor: 'Ne sçais l'heure.'[62]

At Hermonville M. de Chevregny sometimes got in, whose name, Brichot told us, signified, like that of Mgr de Cabrières, 'a place where goats gather'. He was related to the Cambremers, on which account, and out of a false appreciation of what was fashionable, the latter frequently invited him to Féterne, but only when they had no guests to dazzle. Living all year round at Beausoleil, M. de Chevregny had remained more provincial than they were. Thus, when he went to spend a few weeks in Paris, there was not a single day to be wasted, on account of 'all there was to see'; to the point where, at times, a little dazed by the number of spectacles too rapidly digested, when he was asked whether he had seen a certain play, it happened that he was no longer quite sure. But this vagueness was rare, for he had that detailed knowledge of things Parisian peculiar to the people who rarely go there. He recommended to me the 'new things' to go and see ('It's worth the effort'), regarding them on the other hand purely from the point of view of the pleasant evening they enabled you to spend, and ignoring the aesthetic point of view to the point of not even suspecting that they might in fact constitute a 'new thing' in the history of art. Thus, speaking of everything on the same plane, he would say: 'We went once to the Opéra-Comique, but the show isn't up to much. It's called Pelléas et Mélisande. It's insignificant. Périer[63] is always good, but you'd do better to see him in something else. On the other hand, at the Gymnase, they're doing La Châtelaine.[64] We went back twice; don't fail to go, it's worth seeing; and then the acting is a joy; you've got Frévalles, Marie Magnier, Baron fils;[65] he even quoted the names of actors to me that I had never heard spoken, and without preceding them by Monsieur, Madame or Mademoiselle, as the Duc de Guermantes would have done, who referred in the same ceremoniously contemptuous tone to the 'songs of Mademoiselle Yvette Guilbert'[66] and 'the experiments of Monsieur Charcot'. That was not M. de Chevregny's way, he said Cornaglia and Dehelly[67] as he might have said Voltaire and Montesquieu. For with him, in respect of actors as of everything to do with Paris, the aristocrat's desire to display his contempt came second to the provincial man's desire to show familiarity.

Straight after the first dinner-party that I had been to at La Raspelière, with what was still referred to at Féterne as 'the young couple', although M. and Mme Cambremer were no longer, far from it, in the first flush of youth, the old Marquise had written me one of those letters whose style you could have picked out from among thousands. It said: 'Bring your delightful – charming – agreeable cousin. It will be an enchantment, a pleasure', always failing so infallibly to achieve the progression anticipated by whoever received the letter that I ended by altering my opinion as to the nature of these diminuendos, believing them now to be deliberate, and finding in them the same depravation of taste – transposed into the social order – that drove Sainte-Beuve to break all the alliances between words and to alter any expression that was in the least usual. Two methods, taught no doubt by different teachers, were contrasted in this epistolary style, the second of them leading Mme de Cambremer to redeem the banality of her multiple adjectives by employing them on a descending scale and avoiding ending on a common chord. On the other hand, I tended to see in these inverse gradations, no longer refinement, as when they were the work of the dowager Marquise, but awkwardness, every time they were employed by her son the Marquis or by her cousins. For throughout the family, to quite a remote degree and in admiring imitation of Aunt Zélia, the three-adjective rule was held in high esteem, as was a certain enthusiastic way of catching your breath when speaking. An imitation that had passed into the blood, what was more; when in the family, a girl, from childhood on, broke off from speaking to swallow her saliva, they would say: 'She takes after Aunt Zélia', and felt that later on her lips would quite soon tend to be shadowed by a faint moustache and promised themselves they would cultivate the aptitude that she must show for music. It was not long before the Cambremers' relations with Mme Verdurin were less ideal than with myself, for various reasons. They wanted to invite her. The 'young' Marquise said to me contemptuously: 'I don't see why we shouldn't invite the woman; you can see anyone at all in the country, it doesn't lead to anything.' But somewhat impressed deep down, they never ceased consulting me as to the manner in which they should realize their desire to be polite. As they had invited us, Albertine and me, to dinner, with some friends of Saint-Loup's, fashionable people from the region, the owners of the château in Gourville, who represented rather more than the cream of Norman society, to which Mme Verdurin, without appearing to touch it, was partial, I advised the Cambremers to invite the Patronne at the same time. But the châtelains of Féterne, from fear (so timid were they) of upsetting their noble friends, or (so naïve were they) of M. and Mme Verdurin being bored by people who were not intellectuals, or again (so impregnated were they by a spirit of routine that experience had not fertilized) of mixing kinds and 'putting their foot in it', declared that they would not go together, that they would not 'hit it off', and that it would be better to keep Mme Verdurin (who would be invited with all her little group) in reserve for another dinner-party. For the next one – the fashionable one, with Saint-Loup's friends – they invited only Morel from the little nucleus, so that M. de Charlus might be informed indirectly of the brilliant people whom they entertained, and also so that the musician might be a source of entertainment for the guests, for he would be asked to bring his violin. To him they added Cottard, because M. de Cambremer declared that he was a livewire and 'an asset' at a dinner-party; besides, it might prove convenient to be on good terms with a doctor should they ever have someone who was ill. But he was asked on his own, so as 'not to start anything with the wife'. Mme Verdurin was outraged when she learned that two members of the little group had been invited without her to an 'informal dinner' at Féterne. She dictated to the Doctor, whose first instinct had been to accept, a haughty reply, in which he said: 'We are dining that evening at Mme Verdurin's', a plural intended as a lesson to the Cambremers and to show them he was not separable from Mme Cottard. As for Morel, Mme Verdurin had no need to trace out an impolite course of action for him, he adopted one spontaneously, and for the following reason. If, in regard to M. de Charlus, and where his pleasures were concerned, he enjoyed an independence that saddened the Baron, we have seen that the latter's influence made itself felt more in other spheres, that he had, for example, broadened the virtuoso's musical knowledge and purified his style. But, at this point in our story at least, it was still only an influence. There was one terrain on the other hand where what M. de Charlus said was believed and acted on blindly by Morel. Blindly and crazily, for not only were M. de Charlus's teachings false, but, even had they been valid for a great nobleman, as applied to the letter by Morel they became ludicrous. The terrain on which Morel had become so credulous and so easily led by his mentor, was that of society. The violinist, who, before he met M. de Charlus, had had no notion of society, had taken literally the arrogant and summary sketch-map of it drawn for him by the Baron: 'There are a certain number of preponderant families, M. de Charlus had told him, the Guermantes above all, who can count fourteen alliances with the House of France, which is flattering mainly in fact for the House of France, moreover, for it was to Aldonce de Guermantes and not to Louis the Fat, his younger half-brother, that the throne of France should have passed.[68] Under Louis XIV, we wore black at the death of Monsieur, as having the same grandmother as the King. Far beneath the Guermantes, one can nevertheless cite the La Tremoïlles, descendants of the Kings of Naples and the Comtes de Poitiers;[69] the d'Uzès,[70] far from ancient as a family but the most ancient peers; the Luynes,[71] altogether recent, but with the distinction of great alliances; the Choiseuls, the Harcourts, the La Rochefoucaulds.[72] Add the Noailles, despite the Comte de Toulouse, the Montesquious, the Castellanes[73] and, barring some oversight, that's all. As for all those nobodies who call themselves the Marquis de Cambremerde or de Vatefairefiche,[74] there's no difference between them and the meanest private in your regiment. Whether you go and piss at the Comtesse Shit's, or shit at the Comtesse Piss's, it's the same thing, you'll have risked your reputation and used a brown-stained rag as toilet paper. Which is unhygienic.' Morel had piously taken in this perhaps somewhat cursory history lesson; he judged things as if he were himself a Guermantes and hoped for an opportunity of finding himself with the false La Tour d'Auvergnes so that he could let them see, by a contemptuous shake of the hand, that he hardly took them seriously. As for the Cambremers, he could show them here and now that they were 'no better than the meanest private in his regiment'. He did not reply to their invitation, and on the evening of the dinner begged off at the very last moment by telegram, as overjoyed as if he had just behaved like a prince of the blood. It must be added, however, that one cannot imagine just how, in a more general way, unbearable, niggling and even, he who was so discerning, stupid M. de Charlus could be, on all those occasions when the defects of his character came into play. It can be said indeed that these are like an intermittent sickness of the mind. Who has not observed this fact with women, or even with men, endowed with a remarkable intelligence, but afflicted by nervousness? When they are happy, at peace, satisfied by their surroundings, they cause us to admire their precious gifts; it is literally the truth that speaks through their mouths. A migraine, some small puncturing of their amour-propre is enough to change everything. The luminous intelligence, abrupt, convulsive, shrunken, now reflects only a self that is irritated, suspicious, coquettish, doing all it can to be unattractive. The anger of the Cambremers ran high; and in the meanwhile, other incidents led to a certain tension in their relations with the little clan. As we were returning, the Cottards, Charlus, Brichot, Morel and I, from a dinner at La Raspelière, and the Cambremers, who had been going to have lunch with some friends in Arembouville, had made part of the outward journey with us: 'You who are so fond of Balzac and able to recognize him in contemporary society, I had said to M. de Charlus, you must think that the Cambremers have escaped from the Scènes de la vie de province.'[75] But M. de Charlus, absolutely as if he had been their friend and as if I had offended him by my remark, abruptly cut me short: 'You're saying that because the wife is superior to the husband, he said curtly. – Oh, I didn't mean that she was the 'Muse du département', nor Madame de Bargeton,[76] although…' M. de Charlus interrupted me once more: 'Say rather Madame de Mortsauf.'[77] The train stopped and Brichot got out. 'No good our signalling to you, you're terrible. – What d'you mean? – Oh come, haven't you noticed that Brichot is madly in love with Mme de Cambremer?' I could see by the attitude of the Cottards and of Charlie that there was not a shred of doubt about this among the little nucleus. I thought it showed ill-will on their part. 'Come, you didn't notice how agitated he was when you were talking about her,' M. de Charlus went on, who liked to show that he had experience of women and spoke naturally of the sentiment they inspire, as if it were one that he himself was in the habit of feeling. But a certain tone of equivocal fatherliness with all the young men – despite his exclusive love for Morel – gave the lie by his tone to the lady's-man views he was expressing: 'Oh, these children, he said, in a high-pitched, affected, measured voice, you have to teach them everything, they're innocent as a new-born babe, they can't recognize when a man's in love with a woman. I knew what's what better than that at your age,' he added, for he liked using these expressions from the world of the Paris apaches, perhaps from taste, perhaps so as not to appear, by avoiding them, to be admitting that he associated with those whose current vocabulary they were. A few days later, I had indeed to yield to the evidence and recognize that Brichot was smitten with the Marquise. Unfortunately, he accepted several lunch invitations from her. Mme Verdurin adjudged that it was time to put her oar in. Apart from the usefulness she could see in an intervention where the politics of the little nucleus was concerned, she took an increasingly keen enjoyment in these sorts of explanation and the dramas they gave rise to, an enjoyment born of idleness as much among the bourgeoisie as in the world of the aristocracy. It was a day of high emotion at La Raspelière when Mme Verdurin was seen to disappear for a whole hour with Brichot, whom she was known to have told that Mme de Cambremer made fun of him, that he was the laughing-stock of her drawing-room, that he was about to dishonour his old age and jeopardize his position in academic life. She even went so far as to refer in touching terms to the washerwoman he had lived with in Paris and to their little girl. She carried the day, Brichot stopped going to Féterne, but his unhappiness was such that for two days it was thought he was going to lose his sight altogether, and his malady had in any case taken a leap forward from which there was no going back. Meanwhile, the Cambremers, whose anger against Morel was great, invited M. de Charlus one time, and very deliberately, without him. Not receiving any reply from the Baron, they feared they had made a gaffe, and deciding that resentment was a poor counsellor, wrote rather belatedly to Morel, an obsequiousness that made M. de Charlus smile by revealing the extent of his influence. 'You will answer for the two of us, that I accept,' the Baron told Morel. The day of the dinner having arrived, they were waiting in the large drawing-room at Féterne. The Cambremers were in point of fact giving the dinner for the flower of fashion that were M. and Mme Féré. But so afraid were they of displeasing M. de Charlus that, although she had met the Férés through M. de Chevregny, Mme de Cambremer became frantic when, on the day of the dinner, she found the latter arriving to pay a call on them at Féterne. They invented all manner of excuses to send him back to Beausoleil as quickly as possible, not quickly enough, however, to stop him running into the Férés in the courtyard, who were as shocked to see him being expelled as he was ashamed. But whatever the cost, the Cambremers wanted to spare M. de Charlus the sight of M. de Chevregny, judging the latter to be provincial on the strength of nuances that are overlooked en famille and of which account is taken only in the presence of outsiders, the very people who would alone fail to notice them. But we do not like to show off to them relations who have remained what we have tried hard to cease from being. As for M. and Mme Féré, they were in the highest degree people out of what is called 'the top drawer'. In the eyes of those who described them thus, no doubt the Guermantes, the Rohans and many others were also people out of the top drawer, but their name excused you from saying so. Since not everyone knew of the high birth of M. Féré's mother, or of Mme Féré's mother, and the extraordinarily closed circle in which she and her husband moved, when they had just been introduced, in order to explain, it was always added that they were people 'of the very best kind'. Had their obscure name dictated a sort of haughty reserve in them? The fact was that the Férés did not visit people whom the La Tremoïlles would have frequented. It had taken her position as queen of the sea-side, which the old Marquise de Cambremer held in the Manche, for the Férés to come to one of her matinées each year. They had been invited to dinner and great store was laid on the effect that M. de Charlus would have on them. It was given out discreetly that he would be among the guests. By chance, Mme Féré did not know him. Mme de Cambremer experienced a keen satisfaction at this, and the smile of the chemist who is about to bring into contact for the first time two especially important bodies strayed across her face. The door opened and Mme de Cambremer almost felt sick when she saw Morel enter alone. Like a private secretary charged with making his minister's apologies, or like a morganatic spouse expressing the Prince's regrets that he is feeling unwell (as Mme de Clinchamp used to do in respect of the Duc d'Aumale),[78] Morel said, in the airiest of tones: 'The Baron won't be able to come. He's slightly indisposed, at least I think that's the reason; I haven't come across him this week,' he added, these last words causing Mme de Cambremer quite to despair, she having told M. and Mme Féré that Morel saw M. de Charlus at all hours of the day. The Cambremers pretended that the Baron's absence merely added to the pleasures of the occasion and, without letting themselves be overheard by Morel, said to their guests: 'We can make do without him, can we not? I'll be all the pleasanter.' But they were furious, suspecting a conspiracy mounted by Mme Verdurin and, tit for tat, when the latter invited them once again to La Raspelière, M. de Cambremer, unable to resist the pleasure of revisiting his house and of finding himself once again amongst the little group, went, but alone, saying that the Marquise was most upset, but that her doctor had ordered her to keep to her room. By this half-presence, the Cambremers thought both to teach M. de Charlus a lesson and to show the Verdurins that only a limited politeness was due to them, just as in the old days princesses of the blood used to escort duchesses out, but only as far as half-way across the second chamber. After a few weeks, the breach was more or less complete. M. de Cambremer justified it to me thus: 'I must tell you that with M. de Charlus it was difficult. He's an out-and-out Dreyfusard… – Not so! – Oh yes, he is…, at all events, his cousin the Prince de Guermantes is, they've met with a fair bit of hostility on that account. I've relations who are very touchy about that. I can't mix with such people, I'd fall out with the whole of my family. – Since the Prince de Guermantes is a Dreyfusard, it'll go all the better, said Mme de Cambremer, because Saint-Loup, who, they say, is to marry his niece, is one, too. It could even be the reason for the marriage. – Come, my dear, don't say that Saint-Loup, of whom we're so fond, is a Dreyfusard. You shouldn't broadcast these allegations lightly, said M. de Cambremer. What might they not think of him in the Army! – He was one, but he isn't any longer, I said to M. de Cambremer. As for his marrying Mlle de Guermantes-Brassac, is that true? – It's all people talk about, but you're in a good position to know. – But I say again, he told me himself he was a Dreyfusard, said Mme de Cambremer. He's got every excuse anyway, the Guermantes are half-German. – In the case of the rue de Varenne Guermantes, you can say one hundred per cent, said Cancan. But Saint-Loup's a different kettle of fish; he may well have any number of German relations, but his father claimed his title above all as a great French nobleman, he served again in 1871 and was killed in the finest manner during the war. I may well fuss too much about that sort of thing, but one mustn't exaggerate either in one direction or the other. In medio… virtus,[79] oh, I don't remember! It's something Doctor Cottard says. He's never at a loss for the right words. You ought to have a Petit Larousse here.' To avoid having to pronounce on the Latin quotation, and to get off the subject of Saint-Loup, on which her husband seemed to find her lacking in tact, Mme de Cambremer fell back on the Patronne, whose quarrel with them was even more in need of an explanation. 'We were happy to lease La Raspelière to Mme Verdurin, said the Marquise. Only she has appeared to think that, along with the house, and everything she's found a way of laying claim to, the use of the meadow, the old hangings, all things that certainly weren't in the lease, she'd have in addition the right to become friends with us. Those are two quite distinct things. Our mistake is simply not to have done things through a factor or an agency. At Féterne that's of no account, but I can see now the expression on my Aunt de Ch'nouville's face if she saw old Mother Verdurin turning up on my at-home day, with her hair all over the place. In the case of M. de Charlus, of course, he knows some highly respectable people, but he also knows some who were far from it.' I asked who. Pressed by questions, Mme de Cambremer finally said: 'They claim it's he who was keeping a Monsieur Moreau, Morille, Morue,[80] I no longer know. No connection, of course, with Morel, the violinist, she added, blushing. When I sensed that Mme Verdurin imagined that, because she was our tenant in the Manche, she'd have the right to call on me in Paris, I realized we had to cut our moorings.'

Despite this breach with the Patronne, the Cambremers were on good enough terms with the faithful, and gladly got into our carriage when they were on the line. When we were on the point of arriving in Douville, Albertine, pulling her mirror out for one last time, sometimes found it helpful to change her gloves or remove her hat for a moment, and with the tortoiseshell comb I had given her and which she wore in her hair, would smooth down her ringlets, fluff them up, and, if necessary, put up her chignon above the undulations that descended in regular valleys as far as her nape. Once in the carriages that were waiting for us, we no longer had any idea at all where we were; the roads were not lit; we could tell by the louder sound the wheels made that we were passing through a village, we thought we had arrived, we found ourselves in open country again, we could hear church-bells in the distance, we forgot we were in dinner-jackets, and we had almost dozed off when, at the end of this long margin of darkness which, because of the distance we had travelled and the incidents characteristic of any journey by train, seemed to have borne us on to an advanced hour of the night and almost half-way back towards Paris, all of a sudden, after we felt the carriage glide on a finer sand, revealing that we had just entered the park, there burst forth, reintroducing us into the life of society, the brilliant lights of the drawing-room, then of the dining-room, where we were suddenly made to recoil by hearing it strike eight, an hour we thought long since past, whereas the numerous courses and fine wines were about to follow one another, around men in tails and women semi-décolletées, in a dinner rutilant with light, like a true dîner en ville, which was surrounded only, and had its character thereby altered, by the strange, sombre double sash woven by the nocturnal, pastoral and marine hours, deflected by this worldly use from their original solemnity, of the double journey. This latter obliged us indeed to abandon the radiant, quickly forgotten splendour of the brightly lit drawing-room for the carriages, where I contrived to be with Albertine so that my loved one might not be with other people without me, and frequently for another reason also, which was that we could the two of us do lots of things in a dark carriage, where the jolts of the descent would anyway excuse us, in the event of a sudden shaft of light entering, for our having clutched hold of one another. When M. de Cambremer had not as yet fallen out with the Verdurins, he used to ask me: 'You don't think, with this fog, that you'll have one of your breathless attacks? My sister had terrible ones this morning. Ah, you did, too, he would say, with satisfaction. I shall tell her so tonight. I know that when I get back she'll be inquiring straight away how long it is since you had them.' He talked to me about mine in fact only in order to get on to those of his sister, and made me describe the particulars of the first the better to mark the differences there were between the two. In spite of these, as his sister's attacks seemed to him to carry authority, he could not believe that what 'worked' with hers was not advisable for my own and he was annoyed that I should not have tried them, for there is one thing even more difficult than sticking to a regimen and that is not imposing it on others. 'Anyway, what am I saying, me, a layman, when you're here in front of the Areopagus, the very fountainhead. What does Professor Cottard think?'

I saw his wife again another time, it so happens, because she had said that my 'cousin' had a funny way with her and I wanted to know what she meant by this. She denied having said it, but finally owned that she had been talking about someone whom she thought she had met with my cousin. She did not know her name but said finally that, if she was not mistaken, it was the wife of a banker, of the name of Lina, Linette, Lisette, Lia, or something of the sort. I fancied that 'wife of a banker' was put in only in order to remove any marks of identity. I wanted to ask Albertine whether it was true. But I preferred appearing to be the one who knew rather than the one asking questions. Albertine would in any case either not have given me any answer or else a 'no' in which the n would have been too hesitant and the o too resonant. Albertine never recounted facts that might harm her, but others which could only be explained by the earlier ones, the truth being a current which flows from what we are told and which we pick up, invisible though it is, rather than the actual thing we have been told. Thus, when I assured her that a woman whom she had met in Vichy was disreputable, she swore that the woman in question was certainly not what I imagined and had never tried to make her do anything bad. But another day she added, when I was speaking of my curiosity regarding that sort of person, that the lady in Vichy had a friend like that whom Albertine did not meet, but to whom the lady had 'promised to introduce her'. For her to have made such a promise, must mean that Albertine had wanted it, or that the lady had, by so offering, known how to please her. But if I had raised this objection with Albertine, I would have seemed to have had my revelations from her alone, I would at once have put a stop to them, I would have learned nothing further, I would have ceased to make myself feared. Moreover, we were in Balbec and the Vichy lady and her friend lived in Menton; the remoteness, the impossibility of any danger, would have soon put an end to my suspicions.

Often, when M. de Cambremer hailed me from the station, I had, with Albertine, just been taking advantage of the darkness, and with all the more difficulty inasmuch as the latter had fought somewhat, fearing it was not sufficiently total. 'You know I'm sure that Cottard saw us; anyway, even without seeing, he certainly heard you choking back your voice, just when they were talking about your other sort of choking,' Albertine said to me on arrival at the station in Douville, where we caught the little train for the return journey. But this return journey, like the outward one, if, by giving me a certain impression of poetry, it reawoke in me the longing to travel, to lead a new life, and thereby made me wish to abandon any plan of marrying Albertine, and even to break off our relationship once and for all, it also, by the very fact of this relationship's contradictory nature, made the break easier. For on the return journey, as on the outward one, at each station there either got in with us or greeted us from the platform people of our acquaintance; the furtive pleasures of the imagination were dominated by the – continual – pleasures of sociability, which are so calming, so soporific. Already, before the stations themselves, their names (which had so set me to dreaming ever since the day I first heard them, on that first evening when I had been travelling with my grandmother) had been humanized, had lost their strangeness since the evening when Brichot, at Albertine's request, had explained their etymologies to us more fully. I had found the -fleur charming that ended certain names, such as Fiquefleur, Honfleur, Flers, Barfleur, Harfleur and so on, and the -boeuf to be found at the end of Bricqueboeuf amusing. But the fleur vanished along with the boeuf when Brichot (and he had told me this that first day, in the train) taught us that 'fleur' means 'harbour' (like fiord) and that 'boeuf', budh in Norman, signifies 'hut'. As he cited various examples, what had seemed to me particular became general: Bricqueboeuf went to join Elbeuf, and even in a name at first sight as individual as the place itself, such as the name of Pennedepie, in which oddities impossible of elucidation by the reason seemed to have become amalgamated since time immemorial into a vocable as hard, strong-tasting and unpleasant as a certain Normandy cheese, I was distressed to discover the Gallic pen, which signifies 'mountain' and is found in Penmarch as well as in the Apennines. As, each time the train stopped, I felt that we should have friendly hands to shake, if not visits to receive, I said to Albertine: 'Hurry up and ask Brichot the names you want to know about. You mentioned Marcouville-l'Orgueilleuse. – Yes, I just love that orgueil, it's a proud village, said Albertine. – You'd think it prouder still, replied Brichot, if, instead of its French form, or even the Low Latin, such as you find it in the Bishop of Bayeux's cartulary, Marcovilla superba, you were to take the more ancient form, closer to the Norman, Marculphivilla superba, the village, or domain, of Merculph. In almost all these names that end in -ville, you can still see, erect above this coast, the ghost of the rude Norman invaders. At Hermonville, you had, standing in the carriage doorway, only our excellent Doctor, who, obviously, has nothing of the Norse chieftain about him. But by closing your eyes, you might have seen the celebrated Herimund (Herimundivilla). Although, I don't know why, people go by these roads, in between Loigny and Balbec-Plage, rather than the very picturesque ones that go from Loigny to old Balbec, Mme Verdurin has perhaps taken you out in that direction by carriage. In which case you'll have seen Incarville or the village of Wiscar, and Tourville, before you get to Mme Verdurin's, is the village of Turold. Moreover, there weren't only the Normans. It seems that Germans may have got this far (Aumenancourt, Alemanicurtis); don't tell this to the young officer I see there; he'd be capable of refusing to go to his cousins' any more. There were Saxons, too, witness the fountain of Sissonne (one of Mme Verdurin's favourite destinations for her excursions, and rightly so), just like in England, Middlesex and Wessex. Something inexplicable, it seems that the Goths, 'gueux' as they used to say, got this far, and even Moors, for Mortagne comes from Mauretania. The trace of them has remained in Gourville (Gothorumvilla). The odd vestige of the Latins survives, too, moreover, Lagny (Latiniacum). –I shall ask for an explanation of Thorpehomme, said M. de Charlus. I can understand "homme", he added, as the sculptor and Cottard exchanged meaningful glances. But Thorp? – "Homme" does not at all signify what you are naturally led to believe, Baron, replied Brichot, glancing mischievously at Cottard and the sculptor. "Homme" has nothing to do in this case with the sex to which I am not indebted for my mother. "Homme" is Holm, which signifies "small island", and so on. As for Thorp, or "village", you find it again in dozens of words with which I've already bored our young friend. So in Thorpehomme there isn't the name of a Norman chieftain, but words of the Norman tongue. You can see how this whole region was Germanized. – I think he's exaggerating, said M. de Charlus. Yesterday, I went to Orgeville – This time I give you back the man I took away in Thorpehomme, Baron. Let it be said without pedantry, a charter of Robert I gives us, for Orgeville, the domain of Otger. All these names are those of ancient lords. Octeville-la-Venelle is for l'Avenel. The Avenels were a family well known in the Middle Ages. Bourguenolles, which Mme Verdurin took us to the other day, used to be written "Bourg de Môles", because the village belonged in the eleventh century to Baudoin de Môles, as did La Chaise-Baudoin; but here we are in Doncières. – Good Lord, all the lieutenants that are going to try and get in!, said M. de Charlus in mock terror. I'm thinking of you, it doesn't trouble me as I'm getting out. – You hear, Doctor? said Brichot. The Baron's afraid of having officers clambering over his person. Yet they're quite in character, by being here in strength, for Doncières is none other than Saint-Cyr,[81] Dominus Cyriacus. There are lots of names of towns in which sanctus and sancta have been replaced by dominus and domina. Moreover, this peaceful Army town sometimes gives a false impression of being Saint-Cyr, Versailles or even Fontainebleau.

During these homeward journeys (as on the outward one), I used to tell Albertine to dress herself, for I knew very well that at Amnancourt, Doncières, Epreville and Saint-Vast, we would be receiving brief visits. I did not find these at all disagreeable, as it happens, whether it was, at Hermonville (the domain of Herimund), that of M. de Chevregny, taking advantage of having come to fetch guests to ask me to go and have lunch the following day at Montsurvent, or, at Doncières, the abrupt invasion of one of Saint-Loup's charming friends, sent by him (if he was not free) to pass on an invitation from Captain de Borodino, from the officers' mess at the Coq Hardi, or from the NCOs at the Faisan Doré. Saint-Loup often came in person, and all the time he was there, without it being apparent to anyone, I held Albertine captive with my eyes, pointlessly vigilant as it happens. On one occasion, however, I interrupted my watch. The stop being prolonged, Bloch, having greeted us, ran off almost immediately to rejoin his father, who had just inherited from his uncle and, having leased a château called 'La Commanderie', thought it very much the grand seigneur to travel about only in a post-chaise, with postilions in livery. Bloch asked me to go with him as far as the carriage. 'But make haste, for these quadrupeds are impatient; come, man beloved of the gods, you will bring pleasure to my father.' But I could not bear to leave Albertine in the train with Saint-Loup, they might, while my back was turned, talk together, get into another carriage, smile at one another, touch one another; my adhesive gaze could not be removed from Albertine for as long as Saint-Loup was there. But I could see very well that Bloch, who had asked me as a favour to go and greet his father, found it first of all unfriendly that I should refuse when nothing was stopping me, the porters having warned us that the train would be remaining for another quarter of an hour at least in the station, and that almost all the passengers, without whom it would not leave, had alighted; and for another thing he did not doubt that it was definitely because – my conduct on this occasion was a decisive response – I was a snob. For he was not unaware of the names of the people I was with. Indeed, M. de Charlus had said to me, some time before and not remembering or caring that this had been done in the old days, in order to get close to him: 'But introduce me to your friend then, what you're doing shows a lack of respect for me,' and he had talked with Bloch, with whom he seemed exceedingly taken, to the point where he had gratified him with an 'I shall hope to meet you again.' 'It's irrevocable then, you refuse to walk those hundred metres to say hallo to my father, to whom it'd give so much pleasure?' Bloch said. I was unhappy at seeming to be failing in comradeship, and even more so at the reason Bloch imagined I had for failing in it, and at sensing that he supposed I was not the same with my bourgeois friends when people of 'birth' were present. From that day forward, he ceased to show me the same affection and, what I found more hurtful, no longer had the same high regard for my character. But in order to undeceive him as to the motive that had led me to remain in the train, I would have needed to tell him something – namely, that I was jealous of Albertine – that would have been even more painful than allowing him to believe that I was stupidly worldly. Thus it is that, in theory, we find we ought always to explain ourselves frankly, to avoid misunderstandings. But very often life combines these in such a way that, in order to dispel them, in the rare circumstances when that might prove possible, we would have to reveal either – which was not the case here – something that would offend our friend even more than the imaginary wrong he imputes to us, or a secret the divulging of which – this was what had just happened in my own case – strikes us as even worse than the misunderstanding. Moreover, even without explaining to Bloch, since I was unable to, the reason I had for not accompanying him, had I begged him not to be offended, I would merely have doubled the offence by showing that I had been aware of it. There was nothing to be done but to submit to this fatum which had decreed that the presence of Albertine should prevent me from escorting him and that he should believe that, on the contrary, it was the presence of brilliant people who, had they been a hundred times more so, would have simply had the effect of making me concern myself exclusively with Bloch and reserve all my courtesies for him. It is thus enough that, accidentally, absurdly, an incident (in this case, the coming together of Albertine and Saint-Loup) should interpose itself between two destinies whose lines had been converging for these to be made to deviate, to grow further and further apart and never approach one another again. And there are more beautiful friendships than that of Bloch with myself which have found themselves destroyed, without the involuntary author of the quarrel having ever been able to explain to the one quarrelled with what would surely have healed his amour-propre and retrieved his fugitive sympathy.

Friendships more beautiful than Bloch's would not be saying very much, on the other hand. He had all the defects that displeased me the most. My fondness for Albertine, it so happened, made them quite unbearable. Thus, at that simple moment when I was talking with him while keeping an eye on Robert, Bloch told me he had lunched at Mme Bontemps's and that everyone had talked about me in the most laudatory terms until 'the declension of Helios'. 'Good, I thought, since Mme Bontemps thinks Bloch is a genius, the enthusiastic vote of approval he will have given me will do more than what all the others may have said, it'll get back to Albertine. She can't fail to find out some day soon, and it surprises me that her aunt hasn't already repeated it to her, that I'm a "superior" man.' 'Yes, added Bloch, everyone heaped praises on you. I alone preserved a silence as profound as if I had absorbed, in place of the, in fact somewhat mediocre, meal that we were served, the poppies beloved of the blessed brother of Tanathos and Lethe, the divine Hypnos, who envelops the body and the tongue in his sweet bonds. It's not that I admire you any less than the band of ravening dogs with whom I had been invited. But I admire you because I understand you, and they admire you without understanding you. The truth is, I admire you too much to speak of you in that way in public, it would have seemed to me a profanation to praise aloud what I carry in the deepest recesses of my heart. It was in vain that they questioned me about you, a sacred Pudor, the daughter of Kronion, made me remain mute.' I was not so tasteless as to appear disgruntled, but this particular Pudor seemed to me akin – much more than to Kronion – to the reticence that prevents a critic who admires you from talking about you because the secret temple where you sit enthroned would be invaded by the mob of ignorant readers and journalists; to the reticence of the statesman who does not give you a decoration so that you should not be lost to view amidst people of less worth than yourself; to the reticence of the Academician who does not give you his vote, so as to spare you the shame of being the colleague of X…, who is without talent; to the reticence finally, more respectable yet more criminal, of the sons who beg you not to write about their late father, who was full of fine qualities, in order to ensure silence and repose, to prevent people maintaining him in life and creating a halo around the poor dead man, who would rather have his name issuing from men's mouths than the wreaths borne, however piously, to his grave.

If Bloch, while distressing me by not being able to understand the reason that had prevented me from going to salute his father, had exasperated me by confessing that he had depreciated me at Mme Bontemps's (I now understood why Albertine had never alluded to that lunch and remained silent when I spoke to her of Bloch's affection for me), the young Israelite had had an effect on M. de Charlus that was anything but irritation. Certainly Bloch now believed, not only that I could not for one second keep away from people of fashion, but that, jealous of the overtures they might have made to him (like M. de Charlus), I was trying to put a spoke in his wheel and prevent him from becoming friendly with them; but for his part, the Baron regretted not having seen more of my schoolfellow. As was his habit, he was careful not to show it. He began by putting to me, without appearing to, a few questions about Bloch, but in so offhand a tone and with an interest that appeared so put on, that you would not have supposed that he was attending to the answers. With an air of detachment, in a sing-song voice expressive of more than indifference, of distraction, and as if out of simple politeness towards myself: 'He looks intelligent, he said he was writing, has he any talent?' I told M. de Charlus it had been very good of him to say he hoped to meet him again. The Baron gave not the slightest indication that he might have heard my words, and as I repeated them four times without getting any reply, I finally suspected I might have been the victim of an acoustic mirage when I thought I heard what M. de Charlus had said. 'Is he staying in Balbec?' crooned the Baron, with so uninquiring an expression it is unfortunate that the French language has no sign other than the question-mark with which to end these sentences that appear so unlike questions. It is true that such a sign would be of scant use save to M. de Charlus. 'No, they're renting near here, La Commanderie.' Having learned what he wanted, M. de Charlus pretended to despise Bloch. 'How ghastly! he exclaimed, restoring to his voice all its clarion vigour. All the localities or properties called "La Commanderie" were built or owned by the Knights of the Order of Malta (of whom I am one), just as the places known as "Le Temple" or "La Cavalerie" were by the Templars. Were I staying at La Commanderie, nothing could be more natural. But a Jew! Not, however, that it surprises me; it comes from a curious liking for sacrilege, peculiar to that race. As soon as a Jew has enough money to buy a château, he always chooses one called Le Prieuré, l'Abbaye, Le Monastère, La Maison-Dieu. I had dealings with a Jewish functionary, can you guess where he resided? In Pont-l'Evêque.[82] Having fallen out of favour, he got himself sent to Brittany, to Pont-l'Abbé. When, in Holy Week, they put on those indecent spectacles known as Passion plays, half the auditorium is filled with Jews, exulting at the thought that they are going to put Christ on the Cross for a second time, at least in effigy. At the Lamoureux concerts, I had for my neighbour one day a rich Jewish banker. They were giving Berlioz's L'Enfance du Christ; he was appalled. But he soon recovered the beatific expression that is usual with him on hearing "L'Enchantement du Vendredi Saint".[83] Your friend is staying at La Commanderie, the wretch! What sadism! You must show me how to get there, he added, resuming his indifferent air, so that I can go one day and see how our ancient domains are withstanding such a profanation. It's unfortunate, for he's polite, he seems clever. All it needs now is for him to live in Paris in the rue du Temple!' By which words, M. de Charlus seemed simply to be looking for a fresh example by which to support his theory; but in reality he was posing a question whose intention was twofold, the principal one being to learn Bloch's address. 'Indeed, Brichot pointed out, the rue du Temple used to be called the rue de la Chevalerie-du-Temple. Apropos of which, will you permit me an observation, Baron? said the university man. – What? What is it? said M. de Charlus curtly, the remark having prevented him from obtaining his information. – No, nothing, replied Brichot, abashed. It was apropos of the etymology of Balbec that I was asked for. The rue du Temple was once called the rue Barre-du-Bec, because the Abbey of Bec, in Normandy, had its bar of justice there in Paris.' M. de Charlus made no reply and pretended not to have heard, which was one of the forms his insolence took. 'Where does your friend live in Paris? Since three-quarters of the streets take their name from a church or an abbey, there's a good chance of the sacrilege continuing. You can't stop Jews living on the boulevard de la Madeleine, in the Faubourg Saint-Honoré or the place Saint-Augustin. As long as they don't carry perfidy to the point of electing domicile in the place du Parvis-Notre-Dame, the quai de l'Archevêché, the rue Chanoinesse or the rue de l'Ave Maria, allowance must be made for their difficulties.' We were unable to satisfy M. de Charlus, Bloch's current address not being known to us. But I knew that his father's offices were in the rue des Blancs-Manteaux.[84] 'Oh, the very height of perversity, exclaimed M. de Charlus, seeming to derive a profound satisfaction from his own cry of ironic indignation. Rue des Blancs-Manteaux, he repeated, laying weight on each syllable and laughing. What sacrilege! To think that these Blancs-Manteaux polluted by M. Bloch were those of the mendicant friars, known as serfs of the Holy Virgin, that Saint Louis established there.[85] And the street has always belonged to the religious orders. The profanation is all the more diabolical in that, no distance from the rue des Blancs-Manteaux, there's a street whose name escapes me but which is entirely given over to the Jews; there are Hebrew characters on the shops, factories making unleavened bread, Jewish butchers, it's quite simply the Judengasse of Paris. M. de Rochegude calls that street the Paris ghetto.[86] That's where M. Bloch should have been living. Of course, he went on, in a somewhat emphatic, lordly tone and, to make his aesthetic pronouncements, lending to the face that he had drawn back, by a reaction addressed to him in spite of himself by his heredity, the look of one of Louis XIII's old musketeers, I concern myself with all that only from the point of view of art. Politics are not my thing and I can't condemn en bloc, even if Blochs there are, a nation that numbers Spinoza amongst its illustrious sons. And I admire Rembrandt too much not to know what beauty may be had from the frequentation of the synagogue.[87] But then a ghetto is all the better the more homogeneous and the more complete it is. You may be sure, in any case, so closely bound up are the practical instinct and cupidity with sadism among that race, that the proximity of the Hebraic street I am speaking of, and the convenience of having Israelite butchers close to hand led your friend to choose the rue des Blancs-Manteaux. How curious it is! It was there, as it happens, that there lived a strange Jew who boiled the Host,[88] after which I believe they boiled him, which is stranger still since that seems to signify that the body of a Jew can be of equal value to the body of God. Perhaps something could be arranged with your friend so that he takes us to see the church of the Blancs-Manteaux. To think that it was there they laid the body of Louis d'Orléans after his assassination by Jean the Fearless, who, alas, did not deliver us from the Orléans.[89] Personally, I get on very well as it happens with my cousin the duc de Chartres, but in the end they're a race of usurpers, who had Louis XVI assassinated, and Charles X and Henri V despoiled.[90] They've much to live up to, moreover, having for ancestors Monsieur, so called no doubt because he was the most astonishing old woman, and the Regent and all the rest. What a family!' This speech, anti-Jewish or pro-Hebrew – according to whether you fastened on the surface of the words or the intentions they concealed – had been comically watered down for me by a remark whispered to me by Morel which would have made M. de Charlus despair. Morel, who had not failed to observe the impression Bloch had been making, thanked me surreptitiously for having 'despatched' him, adding cynically: 'He'd have liked to stay, all that's jealousy, he'd like to take my place. Typical of a yid! – We could have profited from this prolonged stoppage to ask for a few ritual explanations from your friend. Couldn't you catch him up? M. de Charlus asked me, with the anxiety of doubt. – No, it's impossible, he went off in a carriage and angry with me, moreover. – Thank you, thank you, breathed Morel. – The reason's absurd, you can always overtake a carriage, there's nothing to stop you taking a motor-car,' replied M. de Charlus, as a man accustomed to having everything submit to him. But, observing my silence: 'What is this more or less imaginary carriage?' he said, insolently, and with a last flicker of hope. – It's an open post-chaise which must already have got to La Commanderie.' Faced by an impossibility, M. de Charlus resigned himself and affected to joke. 'I can understand that they should have been put off by the superfluous brougham. It would have been a new broom.' Finally, we were advised that the train was departing and Saint-Loup left us. But that was the one day when, by getting into our compartment, he unwittingly caused me to suffer, from the thought I entertained for an instant of leaving him with Albertine in order to go with Bloch. On the other occasions, his presence did not torment me. For of her own accord, Albertine, to spare me any anxiety, took up a position, on some pretext or other, such that she would have been unable, even involuntarily, to brush against Robert, almost too far away even to have to offer him her hand; looking the other way, she would begin, as soon as he was there, to talk ostensibly and almost with affectation with one or other of the other travellers, keeping up this game until Saint-Loup had gone. In this way, the visits he made to us in Doncières, causing me neither pain nor even embarrassment, did not form an exception to the others, all of which were agreeable for bringing me in some sense the homage and the invitation of this land. Already, from the end of the summer, on our journey from Balbec to Douville, when I spotted the station of Saint-Pierre-des-Ifs in the distance where, for a moment, in the evenings, the crest of the cliffs sparkled pink like the snow on a mountain in the setting sun, it no longer put me in mind (I do not say of the sadness even that the sight of its sudden strange rearing-up had produced in me on that first evening by giving me so strong a desire to catch the train back to Paris instead of going on to Balbec) of the spectacle which you could see from there in the mornings, so Elstir had told me, in the hour before the sun came up, when all the colours of the rainbow are refracted on the rocks, and where he had so many times woken up the young boy who, one year, had served him as a model, to paint him, stark naked, against the sand. The name of Saint-Pierre-des-Ifs merely announced to me that there was about to appear a strange, witty, bedizened fifty-year-old, with whom I would be able to discuss Chateaubriand and Balzac. And now, in the mists of evening, behind the Incarville cliffs that had so set me to dreaming in the old days, what I could see, as if its ancient sandstone had grown transparent, was the beautiful house of an uncle of M. de Cambremer's, where I knew they would always be glad to take me in if I did not want to dine at La Raspelière or return to Balbec. Thus it was not simply the place-names of the region which had lost their original mystery, but the places themselves. The names, already half voided of a mystery that etymology had replaced by reason, had descended one step further still. On our return journeys to Hermonville, Saint-Vast, Arembouville, just as the train was stopping, we would catch sight of shadows that we did not at first recognize and which Brichot, who could not see a thing, might perhaps have mistaken in the darkness for the phantoms of Herimund, Wiscar and Herimbald. But they approached the carriage. It was merely M. de Cambremer, his breach with the Verdurins now complete, seeing guests off, and who, on behalf of his wife and his mother, came to ask me whether I would not like him to 'kidnap' me, to keep me for a few days at Féterne, whither there would be following one another, an excellent lady musician who would sing me the whole of Gluck, and a chess-player of repute with whom I would have excellent games, which would not get in the way of the fishing or yachting parties in the bay, or even the Verdurin dinners, for which the Marquis gave his word of honour that he would 'lend' me, having me driven there and fetched again so as to make it easier, as well as safer. 'But I can't imagine it's good for you to go that high up. I know my sister wouldn't be able to stand it. She'd come back in such a state! She's not as it happens all that good at present… Really, you've had that bad an attack! Tomorrow you won't be able to stand up!' And he doubled up, not out of unkindness, but for the same reason that he could not not laugh when he saw a lame man go sprawling in the street, or talked with a deaf person. 'And before that? What, you hadn't had one for a fortnight? D'you know, that's very fine! You really ought to come and install yourself at Féterne, you could discuss your attacks with my sister.' At Incarville, it was the Marquis de Montpeyroux who, not having been able to go to Féterne, for he had been away hunting, had come 'to the train' in boots and a hat decorated with a pheasant feather, to shake the hand of some relations and of myself at the same time, announcing, for the day of the week that would not inconvenience me, the visit of his son, whom he thanked me for entertaining and would be very happy if I got him to do some reading; or else M. de Crécy, come there, so he said, smoking his pipe, to settle his digestion, who accepted one or even several cigars, and said to me: 'Well, you haven't told me what day our next get-together à la Lucullus is to be? We've nothing to say to one another? Permit me to remind you that we left unfinished the question of the two families of Montgommerys. We have to settle that. I'm counting on you.' Others had come simply to buy their newspapers. Many also exchanged a few words with us, whom I have always suspected of finding themselves on the platform, at the station nearest to their small château, only because they had nothing better to do except meet for a moment with people of their acquaintance. These stops the little train made were, all in all, as much a setting for social life as any other. It seemed aware itself of the role that had devolved on it, and had developed a certain human friendliness: patient and docile in character, it waited for as long as was required for the stragglers, and even once it had left would stop to pick up those who signalled to it; they would then run after it, puffing, in which they resembled the train itself, with the difference that they caught it up going at full speed, whereas it had resorted to a sensible dilatoriness. Thus Hermonville, Arembouville, Incarville no longer even evoked for me the savage magnificence of the Norman conquest, not content with having entirely divested themselves of the unaccountable sadness in which, once upon a time, I had seen them bathed in the evening damp. Doncières! Even after I had come to know it and had woken up from my dream, how long there had remained in that name for me agreeably icy streets, lighted shop-windows and succulent poultry! Doncières! Now it was nothing more than the station at which Morel got in; Egleville (Aquilaevilla) that where the Princesse Sherbatoff was generally waiting for us; Maineville, the station where Albertine would alight on fine evenings, when, not feeling too tired, she was anxious to spend a moment or two longer with me, having scarcely any further to walk, up a steep path, than if she had alighted at Parville (Paterni villa). Not only did I no longer experience the anxious fear of isolation that had gripped me that first evening, but I no longer had to fear that it might reawaken, nor feeling homesick, nor finding myself alone in this land productive not only of chestnut trees and tamarisks, but of friendships, which, all along the journey, formed a long chain, broken, like that of the blue-coloured hills, hidden now and again in the anfractuosity of the rocks or behind the lime-trees of the avenue, but at each relay delegating an amiable gentleman who came, with a cordial shake of the hand, to interrupt my journey, to prevent my becoming conscious of its length, if need be to offer to continue it with me. Another one would be at the next station, so that the little tram's whistle made us abandon one friend only so as to enable us to meet again with others. Between the more scattered châteaux and the train that skirted them almost at a fast walking pace, the distance was so short that at the moment when, on the platform, in front of the waiting-room, their owners hailed us, we might almost have thought that that they were doing so from their own doorsteps or from their bedroom window, as if the little departmental railway-line were nothing more than a provincial street and the isolated manor house an urban hôtel; and even at the rare stations where I did not hear anyone's 'good evening', the silence had a calming and nutritious fullness, because I knew it to be formed of the sleep of friends who had retired early in the nearby manor, where my arrival would have been greeted with delight had I had to awaken them in order to ask for some favour of hospitality. Except that habit so takes up our time that, at the end of a few months, we no longer have a free moment in a town where, when we arrived, the day offered us the free disposal of its twelve hours; had by any chance one of these become vacant, I would no longer have thought of using it in order to visit some church or other for the sake of which I had once come to Balbec, nor even to compare a beauty-spot painted by Elstir with the sketch of it I had seen in his house, but to go and have one more game of chess with M. Féré. Indeed, such was the degrading influence, and also the charm, of the country around Balbec, that it had become truly familiar ground for me; if their territorial distribution, their being sown along the full extent of the coast, in diverse crops, necessarily lent to the visits I made to these various friends the form of a journey, they also now confined the attractions of that journey to the social ones, of a succession of visits. The same place-names, so disturbing for me in the old days that merely leafing through the chapter for the department of the Manche in the Annuaire des châteaux produced as much emotion in me as the railway time-table, had become so familiar that I might have consulted that same time-table, on the Balbec–Douville via Doncières page, with the same contented peace of mind as a dictionary of addresses. In this too social valley, to the sides of which I sensed there clung, whether visible or not, a numerous company of friends, the poetic cry of evening was no longer that of the owl or the frog, but the 'How goes it?' of M. de Criquetot, or the 'Kaire' of Brichot. The atmosphere no longer aroused anxieties and, laden with purely human effluvia, was breathable without difficulty, too soothing even. The benefit that I derived from it, at least, was no longer to see things except from the practical point of view. Marriage with Albertine struck me as foolishness.

Sudden reversion to Albertine. – Desolation at break of day. – I leave at once for Paris with Albertine.

I was only awaiting an opportunity for the final rupture. And one evening, as Mama was leaving the next day for Combray, where she was going to attend a sister of her mother's in her last illness, leaving me behind so that I might benefit, as Grandmother would have wanted, from the sea air, I announced to her that I had decided irrevocably not to marry Albertine and would shortly stop from seeing her. I was pleased to have been able, by these words, to give my mother satisfaction on the eve of her departure. She made no secret of the fact that it was indeed for her a very keen satisfaction. I needed also to have things out with Albertine. As I was returning with her from La Raspelière, the faithful having alighted, some at Saint-Mars-le-Vêtu, others at Saint-Pierre-des-Ifs, still others at Doncières, feeling especially happy and detached from her, I had made up my mind, now that there were only the two of us in the compartment, finally to broach the conversation. The truth in any case was that that one of the Balbec girls whom I loved, although she was then away, along with her friends, but would be returning (I enjoyed being with all of them, for each of them had for me, as on the first day, something of the essence of the others, was as if from a race apart), was Andrée. Since she would be arriving back in Balbec in a few days' time, she would certainly come and see me straight away, and then, in order to remain free, and not to marry her if I did not want to, so as to be able to go to Venice, but yet to have her all to myself in the meantime, the means I would adopt would be not to appear to be going to her but, as soon as she arrived, when we were talking together, I would say: 'What a pity I didn't see you a few weeks earlier! I'd have loved you; now my heart is taken. But that doesn't matter, we'll see each other often, for I'm unhappy in my other love and you will help to console me.' I smiled inwardly on imagining this conversation, for in this way I would be giving Andrée the illusion that I did not really love her; thus she would not grow tired of me and I would take joyful and consoling advantage of her affection. But all this only made it the more necessary finally to talk seriously to Albertine, so as not to act unscrupulously, and since I was resolved to devote myself to her friend, she, Albertine, needed certainly to know that I did not love her. She needed to be told right away, since Andrée might arrive any day. But as we were nearing Parville, I felt that we would not have time that evening and that it would be better to put off until the following day what had now been irrevocably decided on. I contented myself therefore with talking to her about the dinner we had been to at the Verdurins'. As she was putting her coat back on, the train having just left Incarville, the last station before Parville, she said: 'Tomorrow then, re-Verdurin, you won't forget that it's you who are coming to fetch me.' I could not help answering, somewhat curtly: 'Yes, unless I "default", because I'm beginning to find this life really stupid. At all events, if we go there, so that my time at La Raspelière shouldn't be time totally wasted, I shall have to think of asking Mme Verdurin something that could interest me greatly, be a subject for study, and give me pleasure, because I'm really getting very little this year in Balbec. – That's not being very nice, but I won't hold it against you, because I can tell you're nervous. What is this pleasure? – That Mme Verdurin should get them to play me things by a musician whose works she knows very well. I, too, know one of them, but it seems there are others and I'd need to find out if it's been published, if it differs from the early ones. – What musician? – If I tell you that his name's Vinteuil, my sweet one, are you any the wiser?' We may have turned over in our minds every possible idea without the truth ever entering, and it is from outside, when we least expect it, that it delivers its fearsome sting and wounds us for ever. 'You can't know how much you amuse me, replied Albertine, standing up, for the train was about to stop. Not only does it mean much more to me than you think, but even without Mme Verdurin I can get you all the information you want. You remember my speaking to you about a girl-friend, older than me, who was like both a mother and sister to me, whom I spent my best years with in Trieste and who, moreover, I'm due to meet in Cherbourg in a few weeks' time, from where we'll be travelling together (it's a little weird, but you know how I love the sea), well, this friend (oh, not at all the type of woman you might suppose!), and isn't this extraordinary, is in actual fact the best friend of this Vinteuil's daughter, and I know Vinteuil's daughter almost as well. I only ever call them my two big sisters. I'm not unhappy at showing you that your little Albertine can be useful to you in these musical matters, where you say, rightly as it happens, that I don't understand a thing.' At these words, uttered as we were entering the station in Parville, so far from Combray and from Montjouvain, so long after Vinteuil's death, a picture came to life in my heart, a picture held in reserve during so many years that, even had I been able to guess, when long ago storing it away, that it had the power to do harm, I would have supposed that in the course of time it had lost it entirely; preserved alive deep inside me – like Orestes, whose death the gods had prevented so that on the day appointed he might return to his homeland to punish the murder of Agamemnon – as my torment, as my punishment perhaps, who knows, for having allowed my grandmother to die; suddenly rising up out of the depths of that darkness where it had seemed to lie forever entombed and striking like an Avenger, in order to inaugurate for me a new life, terrible and deserved, perhaps also to explode before my eyes the fateful consequences to which wicked actions give rise indefinitely, not only for those who have committed them but for those who were no more than, who thought they were merely, onlookers at a curious and diverting spectacle, like me, alas, on that far-off day's end in Montjouvain, hidden behind a bush, where (as when I had listened complaisantly to the account of Swann's amours) I had perilously allowed to broaden out within me the fateful path of Knowledge, destined to become so sorrowful. And at that same moment, of my greatest sorrow, I had a feeling, proud almost, almost joyful, that of a man caused to leap so far upwards by the shock that he has received that he has attained a point to which no effort could have raised him. Albertine the friend of Mlle Vinteuil and of her friend, a practising and professional Sapphist, this, compared with what I had imagined at my most suspecting, was what, in comparison with the little acoustic device at the 1889 Exhibition, which you hardly hoped might reach from one end of the house to the other, the telephone now is, soaring over streets, towns, fields and seas, linking regions. This was a terrible terra incognita on which I had just set foot, a new phase of unsuspected suffering that was opening. And yet the deluge of reality that submerges us, enormous though it may be compared with our timid and negligible suppositions, had been anticipated by them. It was no doubt something like what I had just learned, something like the friendship between Albertine and Mlle Vinteuil, something that my mind would have been incapable of inventing, but which I had obscurely apprehended when I was so concerned at seeing Albertine next to Andrée. It is often only for want of the creative spirit that we do not go far enough in suffering. And the most terrible reality brings us, at the same time as suffering, the joy of a beautiful discovery, for all that it does is to lend a new and explicit form to what we had long been turning over in our minds without suspecting it. The train had stopped in Parville, and as we were the only passengers to be found on it, it was in a voice made limp by his sense of the futility of the task, by the same habit that yet made him fulfil it, and inspired him at once with indolence and punctiliousness, and even more out of the longing for sleep, that the porter shouted: 'Parville!' Albertine, standing facing me and seeing that she had reached her destination, took a few steps from the back of the carriage where we were and opened the door. But the movement that she thus performed in order to alight tore unbearably at my heart as if, contrary to the position that Albertine's body, independently of my own, seemed to be occupying a short step away, this separation in space, which a truthful draughtsman would have been obliged to represent between us, was only an appearance, and as if whoever might have wanted, in accordance with the true reality, to re-draw things would have now had to place Albertine, not at some little distance from me, but inside me. Her moving away caused me such pain that, catching her up, I pulled her despairingly by the arm. 'Would it be physically impossible, I asked her, for you to come and spend the night in Balbec? – Physically, no. But I can't keep awake. – You'd be doing me an immense favour… – All right then, though I don't understand; why didn't you say sooner? Anyway, I'll stay.' My mother was asleep when, after getting them to give Albertine a room on another floor, I returned to my own room. I sat down near the window, stifling my sobs so that my mother, who was separated from me only by a thin partition, might not hear me. I had not even thought to close the shutters, for at one moment, raising my eyes, I saw, facing me, in the sky, that same faint glow of a dull red that was to be seen in the restaurant at Rivebelle in a study Elstir had made of a sunset. I recalled the exaltation that, when I had caught sight of it from the train on the day of my arrival in Balbec, this same image of a dusk that was the prelude not to the night, but to a new day, had given me. But no day now would ever again be new for me, would ever again awaken the longing for an unknown happiness, but would merely prolong my sufferings, until I would no longer have the strength to withstand them. The truth of what

Cottard had said to me in the casino in Parville[1] was no longer in any doubt. What I had dreaded, had long vaguely suspected of Albertine, what my instinct had isolated from her whole being, but what my arguments, guided by my desire, had slowly led me to deny, was true! Behind Albertine I no longer saw the blue mountains of the sea, but the room in Montjouvain where she was falling into the arms of Mlle Vinteuil, with that laugh in which she made you hear as it were the unknown sound of her sexual pleasure. For, pretty as Albertine was, how could Mlle Vinteuil, with her proclivities, not have asked her to satisfy them? And the proof that Albertine had not been shocked by this, but had consented, was that they had not quarrelled, but that their intimacy had not ceased to grow. And that graceful movement of Albertine's, resting her chin on Rosemonde's shoulder, gazing at her with a smile, and planting a kiss on her neck, that movement which had reminded me of Mlle Vinteuil, and in the interpretation of which I had yet hesitated to admit that the same line traced by a gesture had necessarily to result from the same penchant, who knows whether Albertine had not simply learned it from Mlle Vinteuil? The colourless sky was slowly catching fire. I, who up until now had never woken up without smiling at the humblest things, at the bowl of café au lait, the sound of the rain, the thunder of the wind, I felt that the day which would be breaking in a moment, and all the days that came after, would never again bring me the hope of an unknown happiness, but a prolonging of my martyrdom. I still held to life; I knew that I could now expect from it only what was cruel. I ran to the lift, despite the unseemly hour, to ring for the 'lift' who filled the duties of night watchman, and I asked him to go to Albertine's room, to tell her I had something important to convey to her, if she were able to receive me. 'Mademoiselle would rather she came to you, was the reply. She'll be here in a moment.' And soon, indeed, Albertine came in in a dressing-gown. 'Albertine,' I said very softly, and warning her not to raise her voice so as not to wake my mother, from whom we were separated only by the same partition, the thinness of which, inopportune today, and obliging us to whisper, had once resembled, when my grandmother's intentions had been so clearly depicted on it, a sort of musical diaphaneity, 'I'm ashamed to have disturbed you. Here. So that you'll understand, I must tell you something you don't know. When I came here, I left a woman whom I was due to marry, who was ready to give up everything for my sake. She was due to leave on a journey this morning and for the past week, every day, I've been wondering whether I'd have the courage not to telegraph her that I was returning. I had the courage, but I was so wretched that I thought I'd kill myself. That's why I asked you last night if you couldn't come and sleep in Balbec. If I was going to die, I'd have liked to say goodbye to you.' And I gave free rein to the tears that my fiction had made natural. 'My poor lamb, had I known, I'd have spent the night with you,' exclaimed Albertine, into whose head the idea that I would perhaps marry this woman, and that her own opportunity of making a 'good marriage' had vanished, never even entered, so sincerely moved was she by an unhappiness whose source I could keep from her, but not its reality and its strength. 'Anyway, she said, yesterday, during the whole journey from La Raspelière, I could certainly tell you were on edge and unhappy, I was afraid of something.' In actual fact, my unhappiness had begun only at Parville, and my edginess, very different but which Albertine happily had confused with it, came from the tedium of living a few more days with her. She went on: 'I shan't leave you again, I'm going to stay here all the time.' She was in fact offering me – and she alone could offer it – the one remedy against the poison that was burning me, homogeneous with it, moreover; the one sweet, the other cruel, both alike had derived from Albertine. At that moment, Albertine – my sickness – relenting from causing me to suffer, left me – she, Albertine the remedy – as susceptible as a convalescent. But I reflected that she would soon be leaving Balbec for Cherbourg and thence for Trieste. Her habits of old were going to be revived. What I wanted above all else, was to prevent Albertine from catching the boat, to try and take her to Paris. Admittedly, from Paris she could, if she wanted, more easily than from Balbec, go to Trieste, but in Paris we would see; perhaps I would be able to ask Mme de Guermantes to influence Mlle Vinteuil's friend indirectly so that she would not remain in Trieste, to get her to accept a position elsewhere, perhaps with the Prince de, whom I had met at Mme de Villeparisis's and even at Mme de Guermantes's. And he, even if Albertine wanted to go there in order to meet her friend, might, forewarned by Mme de Guermantes, prevent them from coming together. True, I might have told myself that in Paris, if Albertine had these proclivities, she would find a great many other people with whom to gratify them. But each impulse of jealousy is particular and bears the stamp of the individual – on this occasion, Mlle Vinteuil's friend – who has excited it. It was Mlle Vinteuil's friend who remained my chief preoccupation. The mysterious passion with which I had once thought about Austria because it was the country from which Albertine had come (her uncle had been a counsellor in the embassy there), and I was able to study its geographical singularity, the race that inhabited it, its monuments, its landscapes, as if in an atlas, in a collection of views, in Albertine's smile and her mannerisms, I experienced that passion again but, its signs now inverted, in the domain of horror. Yes, it was from there that Albertine had come. It was there that, in every house, she would be sure to find again, either Mlle Vinteuil's friend, or else others. Childhood habits would revive, they would be gathering in three months' time for Christmas, then the First of January, dates that were already sad for me in themselves, because of the unconscious memory of the unhappiness I had experienced when, in the old days, they had separated me, all through the New Year holiday, from Gilberte. After the long dinners, after the réveillons,[2] when everyone would be joyful and animated, Albertine would be adopting, with her friends from there, the same attitudes that I had seen her take up with Andrée, and whereas Albertine's friendship with her was innocent, who knows, perhaps the ones that had brought Mlle Vinteuil, pursued by her friend, close before me at Montjouvain. To Mlle Vinteuil, while her friend was tickling her before pouncing on her, I now lent the inflamed features of Albertine, of Albertine whom I could hear, as she ran off, then gave herself up, letting out that strange, deep laugh. What, compared with the pain I was experiencing, was the jealousy I had been able to feel on the day when Saint-Loup had met Albertine with me in Doncières, and when she had led him on? Or that which I had felt when thinking back to the unknown initiator to whom I may have owed the first kisses she had given me in Paris, on the day when I was awaiting Mlle de Stermaria's letter? That other jealousy, provoked by Saint-Loup, or by some young man or other, was nothing. I might in that case have had to fear at most a rival over whom I could have tried to prevail. But this time the rival was not of my own kind, their weapons were different, I could not give battle on the same terrain, or afford Albertine the same pleasures, or even conceive of them accurately. At many moments in our lives, we would barter the whole of the future against an in itself insignificant power. In the old days, I would have renounced all life's advantages to get to know Mme Blatin, because she was a friend of Mme Swann's. Today, in order that Albertine should not go to Trieste, I would have endured all manner of suffering and, were that insufficient, would have inflicted it on her, would have isolated her, locked her away, would have taken away the little money she had so that penury might prevent her physically from making the journey. As. in the old days, when I had wanted to go to Balbec, what drove me to leave was the longing for a Persian church, or for a storm at dawn, what now rent my heart when I thought that Albertine would perhaps be going to Trieste, was that she would spend Christmas night there with Mlle Vinteuil's friend; for the imagination, when it changes its nature and is transformed into sensibility, does not thereby have at its disposal a greater number of simultaneous images. Had I been told that she was not at that moment in Cherbourg, nor in Trieste, that she could not meet Albertine, how I would have wept, for joy and in relief! How my life and its future would have changed! Yet I knew very well that this localization of my jealousy was arbitrary, that if Albertine had these tastes she could gratify them with others. Perhaps even these same girls, if they could have met her elsewhere, would not have tortured my heart so. It was from Trieste, from that unknown world where I felt that Albertine had found enjoyment, where her memories were, her friendships, her childhood loves, that there was exhaled this hostile, inexplicable atmosphere, like that which used to rise up into my room of old in Combray, from the dining-room, where I could hear, laughing and talking with strangers, amidst the sound of forks, Mama, who would not be coming up to say goodnight; like that which, for Swann, had filled the houses where Odette had gone to a soirée in search of unimaginable delights. It was no longer as of some delectable land where the people are pensive, the sunsets golden, the carillons sad, that I now thought of Trieste, but as an accursed city that I would have liked instantly to have burned down and erased from the real world. That town had become lodged in my heart like a permanent arrowhead. To let Albertine leave soon for Cherbourg and Trieste filled me with horror; or even to remain in Balbec. For now that the revelation of my loved one's intimacy with Mlle Vinteuil had made me all but certain, I fancied that at every moment when Albertine was not with me (and there were whole days when, on account of her aunt, I could not see her), she was at the mercy of Bloch's cousins, and perhaps of others. The thought that this very evening she might be meeting Bloch's cousins drove me mad. And so, after she had told me that she would not leave me for the next few days, I replied: 'But the fact is I'd like to leave for Paris. Won't you leave with me? And wouldn't you like to come and live with us for a bit in Paris?' I had at all costs to prevent her being on her own, at least for a few days, to keep her beside me so as to be sure that she could not meet Mlle Vinteuil's friend. It would in reality mean her staying alone with me, for my mother, taking advantage of a tour of inspection that my father would be making, had prescribed it as her duty to obey my grandmother's wish, who had wanted her to go for a few days to Combray to be with one of her sisters. Mama did not like her aunt because she had not been for Grandmother, so affectionate towards her, the sister that she should have been. Thus, once grown up, do children remember with resentment those who have treated them badly. But Mama having become like my grandmother, herself incapable of resentment, her mother's life was for her like a pure and innocent childhood she would draw on for those memories whose sweetness or bitterness governed her actions towards this person or that. My aunt might have supplied Mama with certain invaluable details, but now it would be hard for her to obtain them, her aunt had fallen seriously ill (it was said with cancer), and she reproached herself for not having gone sooner, so as to keep my father company, and saw this simply as one more reason to do as her mother would have done; and just as she went on my grandmother's father's anniversary, who had been such a bad father, to take to his grave the flowers that my grandmother had been in the habit of taking, so, to the side of the grave that was about to open, my mother wanted to bring the consoling conversations that my aunt had not come to offer my grandmother. While she was in Combray, my mother would be taken up with certain building work that my grandmother had always wanted, but only if it was carried out under her daughter's supervision. Thus it had not yet been begun, Mama not wanting, by leaving Paris before my father, to make him feel too much the weight of a loss in which he shared, but which could not afflict him as much as it did her. 'Oh, it wouldn't be possible at this moment, replied Albertine. Anyway, why do you need to go back to Paris so soon, when the lady in question has gone? – Because I shall be calmer in a place where I knew her, rather than in Balbec, which she has never seen and which I've come to abominate.' Did Albertine later come to realize that this other woman did not exist, and that if, on that particular night, I had truly wanted to die, it was because she had thoughtlessly revealed to me that she was friendly with the friend of Mlle Vinteuil? It is possible. There are times when it strikes me as probable. At all events, on the morning in question, she believed in the woman's existence. 'But you should marry this lady, mon petit, she said, you'd be happy and she would surely be happy also.' I answered that the thought that I might make this woman happy had indeed all but decided me; recently, when I had come into a large inheritance that would enable me to give my wife every pleasure and luxury, I had been on the verge of accepting the sacrifice of her whom I loved. Intoxicated by the gratitude inspired in me by Albertine's kindness, so soon after the atrocious suffering she had caused me, just as we would gladly promise the café waiter a fortune who is pouring us a sixth glass of brandy, I told her that my wife would have a motor-car and a yacht; that, from this point of view, since Albertine was so fond of motoring and of yachting, it was unfortunate that it was not her whom I loved; that I would have been the perfect husband for her, but that we would see, we would perhaps find it agreeable to see one another. In spite of everything, just as, in a state of drunkenness, we refrain from accosting passers-by for fear of blows, I refrained from the imprudence I would have committed in the days of Gilberte, of telling her that it was her, Albertine, that I loved. 'You see, I all but married her. But I didn't dare do it, however, I wouldn't have wanted to make a young woman live with someone so sickly and so tiresome. – But you're crazy, everyone would like to live with you, look how everyone seeks you out. You're all they ever talk about at Mme Verdurin's, and in the wider world, too, so I'm told. So she wasn't being nice to you, this lady, was she, by having the effect of making you doubt yourself? I can tell what she is, she's spiteful and I hate her, oh, if it'd been me…! – No, no, she's very kind, too kind. As for the Verdurins and all the rest, I don't give a fig. Apart from the woman that I love and whom I've anyway given up, I care only for my little Albertine, she's the only one, by seeing a lot of me – in the early days at least, I added, so as not to alarm her and to be able to ask a lot of her during these days – who can console me a little.' I made only a vague allusion to the possibility of marriage, while saying that it was unrealizable because our characters would not be in harmony. In spite of myself, still pursued in my jealousy by the memory of Saint-Loup's relations with 'Rachel when of the Lord' and of those of Swann with Odette, I was too given to believing that the moment I was in love, I could not be loved and that self-interest alone could attach a woman to me. It was no doubt foolish to judge Albertine in terms of Odette and Rachel. But it was not her, it was me; it was the sentiments I might inspire which my jealousy caused me to underestimate. And of this – perhaps erroneous – judgment were no doubt born many of the misfortunes that would befall us. 'You refuse my invitation for Paris, then? – My aunt wouldn't want me to leave at present. Anyway, even if I can later on, wouldn't it look funny, my coming to stay with you like that? In Paris they'd know very well I'm not your cousin. – Well, we'll say we're more or less engaged. What does it matter, since you know it isn't true?' Albertine's neck, the whole of which was protruding from her nightdress, was powerful, golden, coarse-grained. I kissed it as innocently as if I had been kissing my mother, to still a childish unhappiness that I thought then I would never be able to tear out from my heart. Albertine left me to go and get dressed. Her devotion was already weakening, in any case; a little earlier, she had said she would not leave me for a second. (And I felt indeed that her resolution would not last because I was afraid that, if we stayed in Balbec, she might that same evening, if it were not for me, meet Bloch's cousins.) Yet now she had just told me she wanted to go over to Maineville and would come back and see me during the afternoon. She had not been home the previous evening, there might be letters for her, moreover her aunt might be worried. I had replied: 'If that's the only reason, we can send the "lift" to tell your aunt you're here and fetch your letters.' And, wanting to show she was kind, though annoyed at being subjugated, she had wrinkled her brow and then, suddenly, very kindly, said 'That's right', and had sent the 'lift'. Albertine had left me only for a moment before the 'lift' came and tapped on the door. I had not expected him, while I was talking with Albertine, to have had the time to go to Maineville and then return. He came to tell me that Albertine had written a note to her aunt and that she could, if I wanted, come to Paris that same day. She had on the other hand been wrong to give him the message orally, for already, despite the earliness of the hour, the manager had heard and came, distraught, to ask me if I was unhappy about something, if I really was leaving, if I could not wait at least for a few days, the wind today being somewhat fearful (to be feared). I refused to explain that I wanted at all costs for Albertine no longer to be in Balbec at the hour when Bloch's cousins took their walk, especially with Andrée, who alone might have able to shield her, not being there, and that Balbec was like those places in which an invalid, who can no longer breathe there, has decided, even though he may die along the way, not to spend another night. For the rest, I was going to have to battle against entreaties of the same kind, in the hotel first of all, where Marie Gineste and Céleste Albaret were red-eyed. (Marie, moreover, gave vent to the urgent sobbing of a mountain torrent; the more lethargic Céleste urged her to calm; but Marie having murmured the only lines of poetry that she knew, 'Ici-bas tous les lilas meurent', Céleste could not contain herself and a sheet of tears spilled across her lilac-coloured face; I imagine, on the other hand, that they had forgotten me by that same evening.) Then, on the little branch-line train, despite all my precautions against being seen, I encountered M. de Cambremer, who, at the sight of my trunks, turned pale, for he had been counting on me for two days' hence; he exasperated me by trying to persuade me that my breathless attacks depended on the change in the weather and that October would be ideal for them, and he asked me whether, at all events, I could not 'put off my departure for a week', an expression whose stupidity enraged me only perhaps because what he was proposing made me feel sick. And while he was speaking to me in the carriage, I was afraid at each station of seeing there appear, more terrible than Herimbald or Guiscard, M. de Crécy begging for an invitation, or more dreadful still, Mme Verdurin, insisting on inviting me. But that would happen only in a few hours' time. I had not yet reached that point. I had to confront only the despairing lamentations of the manager. I showed him the door, because I was afraid that, though he was whispering, he would wake Mama. I remained alone in the room, that same room with the too-high ceiling where I had been so unhappy on my first arrival, where I had had such tender thoughts of Mlle de Stermaria, had watched out for Albertine and her friends to go past like migrating birds that had paused on the beach, where I had possessed her with such indifference when I had sent the 'lift' to fetch her, where I had experienced my grandmother's goodness, then learned that she was dead; these shutters, at the foot of which the morning light was falling, I had opened them that first time to see the first foothills of the sea (the shutters that Albertine had made me close so that we should not be seen kissing). I became more clearly aware of my own transformations by contrasting them with the self-identity of things. Yet we become accustomed to these as we do to people and when, suddenly, we recall the different meaning that they carried, and then, once they had lost all meaning, the events, very different from those of today, for which they had been the setting, the diversity of the actions performed beneath the same ceiling, between the same glass-fronted bookcases, the change in our hearts and in our lives which that diversity implies seems further enhanced by the immutable permanence of the décor, reinforced by the unity of place.

I two or three times had the idea, momentarily, that the world in which this room and these book-cases were, and in which Albertine counted for so little, was perhaps an intellectual world, which was the sole reality, and my unhappiness something like that which we get from reading a novel, and which a madman alone could make into a lasting and permanent unhappiness, extending into his life; that it would take only a slight effort of will perhaps to attain to that real world, to return into it by passing beyond my grief, as though bursting through a paper hoop, and no more to care about what Albertine had done than we care about the actions of the imaginary heroine of a novel after we have finished reading it. Moreover, the mistresses whom I have loved the most have never coincided with my love for them. This love was true, since I subordinated everything else to seeing them, to keeping them for myself alone, since I would sob if, one evening, I had waited for them. But they had the peculiar quality of arousing that love, of carrying it to a paroxysm, rather than of being the image of it. When I saw them, when I listened to them, I found nothing in them that might resemble my love or be able to explain it. Yet my one joy was to see them, my one anxiety to wait for them. It was as if a virtue having no connection with them had been adjoined to them incidentally by nature, and that this virtue, this electricity-like power, had the effect on me of exciting my love, that is to say of directing all my actions and causing all my sufferings. But from this, the beauty, or the intelligence, or the goodness of these women were wholly distinct. As though by an electric current that moves you, I have been shaken by my love affairs, I have lived them, I have felt them; never have I succeeded in seeing them or thinking them. I incline even to think that in these affairs (I leave aside the physical pleasure which is of course their habitual accompaniment, but is not enough to constitute them), beneath the outward appearance of the woman, it is to these invisible forces by which she is incidentally accompanied that we address ourselves, as if to obscure divinities. It is they whose good-will is necessary to us, contact with which we seek without finding any positive pleasure in it. During our assignations, the woman puts us in touch with these goddesses, and hardly anything more. We have, as offerings, promised jewels and voyages, and uttered forms of words which signify that we adore her, and contrary forms of words which signify our indifference. We have expended all our influence on obtaining a fresh assignation, but one to be accorded without annoyance. But is it for the woman herself, were she not completed by these occult forces, that we would go to so much trouble, when, once she has gone, we would be unable to say how she was dressed, and we realize that we have not even looked at her?

What a deceitful sense sight is! A human body, even when loved, as was that of Albertine, seems, from a few metres, a few centimetres away, distant from us. And the soul that belongs to it likewise. Except that, should something come violently to alter the position of that soul in relation to us, to show us that it loves other human beings and not ourselves, then, by the beating of our dislocated hearts, we feel that the cherished creature was not a few feet away, but inside us. Inside us, in more or less superficial regions. But the words 'That friend is Mlle Vinteuil' had been the 'Open sesame' that I would have been incapable of finding for myself, which had caused Albertine to penetrate deep into my lacerated heart. And I might have searched for a hundred years without knowing how the door might be reopened that had closed on her.

I had ceased hearing these words momentarily while Albertine was with me a little earlier. In kissing her as I had used to kiss my mother in Combray to calm my anguish, I almost believed in Albertine's innocence or at least did not think in any coherent way of the discovery I had made of her vice. But now that I was alone, the words rang out once more like those noises inside the ear that we hear as soon as someone has stopped talking to us. Her vice was now no longer in any doubt. The light of the sun, which was about to come up, by modifying the objects around me, made me once again, as if shifting my position for a moment in relation to it, aware, even more cruelly, of my pain. Never had I seen so beautiful and so sorrowful a morning. Reflecting on all the indifferent landscapes that were about to be illuminated, and which, only yesterday, would have filled me only with the desire to visit them, I could not contain a sob, when, in a mechanically executed gesture of oblation, seeming to symbolize for me the bloody sacrifice that I was about to have to make of all joy, each morning, until the end of my life, a renewal, solemnly celebrated at each dawning of my daily unhappiness and of the blood from my wound, the golden egg of the sun, as if propelled by the break in equilibrium produced at the moment of coagulation by a change of density, barbed with flames as in paintings, burst in one bound through the curtain behind which I had sensed it quivering for the past few moments, ready to enter on to the stage and to spring upwards, and whose mysterious, congealed purple it erased beneath floods of light. I could hear myself crying. But at that moment, against all expectation, the door opened, and, my heart pounding, I seemed to see my grandmother before me, as in one of those apparitions that I had already had, but only in my sleep. Was all this only a dream, then? Alas, I was wide awake. 'You think I look like your poor grandmother,' said Mama – for it was her – gently, as if to calm my fright, admitting, however, to the resemblance, with a lovely smile of modest pride in which coquettishness had never had any part. Her disordered hair, in which the grey strands had not been hidden but were wound about her anxious eyes and her ageing cheeks, my grandmother's dressing-gown even that she was wearing, all had prevented me for a second from recognizing her and made me unsure whether I was asleep or whether my grandmother had been resurrected. For a long time now, my mother had resembled my grandmother far more than the young and laughing Mama that my childhood had known. But I had never given it another thought. Thus it is, when we have been sitting for a long time reading, distracted, we have not noticed that time has been passing and we suddenly find, round about us, the sun, drawn inevitably to pass through the same phases, unmistakably recalling the sun there was at the same hour the day before, and awakening around it the same harmonies, the same correspondences preparatory to the sunset. It was with a smile that my mother drew my attention to my mistake, for it was a comfort to her to bear so close a resemblance to her mother. 'I came, she said, because when I was asleep I thought I could hear someone crying. It woke me up. But how is it you're not in bed? And your eyes are full of tears. What's the matter?' I took her head in my arms: 'Mama, there, I'm afraid you'll think me very changeable. But first of all, yesterday I didn't talk to you very nicely about Albertine; what I said was unfair. – But why should that matter?' my mother said, and catching sight of the rising sun, she gave a sad smile, thinking of her mother, and so that I should not lose the benefit of a spectacle that my grandmother regretted that I never watched, she pointed to the window. But behind the beach of Balbec, the sea, and the sunrise, to which Mama was pointing, I could see, in a fit of despair that did not escape her, the room in Montjouvain where Albertine, pink, curled up in a ball like a big cat, with her mischievous nose, had taken the place of Mlle Vinteuil's friend and was saying, to peals of her voluptuous laughter: 'Oh well, if we're seen, that'll only make it better. Me, I wouldn't dare spit on that old ape?' This was the scene I could see behind that spread out in the window, which was nothing more than a mournful veil, superimposed on the other like a reflection. It seemed itself indeed almost unreal, like a painted view. Facing us, where the Parville cliffs jutted out, the leafy tableau of the little wood where we had played hunt-the-ring sloped all the way down to the sea, beneath the still golden sheen of the water, as at that hour when often, at the day's end, when I had gone to have a siesta there with Albertine, we had got to our feet on seeing the sun go down. In the disorder of the night mists that still hung in blue and pink shreds over waters littered with the pearly debris of the dawn, boats were passing, smiling at the oblique light that had turned their sails and the tips of their bowsprits yellow, as when they return home in the evening: an imaginary scene, shivering and deserted, a pure evocation of the sunset, which did not rest, like the dusk, on the succession of hours of the day that I was in the habit of seeing precede it, slender, interpolated, more insubstantial even than the horrible image of Montjouvain that it had not succeeded in cancelling out, in covering, in concealing – a vain and poetic image of the memory and of the dream. 'But come, said my mother, you didn't speak any ill of her, you told me she bored you a little, that you were happy at having given up the idea of marrying her. That's no reason to cry like that. Remember that your Mama is leaving today and is going to be desolate at leaving her darling in this state. All the more, my poor child, because I hardly have time to console you. For though my things may be ready, one doesn't have all that much time on a day of departure. – It's not that.' And then, calculating the future, carefully weighing my determination, realizing that an affection such as that of Albertine for the friend of Mlle Vinteuil and over so long a period, can not have been innocent, that Albertine had been initiated, and, as all her gestures had demonstrated to me, had been born moreover with a predisposition to vice of which my anxiety had all too often had a presentiment, to which she can never have ceased to yield (to which she was perhaps yielding at this very minute, taking advantage of a moment when I was not present), I told my mother, knowing the pain I was causing her, which she did not show and which betrayed itself in her only by that look of serious concern she wore when she compared the gravity of making me unhappy or of doing me harm, the look she had worn in Combray for the first time when she had resigned herself to spending the night beside me, that look which at this moment bore an extraordinary resemblance to that of my grandmother when she allowed me to drink cognac, I said to my mother: 'I know the pain I'm going to cause you. First of all, instead of remaining here as you wanted, I'm going to leave at the same time as you. But that's by no means all. I don't feel well here, I prefer to go home. But listen, don't be too upset. It's this. I was mistaken, I misled you in good faith yesterday, I've been thinking it over all night. I absolutely must, and let that be decided here and now, because I now realize clearly, because I shan't change again, and I couldn't live without it, I absolutely must marry Albertine.'

BOOK V
The Prisoner

From early morning, with my face still turned to the wall and before I had seen, above the tall window curtains, the colour of the line of morning light, I already knew what kind of day it was. I could tell from the first street noises, whether they reached me muffled and distorted by dampness or twanging like arrows in the empty, resonant space of a wide-open morning, icy and pure. The rumbling of the first tram told me whether it was huddled against the rain or forging gaily towards a blue horizon. And maybe even those sounds had been preceded by some swifter, more penetrating emanation which had slid into my sleep and suffused it with a sadness foretelling snow, or had found there a certain little intermittent figure which it set to singing so many rousing hymns in praise of the sun that, though still asleep, I would begin to smile, my closed eyes preparing to be dazzled, until a crash of music finally brought me awake. It was, in fact, mainly from my bedroom that I perceived the world around me at this period. I know Bloch spread the story that when he came to see me in the evening, he would hear the sound of conversation; since my mother was at Combray and he never found anyone in my room, he concluded that I was talking to myself. When, much later, he found out that Albertine had been living with me then and realized that I had been hiding her from everyone, he declared that he understood at last why, at that time in my life, I never wanted to go out. He was wrong. Very understandably so, since reality, even if it is inevitable, is not completely predictable; those who learn some correct detail about the life of another promptly jump from it to quite incorrect conclusions and see in the newly discovered fact the explanation for things which in truth are completely unrelated to it.

When I think now of how my friend had left Balbec with me and come back to Paris to live under the same roof, giving up her idea of going on a cruise; of how she slept twenty paces from my bedroom, at the end of the corridor, in my father's little room with the tapestries, and how every evening, very late, before leaving me to sleep, she would slip her tongue into my mouth like my daily bread, like a nourishing food having the almost sacred character of all flesh on which suffering – the suffering that we have endured for its sake – has conferred a kind of spiritual sweetness, then the analogy which springs to my mind is not the night which Captain de Borodino allowed me to spend at the barracks – a favour which, after all, cured a mere passing malaise–but that other night when my father sent Mama to sleep in the little bed next to mine. So true is it that life, if it decides once more to spare us a trial which seems inevitable, does so in a different manner – such a contradictory manner, sometimes, that it appears almost sacrilegious to recognize that the grace granted to us is the same!

Once Albertine had learned from Françoise that, in the darkness of my room with its still-closed curtains, I was not sleeping, she did not bother to avoid making a small amount of noise as she washed in her bathroom. So then I would often go into another bathroom adjoining hers, which was a pleasant place. In former times a theatrical producer would spend hundreds of thousands of francs to stud with real emeralds the throne from which the diva would play the part of an empress. The Russian Ballet has taught us that simple, well-directed lighting effects can flood the stage with jewels just as sumptuous and more varied. This new décor, already more immaterial, is still not so charming as the one which the eight o'clock sun produces in place of what we were accustomed to see when we did not rise until midday. The windows of our two bathrooms were not clear but, so that we could not be seen from outside, were all puckered into an old-fashioned, artificial frost effect. The sun suddenly turned this net of glass to yellow, gilded it and, gently uncovering in me a young man of former times who had been long hidden by habit, intoxicated me with memories, as if I had been in the open air looking at gilded foliage in which not even the presence of a bird was wanting. For I could hear Albertine endlessly whistling:

> Sorrows are crazy
> And listening to them is crazier still.

I was too fond of her not to smile happily at her bad musical taste. Mme Bontemps, I may say, had had a passion for that song the previous summer, until she heard that it was a silly thing, whereupon, instead of asking Albertine to sing it when people called, she began to ask for:

> A farewell song rises from troubled springs which in turn became 'that old thing of Massenet's that the child is always trotting out'. A cloud would pass, hiding the sun, and I would see the modest foliage of the glass curtain turn dull and lapse into a grisaille.

Albertine's bathroom was just like mine but, since there was another at the other end of the flat, Mama had never used this one for fear of disturbing me with noise. The walls separating the two were so thin that we could chat to each other as we washed, carrying on a conversation interrupted only by the sound of the water, in the kind of intimacy which is often produced in hotels by the cramped space and nearness of the rooms, but which in Paris is so rare. At other times, I stayed in bed, dreaming for as long as I liked, for the orders were never to come into my room until I had rung. Because of the inconvenient way in which the bell-push had been hung over my bed, reaching it took so long that sometimes, tiring of the effort to grasp it and enjoying being alone, I almost went back to sleep. Not that I was completely indifferent to Albertine's presence in the family flat. By separating her from her friends I had succeeded in sparing my heart further suffering. I had placed it in a position of rest, of near immobility which would help it to heal. But the state of calm which my friend's presence produced in me was an alleviation of suffering rather than actual joy. Not that it did not allow me to enjoy many pleasures from which my previous, acute pain had closed me off, but far from owing these pleasures to Albertine, whom I hardly even found pretty any more, in whose company I was bored and whom I had a clear sense of no longer loving, I experienced them, on the contrary, when she was not with me. So I would begin the morning by not having her called at once, especially if the weather were fine. For a few moments, knowing that his company made me happier than hers, I remained in private colloquy with the little inner figure, singer of salutations to the sun, whom I mentioned a moment ago. Of all the persons who make up our individual selves, the most apparent are not the most essential. When illness has eliminated them one by one, there will survive in me a final two or three, the hardest to kill off, and notably one, a philosopher who is happy only when he has discovered, between two works of art or between two sensations, a common factor. But I have sometimes wondered if the last of all will not be the little man very like another little man that the Combray optician kept in his shop window, who took his hood off whenever the sun shone and put it back on again if it was going to rain. I know that little man, with all his egoism; I can be suffering an asthma attack which only the coming of rain would relieve, he does not care and, at the first drops that I have been so longing for, he scowls and crossly pulls up his hood. On the other hand, I feel sure that on my deathbed, when all my other 'I's' are already gone, if there is a blink of sun, while I am drawing my last breaths, the little barometer man will be delighted and will take his hood off and sing, 'Ah! The sun at last!'

I rang for Françoise. I opened the Figaro. I looked for, and once more did not find, an article or something calling itself an article which I had sent to that newspaper and which was nothing but a slightly rearranged version of the recently rediscovered page which I had written in Dr Percepied's carriage while looking at the steeples of Martinville. Then I read Mama's latest letter. She found it strange, shocking, that an unmarried girl should be living alone with me. It may be that on the first day, when we were leaving Balbec, when she saw me looking so unhappy and was worried about leaving me alone, she had been pleased to hear that Albertine was coming with us and to see loaded on to the train, next to our luggage (the luggage I had spent the night weeping over in the hotel in Balbec), Albertine's narrow black boxes, which had seemed to me to have the shape of coffins, so that I did not know whether they would bring life into our house, or death. But I did not even think about Mama's feelings, being entirely caught up in the joy of that radiant morning and the thought that, after all my fear of staying in Balbec, I was taking Albertine home with me. Mama may not have been hostile to the scheme at first (she spoke kindly to my friend, as a mother does whose son has been seriously wounded and who is grateful to the young mistress who is devotedly nursing him), but she became so as it was too thoroughly carried out, and as the young woman's stay in our house – in our house in the absence of my parents – became prolonged. I cannot say, however, that she ever made her hostility plain to me. Just as before, when she felt she could no longer reproach me with my nervous disposition, my laziness, now she was afraid – something I perhaps did not entirely understand at the time or did not wish to understand – that by expressing any reservations about the girl to whom I said I was going to become engaged, she might cast a shadow over my future life, make me less committed to my wife, perhaps lead me to reproach myself, once she was gone, for having hurt her by marrying Albertine. Mama preferred to seem to endorse a choice that she felt she would not be able to make me reconsider. But everyone who saw her at that time told me that her sorrow at having lost her own mother was aggravated by a look of perpetual worry. This mental strain, this constant argument with herself, made Mama's temples over-heat, and she was constantly opening windows to try to cool down. But she could not take a decision for fear of 'influencing' me in the wrong direction and spoiling what she thought was my happiness. She could not even make up her mind to stop me having Albertine in the flat in the meantime. She did not want to appear more strict than Mme Bontemps, whose place it was, if anyone's, to act, and who did not find the arrangement unsuitable, much to my mother's surprise. In any case she was sorry to have been obliged to leave the two of us together by having to set off just then for Combray, where she saw she might have to stay (and did indeed stay) for many months, during which time my great-aunt needed her by her day and night. Everything there was made easy for her by the kindness, the devotion of Legrandin, for whom nothing was too much trouble, who put off from week to week his return to Paris, simply because my aunt, whom he did not know particularly well, had been a friend of his mother's, and because he realized that the dying woman valued his attentions and could not do without him. Snobbery is a serious malady of the soul, but a localized one which does not affect it overall. I, on the other hand, was delighted by Mama's absence in Combray, for it meant that Albertine (whom I could not ask to conceal it) would not be able to mention to her her friendship with Mlle Vinteuil. This relationship would, in my mother's eyes, have utterly precluded not only a marriage, which she had in any case asked me not to discuss in too definite terms with my friend and which furthermore was coming to seem intolerable to me, but even a stay in our house by Albertine as a guest. Failing such a serious reason, of which she was not aware, Mama, under the double effect of her mother's edifying and liberating example on the one hand (Grandmother, that admirer of George Sand, who defined virtue as nobility of heart) and on the other my own corrupting influence, now showed tolerance for women of whose conduct she would once have been severely critical and whom she would have condemned even now if they had been middle-class friends of hers from Paris or Combray, but whose great souls I praised to her and whom she forgave much because they were fond of me. In spite of everything, and even setting aside the question of propriety, I think Albertine would have exhausted Mama's patience, for Mama had learned at Combray, from Aunt Léonie and from all her female relations, habits of order of which my friend had not the slightest inkling. She would no more have closed a door nor, on the other hand, hesitated to enter a room where the door was open than would a dog or a cat. Her somewhat inconvenient charm consisted in being in the house not in the manner of a young girl but of a domestic animal which comes into a room, goes out, turns up in the place you least expect it, jumps on to the bed – I found this deeply restful – lies down beside one, makes a place for itself and lies there without moving, without annoying one as a person would. However, she finally adapted herself to my sleeping hours and learned, not just not to try to come into my room, but even not to make any noise until I rang. It was Françoise who set these rules for her. Françoise was one of those Combray servants who know their master's importance, and that the least they can do is to make everyone show him the respect they think is his due. When a visitor from outside gave Françoise a tip to be shared with the kitchen-maid, the donor hardly had time to hand over his coin before Françoise, with equal speed, discretion and energy, had primed the girl to appear and thank him, not under her breath but loudly and clearly, as Françoise had told her was the right way to do. The curé of Combray was not a genius, but he too knew how things should be done. Under his instruction, the daughter of some Protestant cousins of Mme Sazerat's had been converted to Catholicism, and the family had shown him all due appreciation. There was a question of her marrying a nobleman from Méséglise. The young man's parents wrote asking for information about her, a rather disdainful letter in which they showed contempt for her Protestant birth. The priest replied in such terms that the nobleman had to swallow his pride and write a very different letter, begging as the most precious favour to be allowed to form an alliance with the young lady.

There was no personal merit in the way Françoise taught Albertine to respect my sleep. She was steeped in the old tradition. Her silence, or her brusque reply to Albertine's no doubt innocent suggestion that she might enter my room or that Françoise might ask me for something, made my friend realize with astonishment that she had entered a new world of unknown customs, ruled by laws of behaviour that no one could think of breaking. Albertine had had a foretaste of this in Balbec, but in Paris she did not even try to resist, and waited patiently each morning for the sound of my bell before daring to make any noise.

Her education by Françoise was in any case good for our old servant herself, for it gradually moderated the level of the complaints that she had been uttering ever since our return from Balbec. For, just as we were getting into the tram, she had realized that she had forgotten to say goodbye to the 'housekeeper' of the hotel, a moustachioed person who watched over the landings and corridors, who barely knew Françoise but had been reasonably polite to her. Françoise was determined to turn back, to get off the tram, go back to the hotel, say a proper goodbye to the housekeeper and not leave until the next day. Good sense and above all my sudden horror of Balbec prevented me from allowing this, but ever since then she had been suffering from a feverish ill-humour, which the change of air did not relieve and which was persisting in Paris. For according to Françoise's code, as it is set forth in the bas-reliefs of Saint-André-des-Champs, to desire the death of an enemy, even to inflict it on him, is not forbidden, but it is dreadful not to do the right thing, not to return a favour, to be ignorant and not say goodbye to the lady on the landing. Throughout the journey, the constantly recurring memory of not having said goodbye to this woman would bring an alarming scarlet flush to Françoise's cheeks. And if she refused to eat or drink until we got to Paris, it was perhaps because this memory really 'weighed on her stomach' (every social class has its own pathology), and not just that she wanted to punish us.

One of the reasons why Mama wrote me a letter every day, every letter including a quotation from Mme de Sévigné,[1] was the memory of her mother. Mama would write to me, 'Mme Sazerat gave us one of her special little luncheons, the kind which, as your poor grandmother would have said, quoting Mme de Sévigné, take us from solitude without offering us company.' In an early answer, I was foolish enough to write to her, 'Your mother would recognize you at once from your choice of quotations,' only to receive the reply: 'Silly boy, imagine quoting Mme de Sévigné to talk to me about my mother. She would have answered you as she did Mme de Grignan: "Was she nothing to you? I thought you were related".'

At this point, I would hear my friend's footsteps coming or going from her bedroom. I would ring the bell, because this was the time when Andrée came with the chauffeur (a friend of Morel's, lent by the Verdurins) to collect Albertine. I had mentioned to Albertine the distant possibility of our marrying, but I had never made a formal proposal; she, for her part, out of modesty, when I had said, 'I don't know, but perhaps we could,' had shaken her head with a sad smile, saying, 'No, of course we couldn't,' meaning, 'I am too poor.' And so, while dismissing any long-term project with the words 'it's all very uncertain', I did everything possible to amuse her, to make her life pleasant, perhaps also, unconsciously, trying to make her want to marry me. Albertine herself laughed at all this luxury. 'Wouldn't Andrée's mother pull a face if she saw I'd become a rich lady like her, what she calls a lady with "horses, carriages, pictures". What? Didn't I ever tell you about her saying that? Oh, she's a real character. What surprises me is that she puts the pictures on the same level as the horses and carriages.'

For, as we shall see later, in spite of some silly habits of speech that she had retained, Albertine had developed astonishingly, something which was a matter of complete indifference to me, superior intelligence in a woman having always interested me so little that if I remarked on it to one or other of them, it has always been from mere politeness.

Only the curious genius of Céleste might have appealed to me. I could not keep from smiling for a few moments when, for example, knowing that Albertine was not there and seizing the opportunity, she approached me with the words, 'O heavenly being set down on a bed.' I said, 'Really, Céleste, what do you mean, "heavenly being"? – Well, if you think you're anything like the creatures who walk on our humble earth, you're much mistaken – But why "set down" on a bed?

You can see that I'm lying down. – You never lie down. No one lies down like that. You floated down there. Those white pyjamas you're wearing today and the way you move your neck make you look like a dove.'

Albertine, even when she was talking about trivial things, now spoke in quite a different manner from that of the little girl she had been just a few years before, at Balbec. She would go so far as to say, about a political event of which she disapproved, 'I think that's beyond everything,' and I am not sure if it was not around that time that she learned to say, meaning that she found a book badly written, 'It's interesting, but really, he's made a pig's ear of the writing.' The taboo on entering my room before I had rung amused her greatly. As she had caught our family habit of quotation, and chose hers from the plays in which she had acted at the convent and which I had said I liked, she always compared me to Ahasuerus:

Et la mort est le prix de tout audacieux
Qui sans être appelé se présente a ses yeux.
. . . . . .
Rien ne met a l'abri de cet ordre fatal,
Ni le rang, ni le sexe, et le crime est égal.
. . . . . .
Moi-même …
Je suis à cette loi comme une autre soumise,
Et sans le prévenir il faut pour lui parler
Qu'il me cherche ou du moins qu'il me fasse appeler.[2]

Physically, too, she had changed. Her long blue eyes – longer now – had taken on a new shape; they were still the same colour, but seemed to have changed to the liquid state, so that, when she closed them, it was like drawing curtains to shut out a view of the sea. It was no doubt this part of her that I chiefly remembered when I left her each night. For, on the contrary, the tight waviness of her hair, for example, came to me for a long time as a daily surprise, like something new, as if I had never seen it before. And yet, springing above the smiling gaze of a young girl, what is more beautiful than this curly crown of black violets? There is more promise of friendship in the smile; but the little shiny tendrils of flowering hair, nearer relatives of the flesh which they seem to transpose into tiny, moving waves, take a stronger hold upon our desire. She would come into my bedroom, jump straight on to the bed and sometimes begin to define the character of my intelligence, or swear in a genuine rush of feeling that she would rather die than leave me: those were the days when I had shaved before calling her in. She was one of those women who cannot disentangle the reasons for their feelings. Seeing a fresh complexion gives them pleasure; they attribute it to the personal qualities of the man who seems to promise them a future of happiness: happiness which seems to shrink and to become less necessary to them as one's beard grows back again.

I would ask where she planned to go that day. 'I think Andrée wants to take me to the Buttes-Chaumont;[3] I've never been there.' It was certainly beyond me to guess whether these words, among so many others, concealed a lie. In any case I trusted Andrée to tell me all the places she went to with Albertine. In Balbec, when I felt I had really had enough of Albertine, I had planned to say, untruthfully, to Andrée: 'Dear Andrée, if only I had met you again sooner! You're the one I should have fallen in love with. But now I'm in love with someone else. All the same, we can see a lot of each other, for my love for this other person is making me so unhappy and you will help me to get over it.' But these same lying words had become te truth only three weeks later. Maybe, once in Paris, Andrée did come to believe that it was a lie and that I did love her, as she would surely have come to think in Balbec. For the truth changes so much for us that other people can hardly keep track of it. And as I knew that she would tell me everything she and Albertine did together, I had asked her, and she had agreed, to come and take Albertine out practically every day. In this way I could safely stay at home. And Andrée's privileged position as one of the girls of the little gang gave me confidence that she would be able to influence Albertine to do anything I wanted. Truly, I could now have told her in all honesty that she would be able to give me peace of mind.

It is also true that my choice of Andrée (who happened to be in Paris at this time, having given up her plan to go back to Balbec) as my friend's companion had been influenced by what Albertine had told me about her friend's attachment to me when we were in Balbec, at a time when I feared I bored her; had I known of this at the time I might indeed have fallen in love with Andrée after all. 'What, you mean you didn't know?' said Albertine. 'We used to joke about it among ourselves. Anyway, didn't you notice how she'd started to talk like you, to use your arguments? Especially when she'd just been with you, it stood out a mile. She didn't have to tell us that she'd seen you. As soon as she arrived, if she'd been with you, we could tell at once. We'd look at each other and laugh. She was like a coalman trying to pretend he isn't a coalman, but he's all black. A miller doesn't have to tell you he's a miller, you can see the flour all over him and the place where the sack was on his back. Andrée was just the same, she moved her eyebrows like you, and then that long neck of hers, I can't explain. When I pick up a book that's been in your bedroom, I can take it out of doors, but anyone can still tell it's yours because there's always a trace of your horrible disinfectants. It's a tiny thing, I can't tell you, but there's just a hint which is actually quite nice. Every time somebody said anything nice about you, or seemed to think a lot of you, Andrée was in the seventh heaven.'

Even so, just to be sure that nothing had been planned without my knowledge, I would advise them not to go to the Buttes-Chaumont that day, but to go instead to Saint-Cloud, or somewhere else.

It was certainly not that I loved Albertine in the slightest: I knew that. Perhaps love is nothing but the ripple effect of those disturbances which, in the wake of an emotion, stir up the soul. My whole soul had been profoundly agitated when Albertine had told me, at Balbec, about Mlle Vinteuil, but these disturbances were over now. I no longer loved Albertine, for nothing remained of the pain, now cured, which I had suffered in the tram at Balbec when I learned what Albertine's adolescence had been, including, perhaps, visits to Montjouvain. I had turned it all over in my mind for too long, the pain was gone. But occasionally certain ways of speaking of Albertine's led me to think – I do not know why – that she must have received in her time, short as it still was, a great many compliments, declarations of love, propositions, and received them with pleasure: that is, sensual pleasure. For example, she said apropos of anything and everything, 'Really? Is that really true?' Certainly, if she had said like Odette and others of her kind, 'Really? Are all those lies really true?' I would have taken no notice, for the absurdity of the saying would simply have been typical of the stupid banality of women's humour. But her questioning look as she said 'Is it really?' gave, on the one hand, the strange impression of a creature which cannot take in things for itself, which appeals to your judgment, as if it did not have the same faculties as you (if you said, 'We left an hour ago' or 'It's raining', she would reply 'Did we really?' or 'Is it really?'). On the other hand, unfortunately, this apparent difficulty in registering outward phenomena for herself was probably not in fact the origin of her 'Really? Is it really?' It seemed more likely that these words had developed, at the time of her precocious sexual maturity, as a response to 'You know, I've never known anyone as pretty as you,' 'You know I'm really in love with you, I'm dreadfully excited,' sayings which were received with the yielding, coquettishly modest 'Really?', 'Are you really?' which, with me, Albertine now only used in response to such observations as, 'You've been dozing for an hour' – 'Really?'

Without feeling at all in love with Albertine, without numbering among my pleasures the moments we spent together, I still worried about how she spent her time; certainly, I had fled Balbec so as to be sure that she would no longer be able to see certain women or girls with whom I was afraid that she might transgress, laughing the while – perhaps laughing at me – so afraid that I had craftily tried, by my departure, to break off in one go all her dangerous friendships. And Albertine's passivity was so intense, her ability to forget and to submit so extreme, that these friendships had in fact been broken off and the phobia which obsessed me, cured. But this phobia can take on as many forms as the uncertain evil which is its object. For so long as my jealousy was not reincarnated in new persons, I had enjoyed, after my earlier sufferings, an interval of calm. But a chronic illness needs only the smallest pretext to recur, just as the perverse impulses of the being which is the cause of the jealousy need only the slightest opportunity to reassert themselves (after an interval of chastity) with new partners. I had managed to separate Albertine from her accomplices and thereby to exorcize my hallucinations; but even though it was possible to make her forget particular people, to shorten her attachments, still her love of pleasure, like my jealousy, was chronic and perhaps was only waiting for an opportunity to resurface. Now, Paris offers as many such opportunities as Balbec. Whatever city she found herself in, she had no need to look for temptation, for the evil was not in Albertine alone, but in other women, for whom every chance of pleasure was worth taking. A look from one of them, immediately understood by the other, brings the sex-starved pair together. And a clever woman can easily appear not to have seen anything, and then five minutes later follow the other person, who did understand and is waiting for her in a side-street, and in a few words arrange a meeting. Who is to know? And to keep the relationship going, it was so easy for Albertine to tell me that she wanted to go back to some part of Paris that had appealed to her. It follows that she only had to come home late, her outing only had to have lasted an inexplicably long time (though no doubt it could easily have been explained without introducing any sexual motive) and my sufferings would begin again, attached this time to mental images that did not date from Balbec, and which I would try to erase, as I had erased their predecessors, as if the destruction of a temporary cause could bring about the cure of a congenital disease. I did not realize that by these eradications, in which I was assisted by Albertine's own changeability, her readiness to forget, even to hate the recent object of her love, I sometimes caused deep suffering to one or another of these unknown beings with whom she had, in turn, taken pleasure, and I caused them to suffer in vain, for they would be cast off, but replaced; parallel to the path marked out by so many light-hearted desertions, there would be a pitiless one for me, broken only by the shortest of respites, so that my sufferings, as I should have realized, could end only with Albertine's life or with my own. Even in our early days back in Paris, when I was dissatisfied with the information that Andrée and the chauffeur had given me about their outings with my friend, I had felt the surroundings of Paris to be as cruel as those of Balbec and I had gone off on a few days' journey with Albertine. But everywhere my uncertainty about what she was doing was the same, the possibilities for wrongdoing were just as numerous, keeping a watch on her was even more difficult, so that I had brought her back to Paris. The truth was that in leaving Balbec I had thought that I was leaving Gomorrah behind, that I was tearing Albertine away from it; alas! Gomorrah was dispersed to the four corners of the Earth. And, partly because of my jealousy, and partly out of ignorance about these pleasures (a most unusual ignorance), I had unwittingly set up this game of hide-and-seek in which Albertine would forever escape me. I would fire questions directly at her: 'Ah, that reminds me, Albertine, am I imagining it, or didn't you tell me you used to know Gilberte Swann?' – 'Yes, that's to say, she talked to me once at school, because she had the French history notes, she was really nice, she let them me borrow them and I gave them back to her the next time I saw her.' – 'Is she one of those women, you know, the kind I don't like?' – 'Oh no, not at all, quite the opposite.'

But, rather than engaging in these investigative conversations, I often expended on imagining Albertine's outing the energy I was saving by not taking part in it, and when I spoke to my friend about a project, it was with all the enthusiasm that is not dissipated by actually carrying it out. I would express so strong a desire to go and look again at such-and-such a stained-glass window in the Sainte Chapelle, such regret that we could not go there alone, that she would tenderly reply, 'But darling, if you want to go there so much, you can do it, come with us. We'll wait for you as long as you like, until you're ready to go. And then, if you'd rather go with just me, I can easily send Andrée home, she can come another time.' But by begging me to go out like this, she calmed me down to the point where I was able to stay at home.

I did not stop to think that by relying on Andrée or the chauffeur to keep me calm, by using them to keep watch on Albertine, I was becoming apathetic, allowing all the imaginative powers of the intelligence, the inspirations of the will which allow one to foresee and prevent the actions of another, to stiffen and become inert. This was all the more dangerous in that my nature has always made me more open to the world of the possible than to that of real-life contingencies. This approach helps one to understand the human soul, but one runs the risk of being deceived by individuals. My jealousy sprang from images, its purpose was suffering; it did not derive from any probability. Now, in the life of men and of nations there may come (and did come, one day, in my own life) a moment when one needs to find within oneself a prefect of police, a clear-sighted diplomat, a head of criminal investigation who, instead of letting his mind wander among all the possibilities between here and the four corners of the universe, reasons logically and says to himself, 'If Germany announces this, it's because she wants to do something else, not any odd thing at random, but precisely this or that, which she has perhaps already begun to do' – 'If such-and-such a person has escaped, he will not be heading for a, b, or d, but for c, and the place to begin our search is, etc.' Alas, this faculty was not very highly developed in me, and I was letting it grow sluggish, fade, disappear as I formed the habit of calm, relying on others to do my surveillance for me. As for my desire to stay at home, I had no wish to explain it to Albertine. I told her that the doctor said I had to stay in bed. That was not true. And even if it had been, his directions would not have had the power to stop me going out with my friend.

I asked her to excuse me from coming with her and Andrée. I shall give only one of my reasons, which was a reason of self-preservation. As soon as I was in public with Albertine, if she was out of my sight for a moment I was anxious, I began imagining that she had been speaking to someone or even looking at someone. If she was not in the very best of moods, I would think that I was making her miss or have to postpone some planned meeting. Reality is always a mere starting-point towards the unknown, on a path down which we can never travel very far. It is better not to know, to think as little as possible, not to feed jealousy on the smallest concrete detail. Unfortunately, failing contact with the outside world, the inner world can also provide incidents; even when I did not go out with Albertine, chance meetings in my own solitary thoughts sometimes provided those little fragments of reality that magnetically draw to themselves scraps of the unknown which immediately begin to hurt. One may choose to live under the equivalent of a bell jar; associations of ideas and memories continue their play. But these internal shocks did not appear immediately; as soon as Albertine had left for her drive I was filled with life, if only for a few moments, by the elating powers of solitude. I shared in the pleasures of the day to come; the arbitrary desire – the capricious, purely personal wish – to enjoy them would not have been enough to put them within my reach, had not the day's special weather not only called up the images of such pleasures in the past, but affirmed their real existence in the here and now, immediately accessible to all men not obliged by an accidental (and therefore negligible) circumstance to stay at home. On certain fine days it was so cold, one was in such extensive communication with the street outside, that it was as if the walls of the house had been wrenched apart, and each time the tram passed, its note sounded out as if a silver knife were striking a house made of glass. But it was above all inside myself that I heard with delight a new sound struck from the inner violin. Its strings are tightened or slackened by simple variations in temperature, in exterior light. Within our being, that instrument which the uniformity of habit has reduced to silence, melody springs from these changes, these variations, which are the source of all music: the weather on particular days makes us move immediately from one note to another. We hear once more the forgotten tune whose mathematical necessity we could have worked out and which, for the first few moments, we sing without recognizing it. Only these inner changes (though they came from outside) brought the outer world alive again for me. Connecting doors, long walled up, were opening again in my brain. The life of certain towns, the gaiety of certain promenades took their place within me again. With my whole being trembling around the vibrating string, I would have given my dreary past life and all my life to come, both rubbed flat by the eraser of habit, to prolong this peculiar state.

I had not gone with Albertine on her long drive, but my mind would only travel the further and, having refused to experience with my senses that particular morning, I could enjoy in imagination every morning of the same kind, past and future, or, more exactly, a certain type of morning of which all mornings of the same kind were a fleeting apparition and which I had quickly recognized; for the sharp air itself turned up the right pages and set before me, so that I could follow it from my bed, the Gospel for the day. This ideal morning filled my mind with permanent reality, identical with all similar mornings, and with a gaiety unimpaired by my weak physical state; for, since our well-being results much less from our good health than from the surplus of our unexpended energy, we can attain it not only by increasing our strength, but by reducing our activity. I was overflowing with energy, held in reserve in my bed; it made me start, inwardly leap, like a machine with the brake on running in neutral.

Françoise came in to light the fire, and to get it going threw on a few twigs whose smell, forgotten all through the summer, traced a magic circle around the fireplace in which, seeing myself reading now at Combray, now at Doncières, I was as happy, staying in my room in Paris, as if I had been on the point of leaving for a walk towards Méséglise or meeting Saint-Loup and his friends on field exercises. It often happens that the pleasure that everyone takes in recalling his store of remembered scenes is more intense, for example, in those who on the one hand are prevented by the tyranny of physical illness and the hope of a cure from seeking in nature pictures which resemble their memories, but on the other can still hope that they will soon be able to do so, so that their attitude towards these scenes remains one of desire, of appetite, and they do not consider them simply as scenes, as pictures. But even if they could have remained mere pictures for me; if, recalling them, I could simply have gazed upon them, they still immediately recreated in me, in my whole being, by the power of an identical sensation, the child, the adolescent who had first seen them. It was not just the weather outside that had changed, or the smells in my room, but inside me there was a change of age, the replacement of one person by another. The smell of the twigs in the icy air was like a piece of the past, an invisible ice-floe broken off from a distant winter and floating into my room, striated here and there with a perfume or a light as if by different years into which I found myself plunged once again, swept away even before I had recognized them by the light-heartedness of hopes long since abandoned. The sun reached my bed and shone through the transparent barrier of my thin body, warmed me, made me as fiery as crystal. Then, like a starving convalescent feeding already on all the dishes he is not yet allowed to have, I would ask myself whether marrying Albertine would not ruin my life, both by making me take on the impossible task (impossible for me) of dedicating myself to another human being and by separating me from myself by her continual presence, depriving me for ever of the joys of solitude. And not only of those. Even if we ask of the day only desires, there are some – those provoked not by things, but by human beings – which by nature cannot be shared. Thus, if I got out of bed and went to open my curtains for a moment, it was not only in the way a musician opens his piano for a moment, and to see whether on the balcony and in the street the light had exactly the same quality as in my memory, it was also to see some laundry-woman carrying her linen-basket, a baker's wife in her blue apron, a dairy-woman in white linen bib and sleeves holding the hook for the milk-jugs, some proud, fair-haired young girl following her governess, an image which tiny differences in outline (perhaps so small as to be insignificant) made as different from any other as a musical phrase differs from another by a note or two. Without this vision I should have deprived my day of the objects it could offer to my desires for happiness. But if the increase in joy, brought to me by the sight of women I could not have imagined a priori, made the street, the town, the world seem more desirable, more worthy of being explored, it made me, for that very reason, more anxious to get well, to go out, and, without Albertine, to be free. How many times, at the moment when the unknown woman of whom I would soon be dreaming was passing in front of the house, sometimes on foot, sometimes with all the speed of her motor-car, I suffered because my body could not follow my gaze in its pursuit of her and, falling upon her as if shot from my window by a stone-bow, arrest the flight of that face in which there awaited me the promise of a happiness that, shut away as I was, I should never enjoy.

Albertine, on the other hand, held nothing new for me. Every day I found her less pretty. Only the desire which she excited in others, when I learned of it and began to suffer again, in my desire to keep her from them, could put her back on her pedestal. Suffering alone gave life to my tedious attachment to her. When she disappeared, taking with her the need to alleviate my pain, which demanded all my attention like some dreadful hobby, I realized how little she meant to me – as little, no doubt, as I meant to her. It made me unhappy that things should go on this way, and sometimes I longed to hear of some really unforgivable thing that she had done, something that, until I was cured, would come between us, so that we could then make it up, remake, in a different and more flexible form, the tie that held us together. In the meantime, I relied on a thousand circumstances, a thousand pleasures, to give her, while she stayed with me, the illusion of that happiness which I felt incapable of giving her myself. I wanted to go to Venice as soon as I was better, but how could I do that, married to Albertine, when I was so jealous of her that, even in Paris, when I did decide to move, it was to go out with her? Even when I stayed at home all afternoon, my thoughts followed her wherever she went, tracing out a distant, blue horizon, creating, around the centre where I lay, a moving zone of uncertainty and vagueness. 'Albertine could spare me so much of the anguish of separation,' I said to myself, 'if only, on one of these outings, seeing that I no longer speak to her of marriage, she would decide not to come back, and go off to her aunt's without my having to say goodbye!' My heart, now that its wound was forming scar tissue, was beginning to detach itself from that of my friend. I could imagine her removed, at a distance from me, without suffering. Failing myself, some other man would no doubt be her husband, and, once free, she would perhaps have some of those adventures that filled me with horror. But it was such a fine day, I was so sure that she would be back in the evening, that even if this idea of possible transgressions came into my mind, I could by an act of free-will shut it off in one part of my brain, where it impinged on me no more than the vices of an imaginary person would on my real life. Turning my thought on its newly oiled hinges, using a new energy which I could feel, in my head, as both a physical and a mental force, like a muscular movement and a spiritual departure, I had left behind the customary state of preoccupation in which I had hitherto been confined and was beginning to move in the free air, so that the idea of sacrificing everything to stop Albertine marrying someone else and to frustrate her taste for women seemed as unreasonable in my eyes as it would have to someone who had never known her. Besides, jealousy is one of those intermittent diseases whose causes are arbitrary, inescapable, always the same in a given patient but sometimes entirely different in another. Some asthmatics can moderate their attacks only by opening the windows, breathing a strong breeze or the pure air of the mountains; others take refuge in the centre of town, in a smoky room. There is hardly a victim of jealousy whose illness does not admit of some palliations. One accepts being deceived provided he is told of it, another provided it is hidden from him, and in this one is hardly more absurd than the other, for if the second is more truly deceived, since the truth is hidden from him, the first needs the truth to feed his sufferings, to extend and renew them. What is more, these two inverse obsessions of jealousy often go beyond words, whether they beg for confidences or refuse them. We see some victims who are jealous only of men with whom their mistress has relations far away from them, but who allow her to give herself to another man if it is with their permission, near them, and if not actually in front of their eyes, at any rate under their roof. This behaviour is quite often found in old men in love with a young woman. They know how difficult it is to please her, sometimes feel themselves incapable of satisfying her, and, rather than be deceived, prefer to allow someone to come into their house, to a neighbouring room, someone who they think will not be able to give her bad advice, even if he is able to give immediate pleasure. Others are quite the opposite: not allowing their mistress to go out alone for a moment in a city they know, keeping her in veritable slavery, they let her go away for a month to a country they do not know, where they cannot imagine what she is doing. In relation to Albertine I longed to achieve peace by either of these means. I would not have been jealous if she had taken pleasures close to me, encouraged and entirely overseen by me, sparing me in that way my fears of her lying; perhaps the same would have been true if she had gone somewhere far away and so unfamiliar to me that I could not imagine how she was living, nor have any hope of finding out, nor be tempted to try. In either case, doubt would have been suppressed, whether by complete knowledge or complete ignorance.

The waning of the day plunged me back, through memory, into a cool atmosphere of former times; I breathed it in with the same delight as Orpheus did the rarefied air, unknown to this earth, of the Elysian Fields. But already the day was ending and I was engulfed in my evening sadness. Looking mechanically at the clock to see how many hours had still to pass before Albertine came home, I saw that I still had time to dress and go downstairs to ask my landlady, Mme de Guermantes,[4] for some ideas about certain pretty items of dress that I wanted to give to my friend. Sometimes I used to meet Her Grace in the courtyard, going out to do her shopping on foot, even in bad weather, wearing a small, neat hat and a fur coat. I knew very well that for many intelligent people she was no different from any other lady, the name of Duchesse de Guermantes having no meaning now that there are no more dukedoms or principalities, but I had adopted another point of view as part of my way of deriving enjoyment from people and places. All the manors of the lands of which she was duchess, princess or viscountess seemed to accompany this fur-coated lady striding out in the rain; she bore them with her, as the characters carved on the lintel of a church door carry in their hand the cathedral they built or the city they defended. But those châteaux, those forests could be seen only by my inward eye in the gloved hand of the fur-clad lady, cousin to the King. My bodily eye could see only, on days when the weather was threatening, an umbrella,[5] with which the Duchesse did not disdain to equip herself. 'You never know, it makes sense, suppose I'm very far from home and a cab is much too dear.' The words 'too dear', 'beyond my means' recurred constantly in the Duchesse's conversation, along with 'I'm too poor'; it was impossible to tell whether she spoke this way because she found it amusing to call herself poor when she was so rich, or whether it seemed to her elegant, as a great aristocrat, to speak like a country-woman and show that she did not attach any importance to wealth, unlike people who have nothing but riches and who despise the poor. Maybe it was, rather, a habit which she had contracted at a time in her life when she was already rich, but not rich enough to cover the upkeep of so many properties, and felt a certain lack of money which she did not wish to seem to be concealing. The things people joke about most are usually those which irritate them, but which they do not want to seem to be irritated by; there is perhaps, too, an unspoken hope of further advantage: that the person we are speaking to, hearing us admit something jokingly, will believe that it is not true.

But most often, at that time, I knew I would find the Duchesse at home, and I was glad of that, for it made it easier to question her at length about the subjects which interested Albertine. And I went downstairs, hardly stopping to think how extraordinary it was that I should be going to see the mysterious Mme de Guermantes of my childhood, simply to use her as a source of practical information, as one uses the telephone, that supernatural instrument before whose wonders we were once all in awe, and which we now use unthinkingly, to call our tailor or order an iced dessert.

The 'little touches' of dress gave Albertine enormous pleasure, and I could not resist making her a small present of this kind every day. And every time she spoke to me about a scarf, a stole, a parasol which, looking out of the window or passing in the courtyard, with her sharp eyes that picked out so quickly anything relating to elegance, she had seen around the neck, on the shoulders or in the hand of Mme de Guermantes, I knew that her naturally demanding taste (which had been further refined by those lessons in elegance which Elstir's conversations had been to her) would not be content with some approximation, even a pretty thing which, to the vulgar eye, would be a perfect substitute but in no way resembles the original, and I would go in secret to have the Duchesse explain to me how, where, on what pattern, the thing Albertine admired had been made, how I should go about procuring exactly the same object, what was the maker's secret, the charm (what Albertine called 'the knack') of his manner, the precise name – for the beauty of the material was important too – and the quality of the fabrics which I should ask to be used.

I had told Albertine, when we arrived home from Balbec, that the Duchesse de Guermantes lived opposite us, in the same building; when she heard the grand title and the great name, her face had taken on that indifferent look – no, more than indifferent, hostile, contemptuous – which is the sign of frustrated desire in proud and passionate natures. Albertine's nature was splendid, but its hidden qualities had been able to develop only under the restrictions constituted by our tastes, or our mourning for the tastes which we have had to renounce – in Albertine's case, the taste for social superiority: the result is what people call hatreds. Albertine's hatred for upper-class people was, however, a very small element in her character and I liked its hint of the revolutionary spirit – that is to say, unrequited love for the nobility – which forms the opposite face of the French character from the aristocratic style of Mme de Guermantes. Being unable to achieve it herself, Albertine would perhaps have thought nothing of this aristocratic style, but when she remembered that Elstir had spoken of the Duchesse as the best-dressed woman in Paris, my friend's republican disdain for a Duchess was replaced by an intense interest in a woman of fashion. She often asked me about Mme de Guermantes and liked me to go and visit the Duchesse to collect fashion hints for her. No doubt I could have asked Mme Swann for the same advice, and I even wrote to her once for this purpose. But Mme de Guermantes seemed to me to carry the art of dress to even greater heights. If I went down to see her for a moment (having first made sure that she had not gone out, and arranged to be told as soon as Albertine came home) and found her enclouded in the mists of a dress of grey crêpe de Chine, I accepted this appearance, which I felt to be due to complex causes and unchangeable, I let myself be swept into the atmosphere it created, like that of certain late afternoons muffled in a pearl-grey floating mist. If, on the other hand, the chosen gown were Chinese with a pattern of red and yellow flames, I saw it as a brilliant sunset; these costumes were not a trivial decoration which could have been replaced by any other, but an inescapable reality, poetic in the same way as the weather, or the light peculiar to a certain time of day.

Of all the gowns or tea-gowns that Mme de Guermantes wore, the ones which seemed most expressive of a particular intention, most endowed with a special meaning, were those gowns which Fortuny based on ancient Venetian designs. Is it their historic appearance, is it rather the fact that each one is unique, which gives them such an individual character that the pose of the woman who is wearing one to wait for you, to talk with you, takes on an exceptional importance, as if this costume had been chosen after long deliberation, and makes the conversation stand out from everyday life like a scene from a novel? In Balzac's novels we see the heroines choose particular costumes to wear on the days when they are to receive a particular visitor. The costumes of today have no such clearly defined character, with the exception of Fortuny dresses. There can be no vagueness in the novelist's description since this dress really exists, the smallest elements of its design as unalterable as those of a work of art. Before putting on this or that dress, the woman has had to make a choice, not between two that are more or less similar, but between two wholly individual ones, each of which could have its own name.

But the dress did not keep me from noticing the woman. Mme de Guermantes herself seemed to me more likeable then than at the time when I was still in love with her. I expected less of her now that I was not going to see her for her own sake, and as I listened to her talk I felt almost the same peaceful informality that one enjoys when home alone, with one's feet on the fender. It was like reading a book written in the language of another time. I had enough detachment to enjoy, in what she said, that pure, particularly French grace that one no longer finds either in the speech or the writing of the present day. I listened to her conversation as if to a deliciously French popular song, and I understood how I could once have heard her laugh at Maeterlinck (whom she now admired with all the weakness of a woman's judgment, swayed by late-flowering literary fashion), just as I understood how Mérimée could have laughed at Baudelaire, Stendhal at Balzac, Paul-Louis Courier at Victor Hugo, Meilhac at Mallarmé. I knew that the laugher's mind was narrow compared to the mind he laughed at, but his vocabulary was purer. Mme de Guermantes's vocabulary, almost as much as Saint-Loup's mother's, was so to an enchanting degree. The old language and the true pronunciation of words are not to be found in the pedantic pastiches of today's writers who say in truth (for in fact), peculiar (for particular), dumbfounded (for astonished), and so forth, but in the conversation of a Mme de Guermantes or a Françoise. I had learned from the second of these, by the age of five, that you do not say 'le Tarn' but 'le Tar', not 'le Béarn' but 'le Béar'. So that when at twenty I went into society, I did not have to learn not to say, as Mme Bontemps did: Madame de Béar*n*.

I would be lying if I said that this 'country', this almost peasant side of her was something the Duchesse was unconscious of, or that there was not a shade of affectation in the way she displayed it. But in her, it was not so much the fake simplicity of a great lady playing the country-woman, or the pride of a duchess cocking a snook at rich ladies and their contempt for the peasantry, but rather a sign of the almost artistic taste of a woman who understands the charm of what she possesses and does not mean to spoil it with a coat of modern distemper. In just the same way, everyone remembers a Norman restaurant-keeper, the owner of the William the Conqueror at Dives, who had been at pains – a very rare thing – not to give his inn the modern luxury of a hotel and who (though a millionaire himself) retained the speech and the smock of a Norman peasant and let the customers come into the kitchen, as in the country, to see him making the dinner himself – a dinner which was none the less far better and even more expensive than in the grandest four-star hotels.

All the local sap in the veins of old aristocratic families is not enough; they also have to give birth to a being intelligent enough not to despise it, not to hide it under a fashionable varnish. Mme de Guermantes, unfortunately a witty Parisian who when I first knew her had nothing left about her of her native region but the accent, had at least, when she wanted to describe her girlhood, found a language half-way between the involuntarily provincial and what might have seemed too consciously literary: one of those compromises which make George Sand's La Petite Fadette so delightful, or some of the legends repeated by Chateaubriand in the Mémoires d'outre-tombe. I especially loved to hear her tell some story in which peasants appeared alongside her. The ancient names, the old customs gave a pleasing quaintness to these meetings between the manor and the village. Having remained in contact with the lands where they once ruled, a certain part of the aristocracy remains regional, so that their simplest remark unrolls before our eyes a whole historical and geographical map of the history of France.

If there was no affectation in Mme de Guermantes's speech, no wish to create a personal language, then her pronunciation was a real oral museum of French history. 'My great-uncle Fitt-jam' did not come as a surprise, for everyone knows that the Fitz-James always insist that they are French nobles and do not wish their name to be pronounced in the English fashion. One is, however, forced to admire the touching docility of those people who had hitherto felt they must make the effort to pronounce certain names according to the rule-book, and who, once they had heard the Duchesse de Guermantes say them differently, applied themselves to learning the new, unsuspected pronunciation. Thus the Duchesse, one of whose great-grandfathers had been in the circle of the Comte de Chambord, liked to tease her husband, who had become an Orléanist, by saying, 'We, the old guard of Frochedorf'. The visitor, who up to that moment had always said 'Frohsdorf', would turn his coat then and there and take every opportunity of saying 'Frochedorf'.

Once when I asked Mme de Guermantes who a delightful young man was whom she had introduced to me as her nephew and whose name I had not caught, I had no more success when, in her throaty voice, the Duchesse said very loudly but indistinctly: 'It's … le Éon, Robert's brother. He says he has the head-shape of the ancient Gauls.' Then I realized that she had said, 'It's little Léon' (the Prince de Léon, in fact Robert de Saint-Loup's brother-in-law). 'I don't know if he has an ancient Gaul's skull,' she went on, 'but his way of dressing, which in fact is very smart, certainly doesn't come from that quarter. One day when I was staying at Josselin with the Rohans, and we went to a religious fête, country people had come to it from all over Brittany and a great villager from Léon was looking in astonishment at Robert's brother-in-law's fawn breeches. "Why are you staring at me?" said Léon. "I bet you don't know who I am." And when the man said no, "Well, I am your prince." "Well I never!" said the man, doffing his cap and apologizing, "and I thought you was an Englishman." ' And if I picked up on the name of Rohan and encouraged Mme de Guermantes to say more about that family (with which her own had repeatedly intermarried), her conversation took on some of the melancholy charm of Breton religious gatherings and, as that real poet Pampille[6] would say, 'the bitter taste of buckwheat pancakes cooked over a furze fire'.

Speaking of the Marquis du Lau (whose sad end is well known, when he was deaf and used to have himself taken to the house of Mme H, who was blind), she told of the happier years when after hunting, at Guermantes, he would put on his slippers to have tea with the King of England, whom he did not regard as his superior and in whose company he clearly did not stand on ceremony. She described all this in such a lively fashion that she added to his portrait the musketeer's plume of the somewhat boastful noblemen of the Périgord.

Anyway, even when she was giving the simplest descriptions of people, her careful way of assigning them to their home provinces gave to Mme de Guermantes, faithful in this to her origins, a charm that no native Parisian could ever have had, and the very names of Anjou, Poitou or Périgord recreated whole landscapes in her conversation.

To return to Mme de Guermantes's pronunciations and vocabulary, it is in things like these that the aristocracy shows itself truly conservative, in the full sense of that word: at the same time slightly childish and slightly dangerous, resistant to evolution but amusing for the artist. I wanted to know how the word Jean used to be written. I found out when I received a letter from Mme de Villeparisis's nephew, who signs his name – as he received it in baptism, as it appears in the Almanac de Gotha – Jehan de Villeparisis, with the same beautiful, useless, heraldic h that one loves to see, illuminated in vermilion or ultramarine, in a book of hours or a stained-glass window.

Unfortunately I could not prolong these visits indefinitely since I wished, if possible, not to arrive home after my friend. Now, it was always a slow and painful business extracting information from Mme de Guermantes about her clothes so as to have them copied (in so far as a young girl could wear them) for Albertine.

'For example, Ma'am, the day you were going to dinner with Mme de Saint-Euverte before going on to the Princesse de Guermantes's, you were wearing an all-red dress with red shoes, you were beyond belief, you looked like some kind of great flower of blood, a burning ruby, now what was that called? Could a young girl wear something like that?'

The Duchesse's tired face took on the radiant expression that the Princesse des Laumes would wear when Swann paid her compliments in the old days; she laughed gaily and directed a mocking look, questioning and delighted, towards M. de Bréauté, who was always there at that time of day, and behind whose monocle a lukewarm smile of indulgence stood ready for the intellectual's overblown compliment, which he imagined hid a young man's physical desire. The Duchesse seemed to be saying, 'What's the matter with him? He's mad.' Then, turning to me with a gently teasing look, 'I didn't know that I looked like a burning ruby or a flower of blood, but I do remember wearing a red dress; it was red satin, the way they were making them just then. I suppose a young girl could wear it, but you said that your friend never goes out in the evening. That was definitely an evening dress, you couldn't wear it to pay calls.'

What is remarkable is that in recalling that evening, not after all so long past, Mme de Guermantes should remember only the dress she was wearing and forget one thing which, as we shall see, should have been close to her heart. It is as if the minds of people of action, and smart people are people of action (on a minuscule, microscopic scale, but still action), are so consumed by attention to what will be happening in an hour's time that they commit very little to memory. Very often, for example, it was not a wish to deceive or to seem not to have been mistaken that made M. de Norpois, when the conversation turned to prognostications he had made about a German alliance that never, in fact, came off, say, 'You must be mistaken, I can't remember saying that, and it doesn't sound like me, for in that kind of conversation I usually say the minimum, and I would never have predicted success for one of those unplanned initiatives that begin as a show of strength and usually have to end with a show of force. There is no doubt that, in the very distant future, we could see a Franco-German rapprochement which would greatly benefit both countries, and would not, I believe, be a bad bargain for France, but I have never spoken of it, because the time is not yet ripe and, if you ask my opinion, I believe that if we tried to push our old enemies into a shotgun wedding we should be heading for a great fall and have to pick up the pieces.' When he said these things, M. de Norpois was not lying, he had simply forgotten. One quickly forgets thoughts which had no depth, ideas dictated by imitation or the passions of the moment. They change and our memories change with them. Even more than diplomats, politicians forget the positions they took at a given point in time, and some of their volte-faces owe less to ambition than to a failure of memory. As for grand people, they remember very little at all.

Mme de Guermantes maintained to me that at the party when she wore the red dress, she couldn't remember seeing Mme de Chaussepierre, that I must be wrong to think she was there. Now heaven knows the Chaussepierres had figured largely enough since in the thoughts of the Duc, and even of the Duchesse! Here is why. M. de Guermantes was the senior vice-president of the Jockey Club when the president died. Some members of the club who have no connections in society and find their only pleasure in blackballing people who do not ask them to their parties, got up a campaign against the Duc de Guermantes, who, in the certainty of being elected, and caring little for this presidency, which was of small importance to a man in his social position, did nothing to secure it. It was argued that the Duchesse had been a Dreyfus supporter (the Dreyfus Affair was long over, but twenty years later people would still be talking about it, and at this time only two years had passed), that she received the Rothschilds, that too much favour had been shown recently to powerful cosmopolitan figures like the Duc de Guermantes, who was half a German. The campaign quickly took root: clubmen always envy the famous and hate great fortunes. Chaussepierre was not poor, but no one could be offended by his wealth as he never spent a penny of it; he lived with his wife in a modest flat, she appeared dressed in black woollen. A passionate music-lover, she did give little parties where many more singers were seen than at the Guermantes'. But nobody talked about them, no food was served, the husband did not even come, and all this happened in the obscurity of the rue de la Chaise. At the Opéra, no one noticed Mme de Chaussepierre; she was always with people whose names recalled the most reactionary circles of former times, the intimates of Charles X, but obscure people, not smart at all. On the day of the election, to everyone's surprise, Chaussepierre, the junior vice-president, was elected president of the Jockey Club and the Duc de Guermantes was left standing, that is, had to continue as senior vice-president. Certainly, being president of the Jockey Club is a trifle to a family of princely rank like the Guermantes. But not being elected when your turn comes, seeing the post going to a Chaussepierre, when Oriane had not only failed to acknowledge his wife's bow two years before, but had even showed her displeasure at being greeted by this unknown, dowdy figure, all this was hard for the Duc to bear. He claimed to be above noticing his failure, maintaining at the same time that it was his long-standing friendship with Swann that had caused it. In fact, he was furious. It was characteristic that the Duc had never been heard to use the banal expression 'thoroughgoing', but after the Jockey Club election, whenever the Dreyfus case was mentioned, 'thoroughgoing' would pop up: 'The Dreyfus case, the Dreyfus case, it's all very well to call it that, but it's a misnomer; it wasn't a matter of religion but a thoroughgoing political quarrel.' Five years could pass without 'thoroughgoing' being heard again, provided that during that time no one mentioned the Dreyfus case, but if at the end of the five years the name of Dreyfus was heard again, 'thoroughgoing' would follow immediately upon it. In any case, the Duc could not bear anyone to mention the case, 'which caused so much unhappiness', he would say, though in reality he was conscious of only one instance of unhappiness, his own failure to win the presidency of the Jockey Club.

So, on the afternoon I am speaking of, when I reminded Mme de Guermantes of the red dress she was wearing at her cousin's party, M. de Bréauté struck a wrong note when he broke into the conversation and, by an obscure association of ideas he did nothing to elucidate, manoeuving his tongue to the point of his pursed lips, began by saying, 'Speaking of the Dreyfus case …' (why the Dreyfus case? we were only talking about a red dress, and certainly poor Bréauté, who only ever wanted to please, did not mean anything unkind). But the mere name of Dreyfus wrinkled the Jove-like brow of the Duc de Guermantes. 'Someone told me a very clever saying, really sharp, of our friend Cartier's (I should make it clear that this Cartier, Mme de Villefranche's brother, had nothing whatever to do with the jeweller of the same name!), and of course I wasn't surprised, for he always has wit and to spare. – Well, Oriane interrupted, I can certainly spare his wit. I can't tell you how much your friend Cartier has always paralysed me, and I've never been able to understand how Charles de la Trémoïlle and his wife can be so in thrall to such a crashing bore: I find him there every time I go to their house. – My d-dear d-Duchesse, replied Bréauté, who had a slight stammer, you are very hard on Cartier. Perhaps he has rather moved in on the La Trémoïlles, but he's a sort of, what shall I say, b-bosom friend to Charles, and that is a rara avis these days. Anyhow, here is the saying I was told about. It seems Cartier said that if M. Zola had gone out of his way to be charged and convicted, it was so as to experience a completely new sensation: going to p-prison. – And that's why he fled the country before he could be arrested, said Oriane. It doesn't make sense. And anyway, even if it were true, I think the remark was simply idiotic. If that's what you call wit … – Oh, Oriane d-dear, replied Bréauté, beginning to retreat in the face of opposition, I didn't say it, I'm just repeating what was said to me, take it for what it's worth. Anyway, it earned M. Cartier a severe telling-off from La Trémoïlle – excellent chap – who won't have anybody talking in his house – and he's quite right – about – what shall I say – the politics of the day, and who was all the more angry because Mme Alphonse Rothschild was there. Cartier had to take a real dressing-down from La Trémoïlle. – Of course, said the Duc very crossly, we all know that the Alphonse Rothschilds, though they are tactful enough never to speak of the wretched affair, are Dreyfusards at heart, like all Jews. In fact, that's an argument ad hominem (the Duc used the expression ad hominem in rather a slapdash way) that could be used more often to show how dishonest the Jews are. If a Frenchman commits theft or murder, I don't feel I have to say he's innocent, just because he's a Frenchman like me. But the Jews will never admit that one of them could be a traitor, even though they know it's true, and they don't care in the least about the terrible repercussions (the Duc was naturally thinking about the unspeakable election of Chaussepierre) that can result from their friend's crime … Really, Oriane, you must admit it's disgraceful, the way all the Jews defend a traitor. You won't tell me that it's not because they're Jews themselves. – Yes I will, said Oriane (by now somewhat annoyed and feeling a certain desire to resist the Jove-like thunderings, and also to show 'intelligent' people's detachment from the Dreyfus case). But perhaps it's just because, being Jewish and knowing themselves, they know that a man can be a Jew without having to be treacherous and anti-French, as M. Drumont apparently would have us believe. Certainly if Dreyfus had been a Christian the Jews wouldn't have taken such an interest in his case, but they did, because they realize that if he hadn't been a Jew, people wouldn't have been so ready to believe him a traitor a priori, as my nephew Robert would say. – Women don't understand anything about politics, cried the Duc, glaring at the Duchesse. That appalling crime wasn't only a Jewish affair, but a thoroughgoing national scandal which may have the most dreadful consequences for France. And France should expel all the Jews, even though I recognize that the only measures so far have been taken (in the most disgraceful fashion, which should be reversed at once) not against them but against their most distinguished opponents, men of the first rank, excluded from public life to our country's great cost.'

I saw danger ahead and hurriedly began to talk frocks again.

'Do you remember, Ma'am, I said, the first time you were kind to me? – The first time I was kind to him,' she repeated with a laughing look towards M. de Bréauté, the end of whose nose got even thinner, while his smile became more tenderly polite towards Mme de Guermantes and his voice, like a knife being sharpened, let out a few vague, rusty sounds. 'You were wearing a yellow dress with big black flowers. – But dear boy, it's the same thing, those are evening dresses. – And your hat with the cornflowers that I liked so much! But anyway, that's all in the past. What I'd really like to have made for the girl I mentioned is a fur coat like the one you were wearing yesterday morning. Could I see it? Would that be out of the question? – No, Hannibal has to go in a moment. You can come into my dressing-room and my maid will show it to you. The only thing is, I can lend you anything you like, but if you have Callot's, or Doucet's, or Paquin's designs made up by a little dressmaker, they won't ever look the same. – But I've no intention of going to a little dressmaker, I know that wouldn't be the same, but I'd love to be able to understand why it wouldn't. – But you know I can't explain anything, I'm a *h*idiot, I talk like a peasant woman. It's a question of skill, of handling; for the furs I can at least introduce you to my furrier, which will mean he doesn't rob you. But you know it will cost you another eight or nine thousand francs. – And that loose gown you were wearing the other evening, the one that smells so strange, it's dark, velvety, with spots and gold streaks like a butterfly's wing? – Oh, that's a Fortuny dress. Your young friend can certainly wear that kind of thing at home. I have lots of them, I'll show you some, I can even give you some if you like. But I'd really like you to see the one my cousin Talleyrand has. I must write and ask her to lend it to me. – But you had such pretty shoes too, are they Fortuny as well? – No, I know the ones you mean, they're gold kid that we found in London, when I was shopping with Consuelo Manchester. They're extraordinary. I could never understand how they gilded the leather, it looks like a golden skin. Just that, with a little diamond in the middle. The Duchess of Manchester is dead, sadly, but if you like I'll write to Lady Warwick or the Duchess of Marlborough to see if I can find some more like it. In fact, I think I might have some of the skin left. Perhaps we could have some made up here. I'll have a look this evening and let you know.'

Since I tried as far as possible to have left the Duchesse before Albertine got home, I was often leaving Mme de Guermantes's at an hour that meant I would meet M. de Charlus and Morel, crossing the courtyard on their way to have tea with … Jupien, high favour for the Baron! I did not meet them every day, but they went there every day. We should note that the regularity of a habit is usually a function of its absurdity. Striking actions are usually carried out on irregular impulse. But insensate lives, where the madman deprives himself of all pleasures, and seeks out the most terrible sufferings, are usually the lives that change the least. At ten-year intervals, if one cared enough to check, one would find the sufferer still sleeping away the hours when he could be living, going out at hours when the best that could happen to him is to be murdered in the streets, drinking iced drinks when he is hot, always nursing a cold. A tiny burst of energy, on a single day, could change everything for him. But these lives are usually led by beings devoid of energy. Perversity is another aspect of these monotonous existences, which the smallest exercise of will would make less dreadful. Both aspects came into play when M. de Charlus paid his daily tea-time visit to Jupien. Only one cloud had ever shadowed the daily ritual. One day the waistcoat-maker's niece had said to Morel: 'That's right, come tomorrow, I'll treat you to tea.' The Baron had, rightly, thought the expression a vulgar one, particularly in the mouth of someone he was planning to make his almost-daughter-in-law. But, with his love of wounding and carried away by his own anger, instead of simply asking Morel to teach her the right thing to say, he had made a violent scene that lasted all the way home. In the most haughty, insolent tone he began: 'Your "touch", which I see has nothing to do with "tact", must have prevented the normal development of your sense of smell, since you allowed that fetid expression "treat you to tea" (twopenny tea no doubt) to lift up its cesspit odour to my royal nostrils. When you finish a violin solo at my house, have you ever been rewarded with a fart, instead of delirious applause or the silence which is even more eloquent as it comes from the fear of being unable to hold back – not what your fiancée gives us in such quantity, but tears, tears that you have brought to the edge of our lips?'

When a junior civil servant has received such a dressing-down from his superior, he is inevitably sacked the next day. But nothing would have been more painful to M. de Charlus than to have to send Morel away and, even fearing that he might have gone too far, he began to praise the young girl: detailed praises, showing fine taste, with every now and then unintended notes of impertinence. 'She is delightful. As you are a musician, I suppose you were charmed by her voice; it's beautiful in the high notes, where she seems to be waiting for your accompanying B sharp. I like her lower register less; I'm sure that must have something to do with the slimness of her neck and the strange way it seems to stop and start three times, always stretching a little higher; rather than commonplace details, it's her shape that is so pleasing. And as she's a dressmaker and clever with her scissors, she must make me a pretty silhouette of herself out of paper.'

Charlie had not been listening to these praises, all the less since the beauties they celebrated in his fiancée had always passed him by. But he answered M. de Charlus, 'That's all right, dear boy, I'll tell her what's what, I'll make sure she doesn't talk like that again.' If Morel called M. de Charlus 'dear boy', it was not that the handsome violinist did not know he was barely a third of the Baron's age. He did not say it, either, with Jupien's insinuating manner, but in the simple way that shows how, in certain relationships, a forgetting of the age difference has tacitly preceded the development of affection. Feigned affection in Morel's case, sincere affection in others. For example, about this time, M. de Charlus received a letter written in these terms: Dear Palamède, when am I going to see you? I'm missing you ever so much and thinking about you all the time (etc.) Your loving PIERRE.' M. de Charlus racked his brains to discover which of his relatives had dared to write to him in so familiar a style; it must be someone he knew very well, and yet he did not recognize the writing. For several days all the princes mentioned, however briefly, in the Almanac de Gotha trooped through M. de Charlus's brain. At last, suddenly, an address written on the back of the letter gave him the answer: it was the work of the pageboy at a gaming club where M. de Charlus occasionally called. The pageboy had not thought he was being rude in writing in this style to M. de Charlus, whom in fact he greatly admired. No, he thought it would not be nice not to call someone 'tu' who had kissed you several times, and thereby – as he naïvely imagined – given you a sign of his affection. M. de Charlus was in fact delighted by his familiarity. He even walked back from an afternoon party with M. de Vaugoubert so as to show him the letter. And yet heaven knows M. de Charlus did not like to be seen with M. de Vaugoubert. For the diplomat, with his monocle stuck in his eye, stared in all directions at the lads passing by. What was more, when he was with M. de Charlus, he grew more daring, and began to use a language which the Baron hated. He put all men's names in the feminine and, as he was very stupid, thought this was the height of wit and was constantly bursting out laughing. As he was also hugely attached to his diplomatic post, his deplorable giggliness in the street was constantly interrupted by waves of terror when he saw his social equals, or worse, civil servants approaching. 'There goes little Miss Telegram,' he would say, nudging the scowling Baron, 'I used to know her, but she's settled down now, horrid thing! Ooh, isn't that Galeries Lafayette messenger delicious! Oh Lord, there's the chief secretary for Commercial Affairs. I hope he didn't see me nudging you! He's the sort who might talk to the minister about it and he might suspend me from duties, especially as he's one of the girls himself, so they say.' M. de Charlus was trembling with rage. Finally, to bring the infuriating walk to an end, he decided to take out his letter and give it to the ambassador to read, requesting his discretion, however; he pretended that Charlie was jealous in order to suggest that he loved him. 'Now, he added, with an inimitable air of benevolence, we should always try to cause as little unhappiness as we can.'

Before returning to Jupien's shop, the author wishes to make clear how unhappy he would be if the reader were offended by these strange scenes. On the one hand (and this is the less important aspect) it may be thought that the aristocracy, in this book, is disproportionately taxed with degeneracy as compared to the other social classes. If that were so, it would not be surprising. As time passes, old families develop peculiarities – a red, hooked nose, a deformed chin – which are admired as specific signs of 'blood'. But among these persisting and ever intensifying traits, there are some which are not visible: tendencies and tastes.

It would be a more serious objection, if true, to say that all these feelings are remote from us, and that poetry should be drawn from what is true and near at hand. Art derived from the most familiar reality does exist, and its range is perhaps the greatest. But it is none the less true that great interest, sometimes even beauty, can spring from actions which derive from a mode of thinking and feeling so remote from anything we feel, anything we believe, that we cannot even begin to understand them, that they unfold before us like an unexplained spectacle. What is more poetic than Xerxes, son of Darius, having the sea whipped with rods, the sea that had swallowed up his fleet?[7]

Morel, using the power that his good looks gave him over the young girl, must certainly have passed on the Baron's comment, disguised as his own, for the expression 'treating to tea' disappeared as completely from the waistcoat-maker's shop as a former close friend disappears from a salon where he used to be welcomed every day, when the hosts have quarrelled with him for some reason or other, or wish to hide their friendship with him and see him only in other people's houses. M. de Charlus was pleased at the disappearance of 'treating'; he saw in it the sign of his power over Morel and the removal of the only little flaw in the perfection of the young person. Then, like all men of his kind, while being genuinely a friend to Morel and his near-fiancée, and looking forward eagerly to their marriage, he took a certain pleasure in his power to stir up at will more or less trivial quarrels between them, above which he could float with the Olympian detachment that his brother would have shown in the same circumstances. Morel had said to M. de Charlus that he loved Jupien's niece and wanted to marry her, and the Baron was delighted to accompany his young friend on visits where he played the part of the future father-in-law, indulgent and discreet.

My own opinion is that 'treat you to tea' was a saying of Morel's own, and that, blinded by love, the young dressmaker had adopted an expression of her adored one's which, in its ugliness, stood out painfully against her pretty, young girl's speech. Thanks to this speech, the charming manners that matched it, and the protection of M. de Charlus, many of her customers treated her as a friend, asked her to dinner, accepted her into their social circle, though she only accepted with the Baron's permission and on the evenings when it suited him. 'A young dressmaker go into society?' you will say, 'how improbable.' If you stop to think, it was no more unlikely than that Albertine should formerly have come to see me at midnight and should now be living with me. And that would perhaps have been improbable in anyone else, but not at all in Albertine, an orphan, living such a free life that in Balbec, at first, I had taken her for the mistress of a cycle-racer, and having as her nearest relative Mme Bontemps, who in the old days, at Mme Swann's, saved all her admiration for her niece's worst behaviour, and now turned a blind eye to everything in the hope that she would take herself off and marry money, some of which might find its way to her aunt (in the highest society mothers who are very well born and very poor, once they have found a rich wife for their son, are happy to live at the young couple's expense, accepting furs, a motor-car, money from a daughter-in-law they do not like but whom they launch in society).

Perhaps the day will come when dressmakers – and I wouldn't find that at all shocking – will go into society. Jupien's niece, being an exception, cannot yet allow us to foresee that day, one swallow does not make a summer. In any case, if the modest social success of Jupien's niece scandalized anyone, it was not Morel, for on some points his stupidity was such that not only did he find the girl, who was a hundred times more intelligent than he was, 'not very bright' – perhaps only because she loved him – but he saw adventuresses, dressmakers in disguise pretending to be ladies, in persons of very good social position who welcomed her to their houses and of whom she never boasted. Naturally these were not Guermantes, nor even people who knew them, but rich, elegant bourgeoises, emancipated enough to think there was no disgrace in having a dressmaker as a guest and conventional enough to derive some pleasure from taking under their wing a young girl whom His Highness the Baron de Charlus visited – on terms of complete propriety – every day.

Nothing gave the Baron more pleasure than the idea of this wedding, which would ensure – so he thought – that Morel could not be taken away from him. Apparently Jupien's niece had once, when she was still hardly more than a child, made a 'slip'. And M. de Charlus, in the course of singing her praises to Morel, would not have been averse to mentioning this fact to his friend, who would have been furious, thus creating bad blood between them. For M. de Charlus, though thoroughly malevolent, was like a large number of good people who praise this man or that woman to show how good they are themselves, but would sooner die than say the kind words, so rarely spoken, that would end a quarrel. Nevertheless, the Baron did not allow himself any insinuation, for two reasons. 'If I tell him', he said to himself, 'that his fiancée is not spotless, his self-conceit will be wounded and he will be angry with me. And then how do I know that he is not in love with her? If I don't say anything, this little passion will soon be over, and I shall be able to control their relationship to suit myself; he will only love her as much as I want him to. Whereas, if I tell him about about the girl's fall from grace, how do I know that Charlie isn't still enough in love to be jealous? I would be turning an insignificant little affair, that I can direct as I please, into a grand passion, which is something difficult to control.' For these two reasons, M. de Charlus kept a silence which bore only a superficial resemblance to discretion, but which was still meritorious, given that not speaking is almost impossible for people of his sort.

Besides, the girl was enchanting, and M. de Charlus, in whom she satisfied all the aesthetic taste for women that he could possibly have, would have liked to have hundreds of photographs of her. Not so stupid as Morel, he learned with pleasure of the smart ladies who invited her to their houses and whom, with his experience, he was able to place socially. But he was careful (wishing to maintain the upper hand) not to enlighten Charlie, who, utterly ignorant of social matters, continued to think that outside the 'violin class' and the Verdurin circle, there existed only the Guermantes, the few almost royal families enumerated by the Baron, the rest of society being only the 'dregs', the 'plebs'. Charlie took these expressions of M. de Charlus's literally.

What, you will say, M. de Charlus, awaited in vain every day of the year by so many ambassadors and Duchesses, declining to dine with the Prince de Croy because he would have to give precedence to him, the same M. de Charlus spent all the time that he refused to these great lords and ladies with the niece of a waistcoat-maker? First and most important reason, Morel was there. But even if he had not been, I do not think the thing is so improbable; if you do, you are thinking like one of Aimé's boys. Only restaurant waiters think that an extremely rich man always wears eye-catching new clothes, and that a real swell gives dinners for sixty people and goes everywhere by motor. They are wrong. Very often an extremely rich man always wears the same shabby coat. A swell is the sort of man who, in a restaurant, talks only to the waiters and, when he gets home, plays cards with his footmen. That does not mean that he will not refuse to go through a door after Prince Murat.

Among the reasons for M. Charlus's happiness at the thought of the young people's wedding was his feeling that Jupien's niece would be a kind of extension of Morel's personality and hence of the Baron's knowledge of and power over him. The idea of 'deceiving', in the conjugal sense, the violinist's wife-to-be would not have given the Baron one moment's scruple. But having a 'young couple' to guide, feeling himself the mighty, all-powerful protector of Morel's wife (who, by considering the Baron as a god, would prove that the beloved Morel had inspired her with this notion and so would contain within her something of Morel), these things varied the form of M. de Charlus's dominance and brought to birth in his 'creature' Morel another being, the husband, that is, gave him something more, something new and curious to love in him. Perhaps this domination would now be even greater than before. For while Morel on his own, naked as it were, often resisted the Baron, whom he could be sure of winning over again, once he was married his fears for his household, for his flat, for his future would give M. de Charlus's wishes a stronger purchase upon him. All these prospects, and even, if necessary, on evenings when he was bored, the thought of setting the two at loggerheads (the Baron had always rather liked battle-scenes), gave pleasure to M. de Charlus. Less, however, than the thought of the young couple's future dependence on him. M. de Charlus's love for Morel took on a charming novelty when he thought to himself: 'His wife will belong to me as well, he belongs to me so completely; they will behave only in ways that cannot annoy me, they will obey my every whim and in that way she will be a sign (of a kind I have never had before) of the thing I had almost forgotten and which is so close to my heart: everyone will see, as they see me protecting them, putting a roof over their heads, I shall see myself that Morel is mine.' This unmistakeableness in the eyes of everyone, in his own eyes, made M. de Charlus happiest of all. For the possession of what one loves is a joy greater than love itself. Often those who hide their possession from everyone do so only for fear that the loved object will be taken away from them. And their happiness, by this prudent choice of silence, is diminished.

The reader will perhaps remember that Morel had once said to the Baron that his dream was to seduce a young girl, in particular this girl; to do so he would promise to marry her, but, once the rape was accomplished, he would 'clear off out of it'. But all that was forgotten after the confession of love for Jupien's niece that Morel had made to M. de Charlus. Indeed, it may be that Morel had forgotten it himself. There was perhaps a genuine gap between Morel's nature, as he had cynically described it – or perhaps even cleverly exaggerated it – and the moment when it would assert itself once more. As he got to know the young girl better, he was attracted to her, he fell in love with her. He knew himself so little that no doubt he thought he loved her, perhaps even that he would love her for ever. Certainly his initial desire, his wicked scheme were still there, but overlaid with so many different feelings that we cannot be certain that the violinist would have been insincere in saying that this perverse desire was not the true motive of his present actions. There was, furthermore, a brief period when, without his entirely admitting it to himself, he saw marriage as necessary. At that moment Morel had quite severe cramps in his hand and was having to consider the possibility of giving up the violin. Since, in everything outside his art, he was unbelievably lazy, he would need to find someone to keep him, and he felt he would rather it were Jupien's niece than M. de Charlus. This arrangement would offer him more freedom and also a great choice of different women, from the ever-changing apprentices that Jupien's niece would hire and provide for him to the rich and beautiful ladies to whom he would prostitute her. The thought that his future wife might be so unreasonable as to refuse to take part in these schemes did not cross Morel's mind for a moment. In any case, they soon sank into the background, replaced by pure love, once the cramps got better. The violin would provide for them, with his allowance from M. de Charlus, who was sure to become less demanding once he, Morel, was married to the young woman. Marriage was the urgent thing now, because of his love and for the sake of his freedom. He asked for Jupien's niece's hand in the proper way; her uncle asked her what she felt. There was no need. The young girl's passion for the violinist streamed around her like her hair when it was down, like the joy that overflowed in her eyes. In Morel everything that was pleasant or profitable for himself produced moral sentiments and words of the same order, sometimes even tears. It was therefore with sincerity – if such a word can be applied to him – that he made to the young girl speeches as sentimental (young noblemen who want to live in idleness can be sentimental too, when they are talking to the delightful daughter of some middle-class moneybags) as the theories he had set forth to M. de Charlus about seduction and deflowering had been unrelievedly base. The only thing was, that the virtuous enthusiasm he felt for a person who gave him pleasure, and the solemn commitments he made to her, had, in Morel's case, a debit side. As soon as the person no longer gave him pleasure, and even, for example, if the need to face up to the promises he had made to her caused him any displeasure, then she at once became, in Morel's mind, the object of a violent antipathy which he justified to himself and which, after some neurasthenic disturbances, allowed him to prove to his own satisfaction, once he had re-established the euphoria of his nervous system, that, even looking at things from the point of view of strict virtue, he was now freed from all obligation.

In the same way, at the end of his stay in Balbec, he had somehow or other lost all his money and, not daring to confess to M. de Charlus, was looking for someone who might give him some more. He had learned from his father (who nevertheless had forbidden him ever to 'touch' people) that in this situation it is permissible to write to the person one wants to approach, saying that one 'needs to talk to him about a business matter', and asking for a 'business meeting'. This magic formula so delighted Morel that I almost think he would have chosen to lose money so as to have the pleasure of asking for a 'meeting to talk about business'. In the years that followed, he had seen that the spell was not always so powerful as he had thought. He had noted that some people, to whom he himself would never have written except in such circumstances, did not reply to him within five minutes of receiving the 'business' letter. If the afternoon passed without Morel's receiving a reply, he did not imagine that, perhaps, the gentleman he approached was not at home, or had had other letters to write, if indeed he wasn't on holiday or ill, etc. If, by extraordinary luck, Morel were given an appointment for the following morning, he would open the conversation with these words, 'There you are! I was so surprised when you didn't answer, I wondered if you were all right, but you are, aren't you, quite well, etc.' So, at Balbec, and without telling me he wanted to speak to him about 'business', he had asked me to introduce him to Bloch, the same Bloch to whom he had been so unpleasant in the tram the week before. Bloch had immediately agreed to lend him – or rather, to get M. Nissim Bernard to lend him – five thousand francs. From that day forward, Morel had adored Bloch. He asked with tears in his eyes how he could ever repay someone who had saved his life. Finally, I approached M. de Charlus and asked him to give Morel a thousand francs a month, which Morel would immediately give to Bloch, paying off the debt reasonably quickly. The first month Morel, still impressed by Bloch's goodness, sent him the thousand francs straight away, but after that he reflected, no doubt, that a more agreeable use could be made of the remaining four thousand francs, for he began to speak ill of Bloch. The very sight of him put him in a black mood, and when Bloch, having forgotten exactly how much he had lent to Morel, asked him for three thousand five hundred francs instead of four thousand, which would have saved the violinist five hundred francs, Morel reacted by saying that in the face of such an irregularity, not only would he not pay a centime, but Bloch should think himself lucky he did not sue him. All this was said with flashing eyes. Not only did he say that Bloch and M. Nissim Bernard had no reason to be angry with him, but soon that they should be glad he was not angry with them. Finally, when he heard that M. Nissim Bernard had been saying that Thibaud played as well as he did, Morel threatened to drag him before the courts for doing him professional damage; then, as there was no justice in France any more, especially when one was up against the chosen race (for anti-Semitism was, in Morel, the natural result of having been lent five thousand francs by a Jew), he refused to leave the house without a loaded revolver. Such a nervous state, following upon an intense affection, was bound to occur soon in Morel, in relation to the waistcoat-maker's niece. It is true that M. de Charlus perhaps unintentionally played a part in the change, for he often said, without meaning it for a moment and simply to tease them, that once they were married he would not see them any more and would leave them to stand on their own feet. This idea on its own would certainly not have been enough to detach Morel from the girl, but, lodging in Morel's mind, it would, when the time came, join up with other related ideas to form a powerful force for break-up.

I did not meet M. de Charlus and Morel all that regularly. They were often already inside Jupien's shop when I took leave of the Duchesse, for I enjoyed her company so much that it made me forget not only the period of anxious waiting which would precede Albertine's return, but even the time when I expected her. Among the days when I stayed late at Mme de Guermantes's, I shall single out one which was marked by a little incident whose cruel significance escaped me entirely and which I only came to understand much later. That late afternoon, Mme de Guermantes had given me, because she knew I liked them, some syringas that had come from the South of France. When I left the Duchesse and went upstairs, Albertine was already back, and on the stairs I met Andrée, who seemed distressed by the overpowering smell of the flowers I was carrying.

'Goodness, are you back already? I said. – Just this minute, but Albertine had a letter to write and she sent me away. – You don't think she was planning something unsuitable? – Of course not, she's writing to her aunt, I think. But she hates strong scents, remember: she won't be pleased with your syringas. – Oh dear, how silly of me. I'll tell Françoise to put them on the backstairs landing. – Don't you think Albertine will pick up the smell of them about you? After tuberoses, it's the most persistent scent there is. Anyway, I think Françoise has gone to the shops. – But I haven't got my key today, however shall I get in? – Ring the bell, Albertine will let you in. Or perhaps Françoise will be back by now.'

I said goodbye to Andrée. As soon as I knocked on the door, Albertine came to let me in, but it was quite a complicated business, for with Françoise being out Andrée did not know where to switch on the light. Finally she let me in, but fled at the smell of the syringas. I put them down in the kitchen, and while I was doing so my friend, abandoning her letter (I had no idea why), had time to go into my bedroom, lie down on the bed and call to me from there. I repeat that at the time everything seemed quite normal to me, perhaps a little confused, but quite insignificant. I had almost surprised her with Andrée, and she had given herself a breathing-space by switching off all the lights, had gone into my bedroom so that I should not go into hers and see her unmade bed, and pretended she had been writing. But all this will be explained later, all these things which might have been true or not, I have never been able to say.

Apart from this one incident, everything followed a predictable pattern when I came back up from the Duchesse's. Albertine, not knowing whether I would want to go out with her before dinner, usually left her hat, coat and parasol untidily in the hallway. When I saw them as I came in, the atmosphere of the house became breathable. I felt that, in place of a thin, depleted air, happiness filled it up. I was released from my sadness, the sight of these trivial things made Albertine mine, I ran to find her.

The days I did not go down to Mme de Guermantes's, to make the time pass more quickly during the hour before my friend's return, I would leaf through an album of Elstir's or one of Bergotte's books.

Then – as even those works which seem to be addressed solely to our sight or hearing require, if we are to appreciate them fully, a close collaboration between our awakened intelligence and these two senses – I unconsciously brought out of myself the dreams which Albertine had sown there in former times when I did not know her and which had shrivelled away in the familiarity of daily life. I threw them into the musician's phrase or the painter's image as if into a crucible, I used them to nourish the book that I was reading. And no doubt they made it more vivid for me. But Albertine gained just as much by being thus transported from one to the other of the two worlds we live in and in which we can alternately place the same object, by escaping the crushing pressure of matter and floating free in the weightless spaces of thought. I found myself able, suddenly and for a moment, to have ardent feelings for the fastidious young girl. At that moment she seemed like a work of Elstir or of Bergotte, I felt a moment of lofty enthusiasm for her, seeing her distanced by imagination and art.

Soon I was told that she had come home; but I had given orders that her name was not to be mentioned unless I were alone. If, for example, Bloch was visiting me, I would make him stay a few minutes longer, so as to be sure that he would not cross paths with my friend. For I was concealing the fact that she lived with me and even that I ever saw her at home, such was my fear that one of my friends might take a fancy to her, might wait for her outside the flat, or that in the split second of an encounter in the corridor or the hall, she might make a sign to him and arrange a meeting. Then I heard the rustle of Albertine's skirt moving towards her bedroom, for, out of discretion and, no doubt, also the consideration that she had shown in the old days when we dined at La Raspelière and she did her best to prevent me from being jealous, she would not come near my room, knowing I was not alone. But that was not the only reason, I suddenly realized. I remembered now, I had known an initial Albertine, then all of a sudden she had turned into another, the present one. And no one could be blamed for this change but myself. All the confessions she would have made to me readily, even gladly, when we were just friends, had dried up once she believed that I loved her, or perhaps, without mentioning the word Love to herself, recognized an inquisitorial feeling which desires knowledge, even when knowledge means pain, and constantly seeks to find out more. From that day onwards she had hidden everything from me. She turned away from my room if she thought, not even that I was with a woman friend, but with any friend, she whose eyes used to light up at the mention of any girl: 'You must have her round, I'd like to meet her. – But she has what you call a reputation. – Exactly, it'll be all the more fun.' At that moment, I could have perhaps heard the whole story. And even in the little casino, when she moved her breasts away from Andrée's, I do not think it was because I was there, but because of Cottard, who she no doubt thought might gossip about her. And yet even then she had begun to freeze, the confident words no longer sprang from her lips, her gestures were more reserved. Then she distanced herself from everything that might bring an emotional reaction from me. When she spoke of the parts of her life that I did not know, she colluded with my ignorance to give them the most reassuringly harmless character. And now the transformation was complete, she went straight to her room if I was not alone, not only so as not to disturb me, but to show that she cared nothing for anyone but me. There was only one thing she would not do for me, a thing she would have done only at the time when I would have cared nothing for it, and which she would have happily done then for that very reason: that is, tell me the truth. I would therefore always be reduced, like an examining magistrate, to drawing uncertain conclusions from slips of language which could perhaps be explained without invoking the hypothesis of guilt. And she would always see me as jealous and judging of her.

Our engagement was turning into a trial and giving her the timid manner of a guilty prisoner. Now she changed the subject when we spoke of anyone, man or woman, who was not old. If only I had seized the time before she knew I was jealous of her to ask her the things I wanted to know. One should make the best use of that time. That is when the woman we love will tell us what she enjoys, and even the means she uses to keep her tastes from other people. Albertine would never have confessed to me now, as she had at Balbec, partly because it was true and partly to excuse herself for not showing her feelings for me more clearly in public (for I had already begun to bore her and she had seen from my kindness to her that she did not have to show me as much affection as to other people in order to receive more in return), she would not have said to me now as she did then: 'I think it's stupid to let people see who you love; with me it's the opposite, as soon as I'm attracted to somebody, I seem to take no notice of them. That way nobody knows what's going on.' What! Was it the Albertine of today, with her pretensions to honesty and to treating everyone the same, who told me that? She would never have spelled out that rule for me today! She simply applied it when talking to me about anyone who might worry me: 'Oh, I don't know, I've never taken any notice of her, she's too uninteresting.' And from time to time, to forestall me in areas that I might find out about, she would own up to things in that tone of voice which, even before one learns of the reality the confession is designed to disguise or whitewash, marks it out as a lie.
